

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

SOUTHEASTERN REPORTER.
VOLUME 18.

LOEB et al v. MANN.

1893.)

CLAIM AND DELIVERY—SPECULATIVE DAMAGES.

The value of the time consumed by plaintiff in an action of claim and delivery, in recovering the property in dispute, and his railroad and hotel expenses and attorneys' fees, are speculative damages, which cannot be recovered in such action.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Abbeville county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by Loeb Bros. & Co. against W. D. Mann to recover the possession of certain liquors taken by defendant under a mortgage by F. C. Perry to certain creditors. From a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for the property and $50 damages, defendant appeals. Reversed, unless plaintiffs, in 10 days, remit the damages assessed.

Carker & McGowan, for appellant. Graydon & Graydon, for respondents.

MCGOWAN, J. This is an action of "claim and delivery" for certain articles of personal property. It seems that F. C. Perry was a retail liquor dealer in Abbeville; that he failed, having in his store the following articles, viz. two barrels of rye whiskey and two cases of fine brandy, worth in the aggregate $223.60; that these articles had been seized by the defendant, Mann, as sheriff, in behalf of one claiming to be a mortgage creditor of Perry, and that the articles were covered by his mortgage. The plaintiffs are liquor dealers of Cincinnati, Ohio, and the complaint alleged that the aforesaid articles, although in Perry's store at Abbeville, were not his property, but had been "consigned" to him by the plaintiffs for sale upon their account, and that the defendant, W. D. Mann, the sheriff, wrongfully and unlawfully took said articles from the possession of Perry, and, although demanded by the plaintiffs, the said defendant refused to deliver them, and still unjustly detains them from the plaintiffs, "to their damage two hundred dollars. Wherefore, the plaintiffs demand judgment against the defendant for the recovery of possession of the said goods, or, in case a delivery thereof cannot be had, for the value thereof,—the sum of $223.40,—together with two hundred dollars, their damages, and for the costs and disbursements of the action." The defendant answered that he did not wrongfully and unlawfully take possession of said goods and chattels, but claimed that he seized the same under and by virtue of a certain mortgage to one Bieman by F. C. Perry, who was then in possession of said goods, and that after the seizure, and before demand by plaintiffs, the defendant was enjoined from selling or disposing of said goods by the court until further order, which has never been made. During the progress of the trial, I. S. Loeb, one of the plaintiffs, was allowed to testify that he was the traveling member of the plaintiffs' firm, and in that capacity made his regular rounds about five times in the year, and he came to Abbeville to collect a debt; that he was shown the barrels and cases of liquor in the custody of the defendant, and upon demand and refusal to deliver the articles he instituted the action, gave bond, and, having the goods delivered to him, he shipped them off upon the Richmond & Danville Railroad. Among other things, he was allowed, over objection, to state what damages he had sustained by reason of the taking of the goods by the sheriff,—the expenses he had incurred, such as railroad expenses, and all that, (objection of defendant overruled.) Witness proceeded: "Well, in all, I have lost ten days' time. I have made one trip besides the one here. When I came here for the goods, I came from Charleston, and returned just as I am doing now, and my time, at the least calculation, is worth $5 a day, and railroad fare, $33, for the second trip; hotel bills, $23; and my attorneys' fees is ten per cent. on the amount recovered, $22,—aggregating $129.93. (Objection noted by request.)" Upon the subject of damages the circuit judge charged as follows: "Now, as to damages, in case you should find for the plaintiffs, the successful party is entitled to damages in all cases where damages are claimed. The amount may be nominal, and it is for you to say what it shall be. In estimating the damages, you are to be governed by the evidence. You must not give remote or speculative damages, and in actions of this kind the case may arise where vindictive damages may be allowed, but I see nothing in this case which would warrant vindictive damages. There was nothing in the action of the sheriff to show that what he did was done maliciously, wantonly, or recklessly; and the mere statement of the complaint that it was 'wrongfully' done does not necessarily imply that it was a forcible and malicious taking," etc. There was no evidence that the property itself had been damaged, or even opened, or that the short delay had reduced the price. The verdict was for the plaintiffs, (already in possession of the property,) and $50 damages. The defendant appeals upon several grounds, but, from the view which the court takes, it will not be necessary to consider any of them, except the second, which is as follows: "Because the circuit judge erred in allowing the plaintiff, over specific objections, to swear that he was damaged in the sum of $129.93, included in which amount was an itemized statement as to the plaintiff's alleged expenses, as follows: (1) 10 days lost, (computed,) $5 per day; (2) railroad fare, $33; (3) hotel bills, $23; (4) attorneys' fees, ten per cent. on amount recovered, $22."

The complaint does not make any claim for special damage, and the circuit judge charged that the case was not one for vindictive damages; so that it must be considered as a plain and ordinary case for the recovery of personal property, and damages for its detention. "To recover damages for the detention of personal property, (the property having been delivered,) special damage cannot be recovered, unless expressly alleged." Ipscomb v. Tanner, 31 S. C. 49, 9 S. E. Rep. 733. What is this special damage, which cannot be proved without being specifically alleged? There is certainly a lack of clearness in the authorities on the subject, but it seems to us that what are called "general damages," as contradistinguished from "special damages," are admitted in evidence under a general allegation,—indeed, are inferred by the law itself,—for the reason that they are the immediate, direct, and proximate result of the act complained of, as, for instance, an injury to the property itself, or its value, by detention, etc., while damages which, although the natural, are not the necessary, consequence of the act, being outside of the "costs and disbursements" allowed by law, and consequently, in their nature, are not admissible in evidence without special notice of the claim in the allegations of the complaint, are therefore called "special damages." It is elementary that damages, in the ordinary sense, must be the immediate result of the act complained of. See Woods' Mayne, Dam. p. 48, and authorities in the notes. Section 326 of the Code provides that the prevailing party may have taxed and inserted in the judgment "the sum of the allowances for costs and disbursements as prescribed by law—the necessary disbursements, including the fees of officers allowed by law, the fees of witnesses, the reasonable compensation of commissioners in taking depositions, the fees of referees, and the expense of printing the papers for any hearing when required by a rule of the court. The disbursements shall be stated in detail and verified by affidavit," etc. See sections 2425, 2428, Gen. St. It would seem that in an ordinary case, where no special damage is asked for, this provision would limit the compensation allowed by law to the prevailing party, who had already the possession of his property. But it is urged that this action of "claim and delivery" is peculiar, in this: that the law expressly gives to the prevailing party damages in addition to costs and disbursements. It is true that section 283 of the Code provides as follows: "In an action for the recovery of specific personal property, if the property have not been delivered to the plaintiff or if it have, and the defendant by his answer claims a return thereof, the jury shall assess the value of the property, if their verdict be in favor of the plaintiff, or if they find in favor of the defendant, and that he is entitled to a return thereof: and may at the same time assess the damages, if any are claimed in the complaint or answer, which the prevailing party has sustained by reason of the detention or taking and withholding such property," etc. What damages? Why, surely, such damages as may have been sustained by reason of the seizure and detention of the property itself; that is to say, by direct and proximate injury of the property in question, or in reducing its value, and not for the purpose of allowing a party to reimburse himself, as to consequential losses alleged to have been sustained in the prosecution of the case, in respect to the speculative value of time lost, and the payment of the bills of railroads and hotels, lawyers' fees, etc. "The expense incurred by a plaintiff in consulting a solicitor and obtaining a legal opinion upon the validity of his claim is not recoverable as part of the damages. Parties must do what they think right, and the expense of getting the experience of attorneys to advise is not to be repaid by the other party. Nothing of that sort can be allowed in damages, and everything of that nature that a plaintiff is entitled to will be allowed in the taxation of costs." 2 Add. Torts, p. 79. See Welch v. Railroad Co., 12 Rich. Law, 292; Hill v. Thomas, 19 S. C. 236; Oelrichs v. Spain, 15 Wall. 211; Sedg. Dam. p. 99. The Case of Welch and the Railroad Company, from Richmond, was an action on the case to recover against the company damages for a lost trunk; and it was held that a lawyer's fees, which the plaintiff may be required to pay his counsel in the case, is not, in this state, to be allowed by the jury in estimating the plaintiff's damages. Judge O'Neill, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "It cannot be said to be a necessary result of the act done by, or negligence of, the defendant. If this had been a case in which vindictive damage could be given, and the jury had found in gross beyond the value of the article lost, then, indeed, this verdict could not have been disturbed. But in this case there is nothing that calls for such a verdict. It is therefore ordered that a new trial be given, unless the plaintiff shall enter a remittitur," etc. This seems to be precisely in point. In the case of Oelrichs v. Spain, supra, it was held that counsel fees cannot be allowed as part of the damage covered by an injunction bond, and Mr. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "In actions of trespass, where there are no circumstances of aggravation, only compensatory damages can be recovered, and they do not include the fees of counsel. The plaintiff is no more entitled to them, if he succeed, than is the defendant, if the plaintiff be defeated. Why should a distinction be made between them? In certain actions ex delicto, vindictive damages may be given by the jury. In regard to that class of cases this court has said: 'It is true that damages assessed by way of example may indirectly compensate the plaintiff for money expended in counsel fees, but the amount of these fees cannot be taken as a measure of punishment, or a necessary element in its infliction.' The point here in question has never been expressly decided by this court, [United States,] but it is clearly within the reasoning of Day v. Woodworth, 13 How. 370, and we think it is substantially determined by that adjudication. In debt, covenant, and assumpsit, damages are recovered, but counsel fees are never included. So, in equity cases, where there is no injunction bond, only the taxable costs are allowed to the complainants. The same rule is applied to the defendant, however unjust the litigation on the other side, and however large the expensalitis to which he may have been subjected. * * * There is no fixed standard by which the honorarium can be measured. Some counsel demand much more than others. Some clients are willing to pay more than others. More counsel may be employed than are necessary," etc. We regard it as well settled in this state, both by decisions here and in the supreme court of the United States, that counsel fees are not allowable as part of the plaintiff's damages, for the reason that they cannot be said to be the necessary result of the act done by the defendant. It is true that the decided cases do not seem to be as full and clear in reference to the other items of expenditure claimed here as damages. But we confess that, in respect to damages, we are unable to draw a distinction, in principle, between expenses incurred in paying lawyers' fees, and in making a charge for the speculative loss of time, and paying railroad and hotel bills, etc. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and a new trial ordered, unless, within 10 days after notice of this judgment, the plaintiffs or their attorney of record release on the record of this case the verdict for $50 damages, and, thus reduced, that the judgment giving the property to the plaintiffs, with costs and disbursements, be affirmed.

McIVER, C. J., and POPE, J., concur.

CUDD et al. v. WILLIAMS et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 15, 1893.)

REFERENCE — OBJECTION — WAIVER — MARRIED WOMEN — CONTRACT FOR STOCK OF GOODS — VALIDITY.

1. Where, in an action on a contract for the sale of goods, defendants set up fraud, and ask an accounting, it is not error to send the case to a referee.

2. Where parties simply object to a reference, and afterwards attend the references, and give no notice of appeal until the final decision of the court on the referee's report, they will be deemed to have acquiesced in the order.

3. Where the purchaser of goods from a failing debtor sells them to the latter's wife, she cannot set up fraud in the sale by her husband as an excuse for her failure to perform her contract of purchase.

4. A married woman is bound by her contract for the purchase of the interest of her husband's partners in a stock of goods.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; T. B. Fraser, Judge.

Action by Cudd & Roberts against S. B. Williams and T. A. Williams, her husband, to enforce the performance of an alleged parol contract for the sale of certain goods to defendant S. B. Williams. From a judgment for plaintiffs against her, S. B. Williams appeals. Affirmed.

Bomar & Simpson and J. K. Jennings, for appellant. Stanyarne Wilson, for respondents.

McGOWAN, J. S. B. Williams is the wife of her codefendant, T. A. Williams, a merchant of Spartanburg. The action was brought to require the defendants to perform their part of an alleged parol agreement for a lot of goods sold and delivered by the plaintiffs to the defendant Mrs. S. B. Williams for the agreed price of $1,880.20. The testimony is voluminous, (all in the record,) and we think the careful statement made by the master, H. B. Carlisle, Esq., upon reference to him, will sufficiently explain the facts. He states "that in March, 1890, the defendant T. A. Williams, becoming embarrassed and being threatened with suit, sold out his entire stock of goods in bulk to the plaintiffs, Cudd & Roberts. The consideration for the sale was $1,000 in money and $3,000 in notes, to be paid from the sale of the stock of goods. The $4,000 amounted to 50 per cent. of the cost value of the goods, and seems to have been considered by the creditors at the time as a fair price. In addition to the consideration above mentioned, Williams was to have for his services one-half of the profits of the concern, and was to give his time to the business. The business ran on under these arrangements, Cudd & Roberts buying new goods and placing them in the stock to enable them to sell off the old articles more profitably, until the 1st of January, 1891, when an accounting was held, stock taken, and it was found that they had on hand $4,941.86. According to the original trade, one-half of this belonged to Mr. T. A. Williams, and, under contract made at the time with T. A. Williams as agent for Mrs. S. B. Williams, Cudd & Roberts sold her their half of the goods and credits on hand for 75 per cent. of the inventory, amounting to $1,853.50. Besides this, there were some goods overlooked, amounting to $75. This action was brought to enforce this agreement." The defendants answered, claiming, among other things, (1) that the original transaction between T. A. Williams and Cudd & Roberts was fraudulent, and that a court of equity would not interfere in the matter, because they do not come into court with clean hands; (2) that Mrs. Williams is a married woman, and that on that ground she is relieved from any liability; and (3) that, if it should be determined that plaintiffs had any such interest, and that any sum whatever was due to them from the defendant S. B. Williams and T. A. Williams, as her agent, then these defendants say that there should be a full accounting between them and the said plaintiffs, and on such accounting defendants say that there will be due them a considerable sum of money. Further answering, these defendants allege by way of counterclaim—in case an accounting is refused in this action—that plaintiffs are justly indebted in the sum of $500 to the defendant S. B. Williams, etc. Wherefore the defendants demand that the complaint be dismissed, or, failing in that, that the accounting be had between plaintiffs and defendants, and that plaintiffs be required to pay such sum as may be found due on such accounting, etc.

It seems that the case first came up before his honor, Judge Kershaw, who on August 10, 1891, granted an order (the defendants' attorneys objecting) that it be "referred to the master to take the testimony herein, to hear and determine the issues of law and of fact, and make his report to this court, and that all parties be allowed to except thereto." There was no appeal taken at that time from the order of reference, but under it the master held references, the attorneys of the defendants being present, offering testimony, and arguing the cause.

The master made his report, recommending that the defendants be required to perform their contract by paying the amount claimed in the complaint. No exception was made to this report, upon the ground that the order referring the case was illegal and void. The exceptions to this report were heard by his honor, Judge Fraser, who held as follows: "One of the questions raised before me at the hearing was as to the right to refer this case 'to the master to hear and determine the issues of law and fact, though not among the exceptions to the master's report.' Whether this is a law case—as I am inclined to think it is—or a case on the equity side of the court, I have no right now to consider the validity of the order of reference made August 10, 1891. I cannot review the order made by my predecessor." He sustained the exceptions as to the liability of the husband T. A. Williams, and overruled them as to Mrs. S. B. Williams, and thereupon ordered and adjudged that the plaintiffs have leave to enter up judgment against the defendant Mrs. S. B. Williams for the sum of $1,880.20, and that the complaint be dismissed as to the defendant T. A. Williams. From this decree the defendant Mrs. Williams gave notice of appeal from the order of Judge Kershaw referring the case to the master, and also from the decree of Judge Fraser on the merits, and will ask a reversal or modification of the decree on the following grounds: "(1) That his honor, Judge Kershaw, erred in ordering said cause referred to the master, over the objections of the defendant. (2) That his honor, Judge Fraser, erred in holding that he had no right to consider the validity of the order of reference made by Judge Kershaw, and in not ordering an issue to a jury, as asked for by defendant. (3) In holding that there was no sufficient evidence of fraud in the transactions between plaintiffs and T. A. Williams. (4) In holding, even if there was fraud in such transactions, only the creditors of T. A. Williams could take advantage of it, and that the defendant could not set it up as a defense in this case. (5) In not holding that there was no consideration for the alleged contract between the plaintiffs and defendant, and that she was not bound thereby. (6) In not holding that, being a married woman, defendant had no right or capacity to make any such contract, and that she is not bound thereby," etc.

Exceptions 1 and 2 make the first question, whether the plaintiffs had the right to have the case referred to the master, over the objection of defendants. Was it a law case or a suit in chancery? At the time the question was made before Judge Kershaw the only guide in the matter was the pleadings, and it seems to us that the answer of the defendants in setting up fraud on the part of the plaintiffs in the transaction out of which their claim arose, and in claiming an account in reference thereto, presented fen-tures of equitable cognizance, which would have authorized the old court of equity to take jurisdiction of the case. We cannot say that his honor, Judge Kershaw, should have regarded this as "an action either for the recovery of money only or of specific real or personal property." See Pelzer v. Hughes, 27 S. C. 418, 3 S. E. Rep. 781. Besides, while the defendants did object to the order of reference when made, we fail to find in the record that they gave notice of appeal therefrom, which they might have done; but, on the contrary, they seem to have acquiesced in the order, by attending references under it, examining witnesses, and arguing the case at every stage down to the final decision below, when for the first time they gave notice of appeal, not only from the judgment of his honor, Judge Fraser, on the merits, but also from Judge Kershaw's previous order of reference. Of course it is quite clear that Judge Fraser did not err in refusing to set aside Judge Kershaw's order referring the case, for the double reason that no such exception was before him, and also that he did not have the power to set aside the order of his predecessor. No motion was made before him for "issues from chancery," and, if there had been, it was discretionary with him whether he would grant them. Rollin v. Whipper, 17 S. C. 32.

Exceptions 3 and 4 make the point that Mrs. Williams cannot be made liable upon her contract to pay for the goods, for the reason that the goods sold to her by the plaintiffs arose out of a fraudulent transaction with her husband. We agree with the circuit judge that there is no sufficient evidence of fraud in the prior transactions between the plaintiffs and the defendant T. A. Williams. Mrs. Williams received the goods as her own property, and why should she not be made to pay for them according to contract? But if there was fraud in the prior transactions of her husband with the plaintiffs, Mrs. Williams had no connection with it. The fraud alleged was only against the creditors of Williams, and, as we understand it, no such creditor is here complaining. If the plaintiffs acquired the goods improperly, we cannot see how that should furnish Mrs. Williams an excuse for the violation of her agreement to pay for them.

Exceptions 5 and 6 complain that Judge Fraser erred in not holding that, being a married woman, the defendant had no right or capacity to make any such contract, and that she is not bound thereby." We agree with the circuit judge that there is nothing in our cases which holds that a married woman may not purchase the share of one or more joint tenants or tenants in common, even if the other interests are held by the husband. The husband and wife may make partition if they so desire, but the formation of a partnership instead thereof is a matter with which the seller has nothing to do and cannot control. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

MURRAY v. AIKEN MINING & PORCELAIN MANUF'G CO. et al.

RES JUDICATA—SECOND APPEAL—INTEREST—COSTS OF APPEAL.

1. On appeal in a case involving the liability of a surety company for the default of an officer of a corporation, the supreme court modified the judgment below, and held the surety company liable for the amount of its bond, less a certain sum due to the officer from the corporation, but the matter of interest was not mentioned in the supreme court judgment. Held, on a second appeal, that the subject of interest on the amount recovered was not res judicata.

2. In such case the interest should be allowed on the amount of the officer's default from the time it was demanded and refused.

3. In an action to settle the affairs of an insolvent corporation there was a controversy between a surety company and a bank which claimed as assignee of a bond by the surety company to the corporation guarantying the fidelity of its officer. Both were defendants to the original suit, and the bank appealed from the judgment, which held that the surety company was not liable to the bank, and obtained a modification holding that the surety was liable, although not for the full amount of the penalty, a set-off being allowed. Held, that the bank was the "prevailing party," within Code S. C. § 323, and the costs of appeal were properly taxed to the Fidelity Company instead of to plaintiff in the original suit.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; T. B. Fraser, Judge.

For statement of facts, see former appeal, 16 S. E. Rep. 143.

Croft & Chafee, for appellant Fidelity & Casualty Co. Lord & Burke, for respondent Bank of New York National Banking Ass'n.

McGOWAN, J. This case has been in this court before. 16 S. E. Rep. 143. The following is a statement of case for the supreme court: It was commenced for the purpose of settling the affairs of the Aiken Mining & Porcelain Manufacturing Company, an insolvent corporation. The answers in the cause presented a controversy between two of the defendants therein, viz. appellant and respondent above named, in regard to the liability of the former to the latter, claiming as assignee the benefit of the bond of the former to the said insolvent company, guarantying the fidelity of its secretary and treasurer. The decree of the circuit court, made July 23, 1891, was adverse to the respondent herein, the Bank of New York, who thereupon appealed to the supreme court. The supreme court, on November 7, 1892, made a decree setting out fully the said controversy, modifying the circuit decree in regard to the con-troversey in favor of the said respondent, the Bank of New York. The decision concludes as follows: "Now, therefore, under the terms of its contract, the defendant Fidelity Company must be prepared to answer for the default of the assured, but there must be this limitation thrown about its liability, namely, it must only be required to pay the difference between $6,000 and the sum of $2,065.24; that is to say, it must pay the sum of $3,934.76. It is proper that we should explain this result. This is an equity suit, and therefore we must apply its principles. When $6,000 of the money of the Aiken Company passed into the hands of its secretary and treasurer, that corporation was his debtor in the sum of $2,065.24, and upon the principles advanced in the case of Bank v. Heyward, 15 S. C. 296, we think this result will follow. In the case last cited the teller was dismissed from his office, and on his settlement with the bank retained from the funds in his hands the amount he conceived the bank owed him as a salary for the year, $1,500; but it was determined that only $250 was due him, and judgment was duly proved against him for $1,250. Here the secretary and treasurer was dismissed from his office. He claimed, though, that the company was his debtor, and in this very action the amount he claimed of the company has been allowed him. * * * It is the judgment of this court that the decree of the circuit court shall be modified on the principles herein announced, and in all other respects confirmed. Let the cause be remanded to the circuit court, with directions to carry into effect the modification herein provided." The appellants herein, the Security Company, then paid the sum of $3,934.76, without prejudice of the latter to its claim for appeal costs and disbursements and interest on said sum of $3,934.76. The amount of such costs of appeal and disbursements were taxed by the clerk at $224.90, and there is no dispute as to items and amounts. The clerk, however, decided that these costs should be taxed against Murray, the plaintiff in the original case, as follows: "The Bank of New York and the Fidelity and Casualty Company were parties defendant. The case was tried in the court of common pleas, and afterwards on appeal by the supreme court. The Bank of New York to some extent reversed the decision of the circuit court. It is now claimed by the Bank of New York that its codefendant, the Fidelity and Casualty Company, should pay the costs and disbursements incident to the appeal. The Fidelity and Casualty Company deny their liability to pay said costs. The case is one in equity. J. E. Murray is the plaintiff, and certainly one of the principal parties to the action. He brought the action, and it seems plain to me that he should pay the costs, and I so adjudge. There is nothing either in the circuit decree or in the opinion of the supreme court which adjudges that the Fidelity Company should pay the costs to their codefendants, the Bank of New York. I therefore fail to see what right the Bank of New York has to claim that such company should pay the costs; hence I decline to tax the costs against said company, but, as above stated, do adjudge that the costs be taxed against the plaintiff. No dispute is made as to the amount of the costs and disbursements, and they are taxed as follows, to wit:

"Disbursements.

Paid clerk of court for copy served..	$ 7 65
Walker, Evans & Cogswell for printing record	140 00
Preparing case	10 00
Appeal to supreme court.....	15 00
Argument in supreme court.....	20 00
Printing argument for supreme court	31 95

The Bank of New York filed the following exceptions to said taxation: "(1) That the clerk erred in finding that the said costs and disbursements should be taxed against the plaintiff, because they all grow out of and belong to a controversy between two of the defendants, to wit, the Fidelity, etc., Co., and the Bank of New York, and the case in the supreme court was substantially between these parties alone. (2) That the clerk erred in not holding that said costs and disbursements should be taxed in favor of said bank and against said Fidelity Company, for the aforesaid reason, and because the said last-named company was the losing party on said appeal." Thereupon the cause was again brought before the circuit court of common pleas for Aiken county, his honor, Judge Fraser, presiding, who held: (1) That the Bank of New York was entitled to recover against Murray interest on $3,934.76 from September 26, 1888, when he was directed to deposit the money in the Aiken Bank, and refused to do so, to January 18, 1893. This amount, calculated at 7 per cent., would amount to $1,192.10, but the liability of the Fidelity Company is limited to so much of the interest as will, with the amount already paid, amount to $5,000,—that is to say, $1,065.24. And (2) his honor held as follows, in reference to the question as to who was liable for the appeal costs: "The Fidelity and Casualty Company was not an original party to the bill. In the progress of the case, and upon its own application, the company was made a party, 'for the purpose of defending its own liability' under the bond which it had given to the Aiken Company for the conduct of Murray. By the same order the Bank of New York (to whom this bond had been assigned) was also made a party, for the purpose of asserting its rights. Thenceforward the litigation was confined almost exclusively to those parties. The decision on circuit was in favor of the Fidelity Company against the bank, and from this decision the bank alone appealed. The only respondent, as the record shows, who took an active part in the contest before the supreme court, was the Fidelity Company. While, upon some minor points, the appeal was overruled, the bank succeeded in reversing and modifying the decree in the most important particulars. In no respect was it modified in favor of the Fidelity Company. I am of opinion that the bank is entitled to the appeal costs, because it must be regarded as the prevailing party on the appeal; and that the Fidelity Company should pay these costs, because the decision was against them as active litigants."

From this decree and decision as to costs the Fidelity & Casualty Company appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: "(1) Because his honor should have sustained the order of the clerk taxing the costs against the Bank of New York, and he erred in not so doing. (2) Because the supreme court in its decision did not reverse the decree of Judge Norton, but only modified it, and it did not follow as matter of law that the costs were thereby thrown against the Fidelity Company; but, to the contrary, it would follow, under such circumstances, that the Fidelity Company was not liable for costs, and his honor erred in not so holding. (3) Because the supreme court in its decision fixed the amount of the liability of the Fidelity Company, and did not allow interest upon the same, and it is respectfully submitted that the circuit judge erred by increasing such liability by adding interest thereto. (4) Because it is submitted the liability of the Fidelity Company upon its bond was not known until fixed by the supreme court, and that said defendant is not liable for interest upon such before the same was ascertained, and the circuit judge erred in so deciding. (5) Because the extent of the liability of the Fidelity Company upon its bond was specifically stated in the decision of the supreme court, such question is therefore res adjudicata, and it was error in the circuit court in reopening and passing upon the same," etc.

In the view which the court takes there are really but two questions in the case:

First. "Was it proper to charge the Fidelity Company with the interest on the $3,934.76, after it was demanded from the Aiken Company? or is that question res adjudicata?" It is true that the supreme court, in its first decision in the case, (16 S. E. Rep. 148,) did not expressly declare that the amount of Murray's default should bear interest from the time it was demanded and refused; but such was then and now is the law. See Bank v. Heyward, 15 S. C. 296, in which the recovery was had for the amount of the default, with interest as an incident added thereto. It is impossible to suppose that the supreme court intended by their silence as to interest to overrule in any particular the very case cited as authority for the decision then being rendered. It is, however, insisted that the former judgment of this court, which reversed the first judgment on the circuit, without making any reference whatever to the interest on the amount recovered, must be regarded as in legal effect a final adjudication of the incidental question of interest; that it was, indeed, equivalent to an express adjudication that the bank, as the assignee of the bond in contention, was not entitled to interest on the amount recovered. We cannot accept this view. It is quite clear that the question of interest was never before Judge Norton, nor before this court on appeal, and of course was never actually adjudicated. On the contrary, we agree with Judge Fraser that the matter of interest was never considered, and that by using the figures this court did not intend to fix definitely the amount to be paid by the Fidelity Company, but to fix the principles which must be applied in ascertaining that amount when the case went back to the circuit, under the express terms of the judgment of the court: "Let the case be remanded to the circuit court, with directions to carry into effect the modification herein provided." See Jones v. Massey, 14 S. C. 307, and Busby v. Mitchell, 29 S. C. 447, 7 S. E. Rep. 613.

Second. The other question is whether it was proper to charge the Fidelity Company with the costs of the appeal. In cases in chancery costs are largely in the discretion of the circuit judge who heard the case, but, if not otherwise ordered in the judgment, follow the event of the action, and are taxed against "the losing party." Code, § 323. Judge Norton, who originally heard the case, made no order, of course, as to costs upon appeal from his own decree, and the supreme court can make no original order for costs in an equity case. Then was it error on the part of the circuit judge to reverse the clerk's taxation of the costs upon the first appeal, and charge them to the Fidelity Company? That must depend upon the issue in that appeal, and "the losing party" in it. There is no doubt that the principal issue on the appeal was between the Bank of New York, as the owner of the indemnity bond, and the Fidelity Company, as to their liability thereon. That question was substantially decided in favor of the bank. The Fidelity Company was held liable on the indemnity bond, and, whether the whole penalty of the bond or a less sum on account of a set-off was recovered, there was a recovery, and they must be considered as the "losing party" on the appeal, irrespective of the final result of the action. Cleveland v. Cohrs, 13 S. C. 397; Huff v. Watkins, 25 S. C. 245; Sease v. Dobson, 36 S. C. 554, 15 S. E. Rep. 703, 704. We agree with the circuit judge that the bank is entitled to the appeal costs, because it must be regarded as the prevailing party on the appeal, and that the Fidelity Company should pay these costs, because it was the only respondent and active litigant in the supreme court, and the decision was against it. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McIVER, C. J., concurs. POPE, J., concurs in the result.

HAMILTON et al. v. TUCKER COUNTY COURT et al.

Sept. 12, 1893.)

COUNTY SEAT — RELOCATION — COUNTY COURT — SPECIAL SESSION — POSTING NOTICE — ENTRY ON RECORD BOOK.

1. Under section 15, c. 39, Code 1891, when an election upon the relocation of a county seat has been held, and the county court has ascertained and declared its result, and entered upon its record book the fact that three-fifths of the votes cast were for relocation at a particular place, that place becomes, by operation of law, from the date of such declaration, the county seat of the county.

2. A special session of a county court can be held legally only after a notice of the time of the session and notice of the purposes for which it is to be held have been posted by the clerk at the front door of the courthouse at least two days before the session.

3. To give such special session jurisdiction in any matter, it must appear upon its record book that such notice was so posted, and also it must appear from such entry in said record book what were the particular purposes for which the special session is held, as stated and specified in such notice.

4. If such entry as is above described is not entered in such record book of such special session, everything which may be done at the special session must be held to be an absolute nullity.

5. Citizens and taxpayers of a county have such an interest in the matter of the relocation of a county seat that they may interpose in proceedings in such matter, and maintain appropriate legal process touching it.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Petition by John Hamilton and others against the county court and sheriff of Tucker county for a writ to prohibit said sheriff from executing an order of said court directing the removal of the records of said county from the town of Parsons to the town of St. George. The circuit court refused the writ. A justice of the supreme court then granted a rule against defendants to show cause to the supreme court why the writ should not issue. Rule made absolute, and writ awarded.

J. P. Scott, A. Jay Valentine, C. O. Strieby, and Dayton & Dayton, for petitioners. L. S. Anvil, A. B. Parsons, and J. Hop. Woods, for respondents.

BRANNON, J. This case involves the location of the county seat of Tucker county. On April 28, 1893, an election was held in Tucker county to obtain the sense of its voters upon the question of the removal of its county seat from St. George to Parsons, and on May 4th the county court canvassed the returns of the election, and declared and entered of record as its result that three-fifths and upwards of the votes cast were in favor of relocation at Parsons. Afterwards, on July 10th, the county court entered an order reciting the former order declaring the result of said election, and reciting that certain persons had tendered a lease for the term of four years of a certain house at Parsons for use as a court-house, and accepting such tender, and then declaring the said house to be the court-house of said county, and the town of Parsons to be the county seat, and ordering the removal of the county records, papers, and property pertaining to the clerk's office to said house at Parsons on the 7th day of August, and directing that bids be asked for such removal. By another order made on the said 10th of July, the court awarded to Poling Bros. the contract for removing such records, papers, etc. On August 1st said contractors, Poling Bros., removed said records, papers, and office property from St. George to Parsons, and placed them in the said house which had been so declared the courthouse of said county. Application was made to the judge of the circuit court for a writ of certiorari to take into the circuit court for review and reversal the order so made by the county court on 4th May, declaring the result of the election to have been in favor of the relocation of the county seat; and, the writ having been refused, a writ of error and supersedeas was allowed by a judge of this court on July 27, 1893, to the order of the circuit court judge refusing such writ of certiorari. On August 7, 1893, at a county court held by two of its members, an order was entered to the effect that the records and furniture belonging to the clerk's offices had been unlawfully removed by persons unknown on the night of the 1st and morning of the 2d of August, 1893, to the town of Parsons, and directing that they be restored and placed in statu quo in the clerk's offices and courthouse in the town of St. George, and commanding that the sheriff forthwith execute the order of restoration. Thereupon John Hamilton and others, on behalf of themselves and all other taxpayers of Tucker county, presented to the judge of the circuit court a petition praying for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the county court and sheriff from executing the last-mentioned order of the county court requiring such records, papers, and furniture to be restored to St. George; and, upon its refusal by the circuit judge, a judge of this court awarded a rule against said county court and sheriff to show cause to this court why the writ of prohibition should not issue; and, the county court and sheriff having tendered their answer to said rule, the petitioners objected to its being filed, and demurred to it as insufficient to prevent such writ of prohibition. This answer itself demurs to the petition asking the prohibition, and we are required to say whether it calls for the writ of prohibition. We think it does. It shows that an election was held upon the relocation of the county seat, and that the county court declared and entered of record that more than the requisite three-fifths of the votes were in favor of removal and relocation at Parsons, and that it declared Parsons to be the county seat, if that were necessary to make it such, and that a particular building there was the lawful courthouse. The statute relating to the subject of removal of county seats (section 15, c. 39, Code 1891) declares that, "if three-fifths of all the votes cast at such election upon the question be in favor of relocation at either of the places voted for, the said county court shall enter an order declaring the place so receiving three-fifths of all the votes cast therefor to be the county seat of said county from and after said date;" and another clause provides that the county court shall examine the certificates of the votes cast at the voting places, and that "said court shall thereupon ascertain and declare the result of said vote, and enter the same of record." Now, when such election has been held, and the county court has ascertained its result, and declared that three-fifths of the votes cast are in favor of relocation at a particular place, and entered the fact in its record book, this place is from the date of such declaration, by operation of law, the county seat. It is the duty of the county court to expressly declare it the county seat; but that is directory in the statute, and if it has declared the result of the election, and that the requisite three-fifths vote is in favor of relocation at a particular place, that alone, in law, removes the county seat to the new place; otherwise, the popular will would be defeated. The statute plainly means that if three-fifths of the voters vote for the relocation, and it be so found and declared and entered by the county court, from that date—the date of such declaration—the new point is the county seat. In one clause the statute provides for the ascertainment by the county court whether a three-fifths vote has been cast for relocation, and by another clause it enacts that, if such vote has been cast, the place receiving such vote shall thenceforth be the county seat. It is the vote when so ascertained to be a three-fifths vote that works the change. All else is directory or ministerial. Having made the provisions adverted to, the statute, in other clauses, goes on to direct the court, as soon as practicable, to cause the records, papers, and property to be removed to the new county seat; but that is simply ministerial,—simply something done to enable business to be carried on at the new point. Whether the records are there or not, it is the legal county seat. Thus, when, on May 4th, the county court declared that three-fifths of the votes had been cast for relocation at Parsons, and at least when, on the 10th July, it declared the county seat to be at Parsons, and a particular building there to be the courthouse, Parsons became the county seat, and St. George ceased to be, and the functions of the county court touching the relocation were at an end. It had fully exercised its jurisdiction. It had only to remove the records from a place which was no longer the county seat to one that had taken its place. Do you think that after all this a circuit or county court could lawfully sit at St. George? I do not. And just here I will say that the order of restoration was made at St. George, as the notice for the special term shows. Our Code (section 6, c. 114) requires circuit and county courts to sit at the courthouse. Judicial proceedings at a place not appointed by law are null and void, because the court there sitting is not a court, but usurps jurisdiction, especially as our Code, c. 39, § 6, requires the county court to sit at the courthouse. 1 Black, Judgm. § 177. It seems to me that this also is a reason why a writ of prohibition should issue.

How are we to regard the county court's order of the 7th of August? If as an attempt to restore the county seat to St. George, it was without jurisdiction. If as a recognition of St. George as still the county seat, it was without jurisdiction, since it had no such matter to deal with, because, for reasons just stated, St. George had ceased to be, and Parsons had become fully, the county seat. In such light, as based on the theory that St. George was yet the county seat, we must regard this order, and as such it was without jurisdiction. If we are to regard the order as not touching the county seat, but as dealing only with the records and papers pertaining to the courts, then we find the county court, not because of war or other emergency, removing such records from the lawful county seat and courthouse, where the law commanded them to be kept, where the clerks were compelled under their bonds to keep and preserve them, without any circumstances calling upon them in law to make such removal; removing not only county court records, but circuit court records,—all the records,—without authority or jurisdiction. On the 7th of August these records were at Parsons, removed thither by Poling Bros., under their contract to remove them. No matter now that they were removed before the date fixed for their removal. The substance of the order of 10th of July was to make the removal. The appointment of a day for removal was only directory, and, though the removal was before the date fixed, that did not make the act of removal after it had been done a nullity. On the 7th of August (the very day fixed by the court for removal) they were, as a matter of fact, at Parsons, and on that same day the county court orders them restored to St. George, in the face of its order to remove them to Parsons,—the one order being just what the statute commanded, and now fully executed by its chosen agents; the other utterly without lawful authority.

The award of the writ of error to the order of the judge of the circuit court refusing a certiorari could not justify the order of the county court. The bond to perfect the writ of error and the process had not been given or issued when the records reached Parsons; and, moreover, it was a writ of error and supersedeas to an order of the circuit judge refusing the writ of certiorari. Its only effect likely would be to determine whether the circuit judge had erred in refusing the certiorari, and, if he had, the order of this court upon the writ of error would be, not even then to award the certiorari, but to remand the case to the circuit court, with mandate to it to award the writ of certiorari; and then, and not till then, would the record of the county court's action touching the election be removed from it so as to determine whether there was error therein, since this court upon the writ of error acts only on the petition for the writ of certiorari. This will appear from the action and opinions in Chenoweth v. Commissioners, 26 W. Va. 230, and Welch v. County Court, 29 W. Va. 63, 1 S. E. Rep. 337. An injunction might lie to restrain the execution of orders against which certiorari is sought until a decision determining whether it should issue or not.

Another decisive reason for holding the order of the county court restoring the records to St. George void for want of jurisdiction lies in the fact that it was made at a special term, and the record of its proceedings does not show the purpose for which the special term was called. Mayer v. Adams, 27 W. Va. 244, holds that, to give a special session of the county court any jurisdiction in any matter, it must appear, not only that notice of it was posted, but "it must also appear from such entry on its record book what were the purposes for which the special session was to be held as stated in said notice, and that, if such entry is not made in the record book, everything done as such special session must be held an absolute nullity," for want of jurisdiction, because jurisdictional facts in courts of limited and special jurisdiction must appear on its record.

Another reason justifying a prohibition, as it seems to me, is this: The order of 10th of July, directing the removal of the records, was executed on 1st of August. It had worked its legal effect. The records were at Parsons on the 4th of August, when the writ of error and supersedeas took effect; and, if that writ could restrain the execution of the county court's orders, it could not reverse the act of removal already done; and a writ of prohibition ought to go to maintain the status existing at the time when the writ of error and supersedeas took effect until a decision of that writ should be had. For these reasons I think the petition shows ground for a writ of prohibition.

The answer relies on the fact that the order of 10th July was not an unconditional order declaring Parsons and the building there the county seat and courthouse, but contained a proviso that, if the building should not be completed by the date fixed by it for removal of the records, the order should be void, and on the fact that the building was not then completed. So far as concerns the county seat, Parsons had before this become such. The statute required the court to declare it the county seat, and no more, and it could not add a condition. So far as it concerns the records, we know they were removed and placed in that building. It was thus partly completed. The defendants show that fact. How far incomplete we do not know. Would the want of a door or shelf justify the removal of the records from it? Surely not. Even the condition in the order of 10th July would not be construed to mean that. It cannot be that a building of brick or stone or any completed building must exist before a relocation can be voted by the people, or their vote carried into execution by a removal of the records. Must they build beforehand? To provide a suitable place for the courts and records is a matter for future provision by the county court, under other statute provisions. Section 14, c. 39, Code, commands the county court to provide, at the county seat, suitable courthouse, jail, and offices for clerks, and the clerks are to keep the records and papers in such offices, as provided by section 9. By what right could the court move these records eight miles away from the county seat? Mere insufficiency of the courthouse would not justify it, for the statute provides a remedy for that, not by removal of the records miles away, but by providing a sufficient building; and an answer to this ground for removal of the records back to St. George lies in the fact that, in its order of 10th July, the county court declared that it appeared to the court from inspection and otherwise that the buildings at Parsons tendered to the county were adequate and sufficient for the purpose of clerk's offices for the records of the county and circuit courts and all other public purposes for which a courthouse is directed by statute to be used. The restoration was not based on that ground, but on the theory that, pending the writ of error, St. George was the county seat, or that the removal was premature.

The answer makes the point that the petitioners are in contempt of this court, because, after a judge of this court had awarded a writ of error and supersedeas to the order of the circuit judge refusing a writ of certiorari to the action of the county court declaring the result of the election in favor of Parsons, said petitioners, in disregard of said writ of error and supersedeas, removed said records from St. George, and that, being in contempt, they cannot be heard in this case. We regard the point untenable, (1) because the supersedeas was simply to a negative order of the circuit judge refusing a writ of certiorari, and, for reasons above stated, likely did not of itself operate as a supersedeas to the county court orders, like a supersedeas accompanying a writ of certiorari under Code, c. 110, § 6; (2) because process and bond were not issued and given until after the removal, and thus the writ had not become operative; (3) because, if it be law that in a direct proceeding for contempt the party will not be heard until he purges himself of contempt, certainly the party would not be precluded from prosecuting a separate civil proceeding like this proceeding. Would he be denied all remedial civil process?

It is argued that, as the county court has jurisdiction of the matter of the relocation of a county seat, a prohibition ought not to issue, as that lies only when a tribunal is acting without jurisdiction. It is true that a county court has jurisdiction and power over this subject for certain purposes limited and originated by the statute; but, for reasons above stated, it was acting without any jurisdiction; and besides, conceding its jurisdiction, it was exceeding its legitimate powers, and abusing its jurisdiction, which statute and common law make a ground of prohibition. Code 1891, c. 110, § 1; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134.

It is urged in argument that petitioners are merely citizens and taxpayers, and have no such interest as entitles them to ask this prohibition, and we are referred to County Court v. Boreman, 34 W. Va. 87, 11 S. E. Rep. 747. That was a proceeding to alter a road. In this case, who would interfere to prevent the improper removal of the county seat or records but citizens and taxpayers? It concerned public interest, and affected them as citizens and taxpayers. Cases in this court will show that citizens and taxpayers have such interest as will authorize them to sue touching the location of a county seat. In Welch v. County Court, 29 W. Va. 63, 1 S. E. Rep. 337, they were allowed to prosecute a certiorari to orders of a county court in a matter of relocation of the county seat. True, they had appeared in the county court; but, if they had no interest, they could neither appear nor have a certiorari. So, in Poteet v. Commissioners, 30 W. Va. 58, 3 S. E. Rep. 97, taxpayers and voters were allowed to appear, and contest validity of returns of an election touching the county seat, and have remedial process as such. In Armstrong v. County Court, 15 W. Va. 190, citizens and taxpayers were allowed prohibition against the action of a county reducing taxes on a railroad. We conclude that the answer presents no matter to discharge the rule. For these reasons the rule is made absolute, and the writ of prohibition is awarded.

BRUNSWICK LIGHT & WATER CO. v.
GALE et ux.

GALE et ux. v. BRUNSWICK LIGHT &
WATER CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 24, 1893.)

NEW TRIAL—FILING BRIEF OF EVIDENCE—MARRIED WOMEN—PERSONAL INJURIES—DAMAGES—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—REMITTITUR OF DAMAGES.

1. Under the act of November 12, 1889, amending section 3719 of the Code, when the term of court continues longer than 30 days after a trial is had, the expiration of the 30 days is the end of the term for that case, so far as an application for a new trial and filing a brief of evidence are concerned. The prior law was left unchanged in every other respect, and consequently the power of the court to grant by special order, passed within the 30 days, further time for filing the brief of evidence, was not taken away or affected.

2. The action being by a married woman for physical injuries and their consequences, the terms of section 3067 of the Code are not literally applicable to the same, but the principle of the section, except as to proving the worldly circumstances of the parties, is applicable. Inasmuch as the earnings of the wife belong to her husband, her individual and personal damages can be measured only by the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury.

3. If the plaintiff fell into the hole referred to and described in her declaration, and that hole was caused by the defendant's negligence, and if she could not have avoided it by the exercise of ordinary diligence, she might recover; but if the hole into which she fell was a different one from that described in the declaration, or if it was not caused by the defendant's negligence, or if she could have avoided it by the use of ordinary diligence, she could not recover.

4. That some boys pointed out a hole to the plaintiff's husband, and said it was the one into which the plaintiff fell, and that the husband afterwards pointed out the same to another witness, and said it was the hole into which his wife fell, is not competent evidence; but that a hole was found and examined by the witnesses at the street intersection where the plaintiff testified the hole was would be competent evidence, it not appearing that there was more than one hole at this street intersection. It would be a question for the jury whether all the testimony referred to the same hole.

5. The court having charged the jury as to the effect of a failure by the plaintiff to exercise ordinary care, there was no error in declining to charge as requested in the 18th, 19th, and 20th grounds of the motion.

6. The court having determined that the ground in the motion for a new trial complaining that the damages found by the jury were excessive was well taken, it was error not to grant a new trial unconditionally, there being in the evidence no guide or criterion by which the court could determine the amount which should be written off. Railway Co. v. Harper, 70 Ga. 119.

Error from superior court, Glynn county; J. L. Sweat, Judge.

Action by Frank P. Gale and wife against the Brunswick Light & Water Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant brings error. Plaintiffs bring a cross bill of exceptions. Reversed as to main bill of exceptions. Affirmed as to cross bill.

Harris & Sparks, Mershon & Smith, and Spencer R. Atkinson, for plaintiffs. Courtland Symmes and J. H. Lumpkin, for defendant.

SIMMONS, J. 1. In some counties of this state the sessions of the superior court last for several months. Formerly, under the Code, a party desirous of moving for a new trial had until the end of the term at which the case was tried to make his motion and file his brief of evidence; and the court then had power, by special order granted in term, to extend the hearing to a day in vacation. The successful party on the trial was often compelled to wait until the end of the term to ascertain whether there would be a motion for a new trial or not. To prevent this long delay in applications for a new trial, the legislature, by the act approved November 12, 1889, (Acts 1889, p. 83,) amended the Code by declaring that "when said term continues longer than thirty days, said application shall be filed within thirty days from said trial, together with a brief of evidence, as provided by law, subject to the approval of the judge, subject to the same right of amendment as is now allowed in applications for a new trial," etc. Properly construed, this act means that the term of the court, unless sooner adjourned, ends as to the particular case at the expiration of 30 days from the trial, so far as the application for a new trial and the filing of a brief of evidence are concerned. If the losing party fails within that time to file his application for a new trial, the term of the court is closed as to him the same as if it had adjourned. The old law required the losing party to make his application for a new trial during the term in which the trial was had, except in extraordinary cases, and if he failed to move during the term he was remediless; but if he made his motion during the term he could ask the judge for an order granting him further time in vacation to perfect his motion and file his brief of evidence. So, under the new law, if he fails to move in 30 days after the trial, he is barred; but if he makes his motion within the 30 days he still can ask the judge for further time in which to perfect his motion and file his brief of evidence, and the judge still has power to grant the application. In this respect the act of 1889 does not change the prior law. It appearing in this case that the motion for a new trial was filed within 30 days from the trial, the court had the right to order, as he did, that further time be allowed for filing the brief of evidence. The motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial on the ground that the brief of evidence was not filed within 30 days from the trial was therefore properly overruled.

2. The action was for damages from personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff Mrs. Gale from the giving way of earth under her while walking upon a public street of the city, causing her to fall into a hole, this resulting from the negligence of the defendant in replacing the earth over a place where a ditch had been dug for the purpose of laying piping therein. The court, in charging the jury, read from section 3067 of the Code that part of it which declares that "in some torts the entire injury is to the peace, happiness, and feeling of the plaintiff. In such cases no measure of damages can be prescribed except the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors." It was error to give in charge this section of the Code as applicable to the case under consideration, for it is only applicable as a whole to that class of cases where the entire injury is to the peace, happiness, or feelings of the plaintiff. But where, as in this case, a married woman sues for physical injuries and the pain and suffering resulting therefrom, and cannot recover for loss of earnings, medical attention, etc., the principle of the section is applicable, inasmuch as her damages can be measured only by the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury. She is not allowed, however, to prove, nor can the jury take into consideration, as provided by this section, the worldly circumstances of the parties, the amount of bad faith in the transaction, etc. Railroad Co. v. Homer, 73 Ga. 251.

3, 4, 5. Other grounds of the motion for a new trial which are ruled upon in the 3d, 4th, and 5th headnotes, do not require further discussion.

6. The jury returned a verdict for $10,000 damages. The court ordered a new trial, unless the plaintiff would write off from the verdict $2,500. In a case of this kind, as we have said, where the action is for a personal injury and for pain and suffering resulting therefrom, and there are no other elements of damage for which a recovery can be had, such as loss of earning capacity, etc., there is no guide or criterion by which the amount of damages may be measured except the enlightened conscience of impartial jurors. There is no criterion, therefore, by which the court can estimate the proper amount of damages, and he has no power to reduce the verdict by ordering a certain amount written off. If the verdict is so excessive as to cause him to suspect bias or prejudice, he can set it aside, and order a new trial before another jury; but he must do this unconditionally. In actions on contracts, or for torts to property, in relation to which some fixed rules for the measure of damages are recognized, he may order a certain amount written off; and in an action for the homicide of a person, where the value of a life may be shown, according to certain recognized rules, he might perhaps have power to reduce an excessive verdict to an amount which would be proper under the proof. Railway Co. v. Harper, 70 Ga. 119. And see Railroad Co. v. Crosby, 74 Ga. 739. Judgment on the main bill of exceptions reversed, and on the cross bill affirmed.

WHITE v. MOSS et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 26, 1893.)

ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—COMMENCEMENT AND RENEWAL OF ACTION—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An objection to the admission of evidence which does not state what the evidence was, and only refers to it as being found upon certain pages of the record, cannot be considered.

2. Where an action of ejectment has been brought in the name of two persons as joint plaintiffs, and has been dismissed, a subsequent action of ejectment for the same land against the same defendant, brought by only one of the former joint plaintiffs, is not a recommencement of the former action.

3. Admissions made by a person, while owner of five-sixths of a tract of land, that the remaining one-sixth belonged to another, are not binding upon bona fide purchasers for value to whom he subsequently sold and conveyed the entire tract, and who had no knowledge or notice of the fact that such admissions had been made by their grantor; they standing now upon his conveyance as color of title, supported by their own personal possession for more than seven years. That the declarant was dead when the case was tried did not make his admissions binding under the circumstances.

4. The motion for a new trial assigning as erroneous a statement made by the court in its charge that the plaintiff had made a certain admission, and it not being alleged in the motion or certified by the court that the admission was not in fact made, it will be assumed that the court correctly stated the admission and its contents.

5. There was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Rabun county; C. J. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Sarah E. White against Moss & Childs to recover an interest in land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Payne & Frye, for plaintiff in error. Pope Barrow, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. The first ground of the motion for a new trial alleged that the court erred in allowing W. D. Young to testify as to statements made to him by one Shearley, and as to statements made to him by one Weeks. What these statements were is not set forth, but, in order to find them, the court is referred to pages 13, 16, and 20 of the record. In giving the numbers of these pages reference was probably had to the original record, for in examining the pages of the transcript sent to this court which bear the above numbers no such statements can be found. Even if the paging of the original record and the transcript corresponded precisely, this court would not undertake to pass upon an assignment of error made in this extremely loose and careless manner. Under the rule that all assignments of error must be plainly and distinctly set forth, it is somewhat remarkable that counsel persist in bringing up questions in the manner indicated. This court has so often ruled that it will not pass upon assignments thus made, we now call attention to the matter for the sole purpose of once more reminding our brethren of the bar that, if they desire the grounds of their motions for new trials to be considered, they must distinctly set out the alleged errors, as the law requires.

2. Under section 2932 of the Code, if a plaintiff shall dismiss his case, and recommence within six months, such renewed case shall stand upon the same footing as to limitation with the original case. It was insisted that this section is applicable to the facts of the case at bar, but in our opinion it is not. It appears that to the September term, 1884, of the superior court of Rabun county an action of ejectment was brought by Sarah E. White and another, as joint plaintiffs, against the same persons who are the defendants to the present action. The former action was dismissed at the September term, 1886, and the present action was begun by Sarah E. White alone on the 12th day of February, 1887. We think it too plain for argument that this last suit is in no proper sense a renewal or recommencement of the former one. No suit by two persons can be the same thing as a suit by one of them; and the law being that, when an action of ejectment is brought by two persons claiming title jointly, a recovery cannot be had by either of them in severalty, it is absolutely clear that the suit in which the plaintiff is now seeking a recovery is not the same action as that in which she formerly sought to recover jointly with another person. The plaintiff must therefore be treated as though her action for the land in dispute had never been begun at all until the date last above mentioned. The effect of this ruling will be briefly stated in the last division of this opinion.

3. The plaintiff's action was brought to recover a tract of land, and by amendments she undertook to set up an equitable cause of action for the recovery of an undivided twelfth interest in the land. Among other things, she sought to show that one Nichols formerly owned five-sixths of this tract, and that while he was such owner he made admissions to the effect that the remaining one-sixth belonged to another. Her contention was that these admissions were binding upon the defendants, to whom Nichols subsequently sold and conveyed the entire tract, although they were bona fide purchasers from him, and had no knowledge or notice of the fact that any such admissions had ever been made by their grantor, and stood upon his conveyance as color of title, supported by their own actual possession for more than seven years. We are at a loss to conjecture upon what principle these admissions, even if made as alleged, could possibly be binding upon the defendants. They bought from one who was apparently the owner of the entire property, with nothing to put them upon notice that this ownership was not real, and in good faith paid for the land in the belief that they were obtaining a perfect title. No title to land would be safe if it could be defeated in this manner. So far as the admissibility of such evidence is concerned, it makes no difference that the person by whom the declarations were made was dead at the time the case was tried. While it is true that the declarations of deceased persons against their interests, and not made with a view to pending litigation, are admissible in evidence in any case where they are relevant and competent, such declarations cannot be received to defeat a title by prescription which has become complete and perfect in persons who never heard of such declarations. If Mr. Nichols had been alive, and at the trial, he could not properly have been permitted to testify to the facts which the plaintiff sought to establish by proof of declarations made by him; and, this being so, the declarations themselves could not be introduced for the purpose of binding the defendants. Had the defendants relied either wholly or partially upon the possession of Nichols, and not exclusively upon their own possession, to raise a prescriptive title, his admissions, made pending his possession, would be evidence against them, whether they had notice of the same or not.

4. In its charge to the jury the court stated as a matter of fact that the plaintiff had made a certain admission. One ground of the motion for a new trial assigns as error the making of this statement, but it is neither alleged in the motion nor certified by the court that the admission was not in fact made. Of course, it would be improper for the court to inform the jury that a party had made an admission which he really had not made; but we cannot assume the correctness of a ground of this sort without a distinct verification by the presiding judge. On the contrary, we are obliged to assume, in the absence of such verification, that the admission was in fact made, and that its contents were fairly stated to the jury.

5. The court was right in refusing to grant a new trial. It is not absolutely clear that the plaintiff made out a prima facie case. In her chain of title was a paper purporting to be a deed from William Beale, by his agent and attorney, James M. Beale, and signed, "James M. Beale, [L. S.] & Attorney for William Beale." This paper was accompanied by no power of attorney from William to James M. Beale, but the plaintiff contended, nevertheless, that it was admissible in evidence as a muniment of title, because it appeared upon its face to have been executed more than 30 years before the trial. The court ruled that it was admissible as color of title only. Under the facts, it was essential to the plaintiff's case that this paper be received as a full and complete deed for all purposes. If the court below was right upon this question, the plaintiff failed to make out her case, because, treating the paper as color of title only, it was not supported by proof of proper possession under it. It is unnecessary, however, to pass upon the question thus made, for it distinctly appears by the undisputed evidence that the defendants in good faith purchased and took actual possession of the land in the summer or fall of 1879 under the deed from Nichols, and that they held adverse, peaceable, and uninterrupted possession under a bona fide claim of right up to the time when the present action was brought,—a period of more than seven years. It is therefore immaterial whether the plaintiff may or may not have had, at some time in the past, and before the bringing of her suit, a good title to the interest she claimed in the land. If she did not, of course she could not recover; and, if she did, that title was defeated by a complete and perfect title by prescription in the defendants. Judgment affirmed.

FORT v. STATE.

INSURANCE—DOING BUSINESS WITHOUT LICENSE—CORPORATIONS—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION.

By the act of October 24, 1887, to regulate the business of insurance, no unincorporated company is required to obtain, or can obtain, from the insurance commissioner a license to transact the business of insurance in this state; and the penalty prescribed in the ninth section of the act for doing or performing any of the acts or things mentioned therein for any insurance company is not applicable unless the company is one incorporated by the laws of this state or some other state or of a foreign government. According to the facts appearing in the record, the Guarantee & Accident Lloyds is a voluntary association, unincorporated, consisting of 100 natural persons. This being so, that company cannot be licensed to transact the business of insurance in this state; and, although there is no statutory authority for it to transact business without a license, a person who, as its agent, assists it in doing so, is not guilty of any offense.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

C. M. Fort was convicted of violating the insurance law by rendering services to an unlicensed company, and brings error. Reversed.

Hall & Hammond, for plaintiff in error. Lewis W. Thomas, J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., and Hillyer & Lee, for the State.

LUMPKIN, J. A careful reading of the act of October 24, 1887, "to regulate the business of insurance in this state, and for other purposes," (Acts 1886-87, p. 113,) will satisfy the reader that the general assembly intended therein to deal only with insurance companies chartered by this state or other states or by a foreign government. The second section of the act requires incorporated insurance companies to procure licenses from the insurance commissioner as a necessary prerequisite to the transaction of the business of insurance in this state; but neither in this section nor in any other portion of the act is there any requirement that an unincorporated insurance company shall obtain a license, or any provision for the granting of a license to such a company. In view of this fact, it may well be doubted if the general assembly had in contemplation the possibility that any insurance company without a charter would be likely to undertake to do business in Georgia; otherwise it is more than probable that the act would either have expressly provided for licensing unincorporated companies, or else have declared in terms that no such company should transact business in this state at all. It is therefore safe to assume that in the general scheme of the act unincorporated companies were entirely overlooked. We are quite certain that the general assembly could not have intended in an indirect manner to make penal the transaction of insurance business by an agent of an insurance company which had not procured a license from the insurance commissioner, when it had made no provision by which the company in question could obtain such license. It would have been much easier and more natural to declare that licenses should not be issued at all to unincorporated companies; and then, in general terms, make it penal for an agent to transact business for any insurance company not entitled by law to receive a license, or to carry on business in this state. Our conclusion, therefore, is that the penalty prescribed in the second paragraph of the ninth section of the act for rendering the services therein mentioned to "any insurance company" is not applicable unless the company is one which has been chartered under the laws of this or some other state or of a foreign government, and this conclusion seems to be sustained not only by the reasons above stated, but is also borne out by the context of the section last mentioned. The following is a copy of so much of that section as is material to the purpose in hand: "That any person who solicits in behalf of any insurance company, or agent of the same, incorporated by the laws of this or any other state or foreign government, or who takes, or transmits, other than for himself, any application for insurance, or any policy of insurance to or from such company, or agent of the same, or who advertises or otherwise gives notice that he will receive or transmit the same, or who shall receive or deliver a policy of insurance of any such company, or who shall examine, or inspect any risk at any time, or receive or collect or transmit any premiums of insurance, or make or forward any diagram of any building or buildings, or do and perform any other act or thing in the making or consummating of any contract of insurance for or with any such insurance company, other than for himself, or who shall examine into or adjust or aid in adjusting any loss for or in behalf of any such company, whether any of such acts shall be done at the instance or request, or by the employment of such insurance company, or of, or by, any broker or other person, shall be held to be the agent of the company for which the act is done or the risk is taken. Any person, who shall do or perform any of the acts or things mentioned for any insurance company, or agent of said company, without such company having first received a certificate of authority from the insurance commissioner of this state, as required by law, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction in any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be punished as provided by section 4310 of the Code of Georgia, and shall also pay a sum equal to the state, county and municipal taxes and licenses required to be paid by insurance companies legally doing business in this state; and it is hereby made the duty of the insurance commissioner to see that all violators of the provisions of this section are prosecuted." It will be observed that the first paragraph undertakes to prescribe who shall be regarded as an agent of an insurance company chartered by the laws of this state or some other state or foreign government, and makes no allusion whatever to an agent of any insurance company of any other kind. The words "such company," "any such company," "any such insurance company," "any such company," and "such insurance company," used in the order stated in the paragraph designated, necessarily refer to an incorporated insurance company of some kind. This will be obvious from a reading of the paragraph. The next paragraph provides that "any person who shall do or perform any of the acts or things mentioned for any insurance company" shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, shall be punished, etc. It will be observed that in the second line of this paragraph the use of the word "such" before the word "company" is omitted. While it is true that the words "any insurance company" are beyond doubt of themselves sufficiently general to cover all insurance companies, whether incorporated or not, they must be construed with reference to the context, and also with due regard to the general scope and purpose of the act. All of the section preceding the words last quoted was indubitably intended to be applicable to agents of incorporated companies only; and the language following these words shows, we think, conclusively that the general assembly intended to make penal the acts of those persons alone who were agents of insurance companies which the law required should obtain certificates of authority from the insurance commissioner of this state, but which had failed to do so; and these companies, as we have seen, could, under the provisions of the act, be incorporated companies only. It therefore seems free from all doubt that the words "any insurance company" must be construed to mean any insurance company having a charter.

The tenth section of the act provides that "any insurance company not incorporated or organized under the laws of this state, desiring to transact business in this state," shall appoint an agent upon whom service can be perfected; and we think that the words just quoted were intended to apply exclusively to incorporated insurance companies, and not to foreign companies having no charter. The proviso to this section declares that its provisions "shall not be construed to alter or amend the laws now of force in this state relative to bringing suits and serving process on foreign corporations doing business in this state." As no reference whatever is here made to foreign companies other than corporations, we are strengthened in the opinion above expressed that in passing the act in question the general assembly did not have in contemplation at all insurance companies which were not incorporated. The evidence in this case showed that the "Guarantee and Accident Lloyds" is a voluntary, unincorporated association, consisting of 100 natural persons. As has been seen, there is no provision of law for granting a license to such a company authorizing it to transact insurance business in this state, nor is there any statutory authority for it to transact business without a license. Nevertheless we are fully satisfied that a person who, as its agent, assists it in conducting its business, is guilty of no criminal offense. We think this conclusion follows legitimately from what has been said, and, in view of the rule that criminal statutes must be strictly construed, there is scarcely any room to doubt its correctness. In our judgment, the whole difficulty arises from the fact that the attention of the general assembly had not been called to the question of dealing with unincorporated insurance companies; otherwise the matter would doubtless have received the proper attention and direction, and we should find in the act now before us such provisions in regard to companies of this kind as the lawmaking power deemed it expedient to make. Whether such companies should be prohibited from transacting business altogether, or, if not, upon what terms and under what penalties they should be permitted to do so, are questions purely for the general assembly. As a court, we can do nothing but enforce the law as we find it. In the present case we are therefore constrained to hold that the conviction of the accused was contrary to law. Judgment reversed.

COCHRAN v. STATE.

KIDNAPPING — FEMALES FOURTEEN YEARS OLD — MARRIAGE.

A female at 14 years of age being by law as competent to contract marriage as one of 18 years or upwards, and the validity of her marriage not depending in any degree upon the consent of her parents or guardians, it is not kidnapping, under section 4368 of the Code, for a man not himself under any disability, to lead, take, or carry her away from her parents, against their will, and without their consent, for the bona fide purpose of marrying her, which marriage is actually consummated, the girl herself freely consenting, and no force or fraud being used by the man either against her or her parents.

Error from superior court, Putnam county; W. F. Jenkins, Judge.

E. A. Cochran was convicted of kidnapping, and brings error. Reversed.

H. A. Jenkins and S. T. Wingfield, for plaintiff in error. H. T. Lewis, Sol. Gen., Jos. S. Turner, and Hines, Shubrick & Felder, for the State.

SIMMONS, J. Under section 1699 of the Code, a female 14 years of age is capable of contracting a valid marriage, and, although the law prescribes a penalty for issuing a license for the marriage of a female under the age of 18 years, unless the written consent of the parent or guardian of the female is produced, it has never, so far as we are informed, been held that the marriage of a female in this state between the ages of 14 and 18 was in the least degree invalid because the license authorizing the marriage had been issued without observing the requirement above mentioned. In other words, a female more than 14 years of age is just as capable of entering into a contract of marriage as an adult, male or female, is of making any kind of a contract; and when she does, freely and voluntarily, make a contract of marriage, it is as valid and as binding upon her as would be such a contract by a woman more than 21 years of age. To the general disability of minors to make binding contracts of any kind, the above-cited section of the Code makes a clear and distinct exception. It follows, therefore, that a female who has arrived at the age of 14 has a legal right to marry. The law imposes a check upon the exercise of this right by providing the safeguard already mentioned with reference to the issuing of a marriage license, but the law does not declare that a marriage is void, or in any manner impeach its validity, when the young woman, notwithstanding the unwillingness of her parents or guardian, and because of a neglect by the ordinary to perform his duty in the premises, succeeds, nevertheless, in getting married. It appeared in the present case that the accused, without practicing any fraud or force, either upon the young lady or her parents, and without any malice, obtained the free and voluntary consent of the lady to run away and marry him; that his only purpose in taking her away was to marry her, and that the marriage was actually consummated. Under these circumstances, we are quite sure that his conviction of the offense of kidnapping, under section 4308 of the Code, was illegal and wrong. That section provides that: "If any person shall forcibly, maliciously, or fraudulently lead, take, or carry away, or decoy or entice away, any child under the age of eighteen years, from its parents or guardian, or against his, her, or their will or wills, and without his, her, or their consent or consents, such person so offending shall be indicted for kidnapping," etc. The terms of this section are very broad, but, in our opinion, they do not cover, nor were they intended to cover, a case of this kind. It may be that the marriage in question was unwise and injudicious. Certainly, it is usually safe for a female of this tender age to respect the wishes and be guided by the judgment of her parents in a matter so serious; but, as the law recognizes the validity of a marriage based upon her consent alone, even when opposed to theirs, we are unable to perceive how the other contracting party can be made a felon by entering with her into a contract which she has, as we have seen, a perfect legal right to make. Since the law makes the child capable of giving her consent to a marriage, this consent must count for something, unless it is procured by improper means. It is fair and legitimate for a man to gain her consent to marry him if he can do so without force or fraud. She would be incapable of consenting to go off with him to work for him, or for purposes of prostitution, or for any other purpose except marriage alone. As to marriage, the law makes her a grown woman, and deals with her as such. It is not for us to say whether or not the law as it now stands sufficiently protects young girls from the consequences of their own folly, or from the wooings of lovers who, though more than sufficiently ardent, are not calculated to make desirable husbands. If any change in the law be needed, it is a matter for the consideration of the lawmaking power. Judgment reversed.

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—DESCRIPTION OF DEVISEES—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. Under a will by which, in one item, the testatrix, a married woman, devised and bequeathed to her husband certain property for his life, and after his death the same to be divided equally between D., H., and the lawful children of G., and by another item directed that the remainder of her property be sold, and the proceeds equally divided between D., H., and the lawful children of G., the children of G., in the distribution of the estate, took per stirpes, and not per capita; it appearing by ~~abundant~~ evidence that D. and H. were sisters, and G. a brother, of the testatrix, all in life and all having children when the will was executed, that the testatrix was very fond of her sisters and of their children and the children of her brother, and had a favorite among the children in each of the three families, and that she did not desire her brother should have any of her property, both on account of his financial embarrassment and of certain conduct in his past life.

2. Parol evidence was admissible to show the circumstances surrounding the testatrix at the time her will was made, in order to arrive at a correct construction thereof.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Jackson county; N. L. Hutchins, Judge.

Bill by M. E. White and others against J. H. Holland, executor of the will of Mary Gilleland, and others, to construe the will. From the decree complainants bring error. Affirmed.

W. I. Pike, for plaintiffs in error. J. B. Estes, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. The substance of the material portions of Mrs. Gilleland's will, and of the evidence showing the circumstances surrounding the testatrix when the will was made, is set forth in the first headnote. We are of the opinion that the testatrix intended that each of her sisters should have one-third, and the children of her brother the remaining one-third, of the property, which was to be divided among them. If we had nothing to guide us but the will itself, the question presented would by no means be free from difficulty, but in the light of the extrinsic evidence there can be little doubt of the correctness of the conclusion we have reached. In 2 Jarm. Wills, p. 750, the doctrine is laid down that where there is a devise or bequest to a given person and the children of another person standing in the same relation to the testator, as to "my son A. and the children of my son B.," A. takes only a share equal to that of one of the children of B.; but the author also says: "This mode of construction will yield to a very faint glimpse of a different intention in the context." See, also, Schouler, Wills, § 540. If the general rule of construction be as stated by these text writers, it would seem that it ought also to yield when there is evidence outside of the will going to show a different intention on the part of the testator. This certainly should afford as good reason for departing from the usual mode of construction as would "a very faint glimpse of a different intention in the context" of the will itself. In the present case it appeared that each of the sisters of the testatrix had a number of children, that she was very fond of her sisters, and also of their children and the children of her brother, and had a favorite among the children in each of the three families, and that she did not desire her brother should have any of her property, both on account of his financial embarrassment and of certain conduct in his past life. These things being so, and there being nothing in the will expressly showing an intention on the part of the testatrix to give the children of her brother an advantage over her sisters, we think it a most natural conclusion that the testatrix intended that her sisters should be equal with the family of her brother in the distribution of her bounty. The fact that the brother of the testatrix was in life when her will was made, and that she excluded him from any benefit under it, in connection with the other facts mentioned, leaves scarcely any room to doubt that by the ruling of the court below, which we have affirmed, the precise result desired by the testatrix has been reached. This is exactly what should be done in construing every will, when it can be accomplished without doing violence to the plain and obvious meaning of its terms, or to some settled rule of law.

As will have been seen, we have, in deciding this case, considered not only the language of the will, but the allunde evidence mentioned, and have not ruled what construction should be given to the will considered by itself. It was strongly urged by the able counsel who appeared for the defendants in error that even in that event the same result should follow. In support of this view he cited Fraser v. Dillon, 78 Ga. 474, 3 S. E. Rep. 695, in which there was a devise to Sarah Mousseau and the children of Leonora Pellertier, and this court held that these children took per stirpes, and not per capita. That case, however, is not precisely in point, because of the fact that Mrs. Pellertier was not in life when the will was made; and undoubtedly, in construing the will of David R. Dillon, this court laid some stress upon the presumption that, in the absence of anything in the will to the contrary, the testator intended that his property should go where the law would carry it by the rules of inheritance; which reasoning is not applicable to the case at bar. The ruling of this court in Mayer v. Hover, 81 Ga. 308, seems to sustain, in principle, the position of the counsel referred to, but it does not appear from the report of that case what were the surroundings of the testator in making his will, or whether or not any aid from them was invoked in construing it. Risk's Appeal, 52 Pa. St. 209, is precisely in point, and supports the contention that under Mrs. Gilleland's will, without reference to extrinsic facts, the children of the brother should take per stirpes. There are, however, respectable authorities to the contrary, and we do not deem it necessary in the present case to decide this question. We prefer to avail ourselves of the allunde facts, because by so doing we are the more certain of reaching the right conclusion.

2. It is well settled that parol evidence is admissible to show the circumstances surrounding a testator at the time of making his will, in order to arrive at a proper construction of its terms, when there is doubt of their true meaning and intention. This was distinctly ruled in Fraser v. Dillon, supra, and will, we think, be accepted as sound law without further argument. Judgment affirmed.

EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. RY. CO. v. KANE.

DEPOSITION—PRESENCE OF WITNESS IN COURT—REJECTING EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR—ACCIDENT AT RAILROAD SWITCH—LIABILITY FOR ACT OF DISCHARGED EMPLOYE—NEGLIGENCE—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a nonresident witness for whom interrogatories had been sued out was in court at the time of the trial, it was error to permit the answers to the interrogatories to be read to the jury over objection of the opposite party, although the witness was in attendance upon the court at the instance of the latter, the witness being actually present when the answers to the interrogatories were offered in evidence.

2. It is not cause for a new trial that the court refused to allow certain questions propounded to witnesses by defendant's counsel to be answered, it not appearing what answers were expected, and in view of other evidence and of admissions in the declaration, no possible answers to these questions being substantially material.

3. Upon the trial of an action against a railroad company for a homicide resulting in part from the misplacement of a switch, it was not error to refuse to allow the defendant to show "the common experience of railroads" in getting back switch keys from their employes, and that all railroads have great difficulty in keeping up with such keys and having them returned by discharged employes because of their real or alleged loss. Nor was there error in refusing to allow defendant to prove "the custom or usage of railroads in reference to providing a watchman for each of their switches," defendant expecting to prove "that the general custom was not to provide a watchman for such switches."

4. Though one of the main issues was whether or not the engineer for whose homicide the action was brought was guilty of negligence in bringing about the collision which resulted in his death, there was no error in refusing to allow the defendant to prove that he "was habitually reckless in running freight trains at excessive speed, and running too fast over switches," the witness' knowledge not extending to more than two or three instances.

5. The defendant may invoke and use allegations beneficial to himself made in plaintiff's declaration without offering the declaration itself in evidence, or otherwise proving the admissions contained in such allegations, and no unfavorable inference can properly be drawn against a corporation because of a failure to call as witnesses its own employes to prove the existence of facts shown by such admissions.

6. The mere fact that a railroad company fails to recover from a discharged employe a key which controls the turning of a switch is not of itself sufficient to make the company liable for the criminal act of such employe in maliciously misplacing a switch for the purpose of wrecking a train. The company is not bound to anticipate that, purely out of revenge for his discharge, a former employe might secretly commit so heinous a crime against it and the public. Nor is the company bound to exercise constant vigilance to prevent all persons whatsoever not in its employ from having the means or opportunity of tampering with its switches or its tracks. Whether or not in any particular case the company exercised the proper degree of care in protecting its switches from interference is a question for the jury, in determining which they may look to the evidence to ascertain if there was any reason for the company to apprehend such interference, and, if so, whether, under all the circumstances, it used due diligence in endeavoring to prevent the same. In its charge to the jury, the court should not state or assume that a given state of facts would show negligence on the part of the company in the respect indicated.

7. A prima facie case of negligence on the part of the defendant, which the plaintiff's declaration covers, cannot be effectually answered by a given state of facts, if those facts involve a breach of diligence by the defendant in a material respect; and such breach of diligence, if shown, may be urged by the plaintiff, not to recover upon, but to defeat the defendant's justification, although no reference to it is made in the plaintiff's pleadings.

8. According to the undisputed facts, the plaintiff's husband was guilty of negligence in running his train in violation of the rules of the company, of which he had knowledge, and which he had agreed, upon entering its employment, to obey. For this reason, and because of errors committed by the court, there should be a new trial; and if, upon the next hearing, the evidence is substantially the same, there should be a verdict for the defendant.

Error from city court of Macon; J. P. Ross, Judge.

Action by Annie May Kane against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company for the death of plaintiff's husband. Judgment for plaintiff. A new trial was denied, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Hill, Harris & Birch, for plaintiff in error. Lanier, Anderson & Anderson, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. Section 3878 of the Code declares that if the state of facts on which a commission to take the interrogatories issued ceases to exist before the trial of the cause, and the witness is then accessible by subpoena, the testimony taken on interrogatories cannot be used. It follows, necessarily, that if the witness is accessible by being actually present in court at the trial when his testimony by interrogatories is offered, his answers to the same cannot be admitted, but the witness should be examined in person. It does not make the slightest difference that his attendance upon the court was at the instance and request of the opposite party. If, because of this fact, the party who had caused the interrogatories to be sued out does not desire to introduce the witness, it is his right to decline to do so; but if he wishes the testimony of the witness to go before the jury, he must put the witness on the stand. Testimony taken by interrogatories is, at best, unsatisfactory and imperfect, and it is the policy of the law to dispense with this method of securing evidence whenever practicable. Of course, if answers to interrogatories have already been read to the jury, and the witness afterwards comes into court, this would not require that the answers be ruled out or withdrawn. Nor must anything here said be construed to prevent the introduction of answers to interrogatories for the purpose of impeaching a witness when his testimony on the stand is in conflict with that which had been taken by commission. Nor is the rule announced applicable to female witnesses, for they enjoy at least a qualified privilege as to attending court.

2. The evidence showed that a violent collision had taken place between the engine which the plaintiff's husband was running as engineer, and certain box cars which were standing upon a side track. The wreck resulting from this collision was of such character that there could be no possible doubt the engine must have been running at a very rapid rate of speed. Counsel for the railway company elicited from certain witnesses a full description of the wreck and its consequences, and then asked of each "whether or not a collision of that violence could have taken place unless the engine had been running at a very high rate of speed." Upon objection by plaintiff's counsel, the court refused to allow these questions to be answered; and, although it was not stated by counsel propounding the question what answers were expected, the court, perhaps, ought to have permitted the answers to go to the jury. It being manifest, however, that the engine was running very rapidly, and the plaintiff's declaration admitting this fact, the refusal of the court to allow the questions to be answered would certainly be no cause for a new trial.

3. The defendant desired to show "the common experience of railroads" in getting back switch keys from their employees, and, in this connection, to prove that all railroads have great difficulty in keeping up with such keys, and recovering them from discharged employees. It also sought to prove "the custom or usage of railroads in reference to providing a watchman for each of their switches," and "that the general custom was not to provide a watchman for such switches." The court rejected all of this testimony, and, in our opinion, did so properly. Testimony as to the common experience, customs, or usages of railroads, without reference to whether they are wisely or badly managed, or to their particular location or surroundings, or to peculiar circumstances which, in any given instance, would tend to illustrate the diligence or negligence of a company in recovering or failing to recover its switch keys, or in guarding or failing to guard its switches, would be too vague, uncertain, and indefinite to aid a jury in determining in a case on trial whether or not the railroad company was diligent or negligent in these respects. No two cases are exactly alike, and, the facts and circumstances in each being different in greater or less degree from those arising in others, the better and safer rule is to allow the jury, as to questions of the kind presented, to determine every case upon its own individual merits, and in the light of its own particular facts. In some cases the failure to recover a switch key or to have a switch guarded, might involve little or no negligence whatever. In other cases, such failure might amount to very gross negligence. This being so, to permit evidence as to the common experience and general custom of railroads in such matters would probably be misleading, and certainly would have little weight in a given case in arriving at a fair and just conclusion upon the question of negligence.

4. The main defense relied upon was that the engineer for whose homicide the action was brought was himself guilty of negligence in bringing about the collision which resulted in his death, by running his engine at too great a speed, and in violation of the company's rules. In support of this defense the defendant offered to prove by one McCrary that the deceased was habitually reckless in running freight trains at excessive speed, and in running too fast over switches. It appeared from McCrary's testimony that he had been conductor of a freight train on defendant's road between Macon and Brunswick, on which Kane was engineer, and that Kane had pulled him two or three times on a local freight. Under these circumstances, McCrary could hardly swear with accuracy to the habitual recklessness of the deceased. The admissibility of testimony of this kind is, at best, very doubtful. While in Railway Co. v. Flannagan, 82 Ga. 579, 9 S. E. Rep. 471, this court held that it was not error to receive evidence showing the high speed at which the same engine was habitually run by the same engineer at the same place, and that he habitually neglected to ring the bell, Chief Justice Bleckley, on pages 588, 589, 82 Ga., and page 472, 9 S. E. Rep., characterized this evidence as being of doubtful admissibility, and stated that the authorities upon the question were in conflict, citing quite a number on both sides. The testimony offered in the case at bar is by no means so strong or pertinent as that in Flannagan's Case; so, upon the whole, we conclude there was no error in rejecting it. In this connection, see, also, Railroad Co. v. Newton, 85 Ga. 517, 11 S. E. Rep. 776, and Railroad Co. v. Kent, 87 Ga. 402, 403, 13 S. E. Rep. 502.

5. It would be a long step forward in judicial procedure if each party was required to admit every allegation in the pleadings of the other party which he was unwilling to deny upon oath, and thus relieve his adversary of the necessity of proving matters concerning which there is no real contest, and saving the courts much time, vexation, and trouble. If this be so, certainly a party should be relieved from proving that which his adversary distinctly alleges. No sensible reason occurs to us why the defendant may not avail himself of all allegations in the plaintiff's declaration, without formally tendering the declaration in evidence, or otherwise proving the admissions it contains. The declaration being the very foundation of the plaintiff's case, he certainly should be bound by whatever he chooses to allege therein; and he can have no just reason to complain if, in the progress of the trial, his own assertions be taken as true. Nor can we see any reason for requiring the defendant to offer the declaration in evidence. It is usually read to the jury, or its contents are stated in their hearing, and they have it before them in their deliberations. It is therefore available for all proper purposes, whether it be distinctly offered as evidence against the plaintiff or not. As far back as 9 Ga., in Peacock v. Terry, (page 137,) the principle for which we are contending was distinctly stated in the following language: "Facts alleged positively in a bill are constructive admissions in favor of the defendant, and need not be proven. The complainant cannot deny them, even if they are not true, but must recover according to the case he makes upon the record." And Judge Nisbet makes the matter as clear as daylight on pages 149, 150, of the same volume. In the present case the plaintiff's declaration alleged that her husband was running his engine at a high rate of speed, and the defendant consequently had a right to rely upon this allegation as an admitted fact, and no unfavorable inference could, therefore, be drawn against the company because of any failure on its part to call as witnesses its own employees to prove this fact.

6. While a railroad company is bound to exercise ordinary diligence to recover its switch keys from discharged employees, the mere failure to do so in a particular instance would not, per se, make the company liable for the consequences of a criminal misplacement of a switch by a discharged employee who had retained in his possession a key which enabled him to do the mischief. What would be ordinary diligence in endeavoring to recover a switch key from one no longer in the company's employ must necessarily vary according to the facts and circumstances surrounding each particular case. Very slight diligence would be "ordinary" in the absence of any reason to anticipate or fear that the key would be improperly used by the person who was allowed to retain it. If there was any reason to excite such fear, the company would be under greater obligations either to get back the key, or else guard all switches, an interference with which was to be anticipated; and the greater the reason for apprehending such interference, the greater should be the care and diligence of the company to prevent it. No fixed and unbending rule could be laid down which would be applicable to every case. It is simply one of those things which a jury must determine in each case in the light of its own particular and peculiar facts and circumstances. This much, however, may be regarded as well settled, viz. that, in the absence of any reason other than the mere fact of his discharge from its service, a railway company is not bound to anticipate that a former employee, purely out of revenge for his discharge, will secretly commit so heinous a crime against it and the public as to maliciously misplace a switch for the purpose of wrecking a train. In Keeley v. Railway Co., 47 How. Pr. 256, the evidence showed conclusively that there was no negligence or want of proper care on the part of the defendant in the management of its road or in the running of its cars at the time of the accident, but was clear and convincing that the accident was caused solely by the misplacement of a switch by some evil-disposed person, not connected with the road, shortly preceding the arrival of the train in the nighttime; and it was accordingly held that a nonsuit was proper. This case is cited approvingly in Bish. Non-Cont. Law, § 530. We do not think a railroad company is bound, under all circumstances, and at all times, to maintain constant vigilance to prevent all persons whatever not its employ from having the means or opportunity of tampering with its switches or its tracks. In Keeley's Case, supra, the court does not discuss the duty of the company to keep a constant and unremitting watch against trespassers, but seems to take it for granted that usually this would be impossible, and this we think is undoubtedly true. As stated above, the only practicable way of ascertaining whether or not, in any particular instance, the company exercised the proper degree of care in protecting its switches from interference, is to leave the question to a jury; and in determining it they may look to all the surrounding circumstances to ascertain if there was any reason for the company to apprehend such interference, and, if so, whether, in the given instance, it used due diligence in endeavoring to prevent the same. In the case with which we are now dealing, the charge of the court, in effect, made the failure of the company to recover a switch key which had been suffered to remain in the hands of a discharged employe, if ordinary diligence had not been used by the company to get the key back, a ground of recovery. This charge assumed that the mere failure to recover the key was the cause of the injury, and was therefore erroneous. Even granting that such failure amounted to a breach of ordinary diligence, it might not, of itself, have been sufficient to authorize a recovery. It was still a question for the jury, and not for the court, whether the negligence of the company, if negligent at all, in failing to recover the key, was, under the circumstances, the real cause of the injury.

7. One ground of the motion for a new trial assigned as error the refusal of the court to charge the following written request: "The plaintiff is confined to the allegations of negligence made in the petition. There is no allegation of negligence respecting the company's leaving any key in the possession of any employe, and you cannot find for the plaintiff on that ground." It is true that the plaintiff did not seek to recover because of negligence on the part of defendant in improperly leaving one of its switch keys in the custody of a discharged employe; but because of the alleged negligent misplacement of a switch which caused the death of her husband. The plaintiff proved that the switch was misplaced, and that such misplacement was the cause of the collision. The defendant sought in reply to show that the misplacement of the switch was not due to its fault, but that the mischief was done by an evil-disposed person, not in its service. The plaintiff, in turn, endeavored to meet this defense by proving that the company was negligent in affording the evil-disposed person an opportunity to carry out his designs, and in not taking the proper steps to prevent their successful accomplishment; in other words, the plaintiff sought to break down the defense of the company by showing that the facts alleged and proved by it involved a breach of diligence on its part in a material respect. It is quite clear to our minds that the plaintiff had a right to urge such breach of diligence, not as a distinct basis of recovery, but for the purpose of defeating the defendant's justification, and this the plaintiff could do although she had not in her pleadings made any special reference to this particular negligence on the part of the defendant. If the charge requested had been given, it might have misled the jury, and resulted in depriving the plaintiff of this right, and was therefore properly refused.

8. The motion for a new trial contained many grounds. We have ruled upon and disposed of such of the same as bear materially upon the real merits of the case. The questions presented by those not mentioned will most probably not arise upon the next trial. According to the plaintiff's own allegations in her declaration, her husband was running his train at a high rate of speed at the time of the collision, and the undisputed evidence is, he was running it in direct violation of positive rules of the company, of which he not only had knowledge, but which he had expressly and solemnly, upon entering the service of the company, agreed to obey. The following are such extracts from the rules introduced in evidence as are pertinent: "All trains will approach stations with great care, expecting to find the main track occupied between the station limits, (switches, when no posts are up, or other point designated.) The responsibility for accident between limit posts, (or switches,) or at fuel and water stations, will rest with approaching trains." "All trains must reduce speed, and run with great care, after rains and storms, while passing switches, through tunnels, and crossing long bridges." "When approaching stations and sidings, enginemen must observe that switches are set right, and always look out for signals." "Conductors and enginemen will be held equally responsible for the violation of any of the rules governing the safety of their trains, and must take every precaution for the protection of their trains, even if not provided for by the rules." The plaintiff's husband being an employee of the company, and having been guilty of negligence in bringing about the catastrophe which resulted in his death, she was not entitled, under the facts as they appear of record, to a recovery. For this reason, and because of errors committed by the court, a new trial is ordered; and if upon the next hearing the evidence is substantially the same, there should be a verdict for the defendant. Judgment reversed.

EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. RY. CO. v. DANIEL.

CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS—EVIDENCE—STOCK-KILLING CASES—DILIGENCE OF RAILROAD COMPANY—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Where a witness, by way of accounting for his presence at the scene of the killing of an animal, states that immediately before going there he made a particular purchase at a certain store, evidence is admissible, in behalf of the opposite party, showing or tending to show that he made no such purchase on the occasion referred to. While this fact is not directly material on the circumstances of the killing, it is indirectly material, because it contradicts the witness as to the train of events which led him to be present, and thus tends to discredit him as to the fact of his presence.

2. A charge of the court which might be understood by the jury as requiring of a railroad company all possible care to avoid killing live stock by the running of its trains, although the charge be, in other parts of it, correct, on the measure of diligence required of such companies, is cause for a new trial, in a very doubtful case.

Error from superior court, Henry county; J. S. Boynton, Judge.

Action by Albert Daniel against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company for the killing of a mule. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Dorsey, Brewster & Howell and Bryan & Dicken, for plaintiff in error. E. J. Reagan, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. Daniel sued the railway company for damages on account of the killing of his mule. The defendant denied that the mule was killed by its train. The evidence tending to prove that it was killed by the defendant's train was altogether circumstantial and presumptive, except that of one Lofton, who testified that he saw the mule when it was struck by the train and knocked from the track. Upon his cross-examination he was interrogated as to where he lived, what his business was, and why he happened to be present at the time of the killing of the mule. In answer to these questions he stated, among other things, as corroborative of what he had testified as to his presence at the time of the injury, that he left home, and went to town, for the purpose of purchasing some tobacco; that he went to Mr. Copeland's store, and purchased it on credit, and on his way home he saw the accident. The defendant proposed to prove by Copeland that Lofton did not go to his store and purchase tobacco at the time referred to. This testimony was excluded by the court, and its exclusion was made one of the grounds of the defendant's motion for a new trial. While the fact which the witness proposed to prove by Copeland was not directly material on the circumstances of the killing, it was indirectly material, because it contradicted the witness as to the train of events which led him to be present, and thus tended to discredit him as to the fact of his presence. If testimony had been offered by the defendant to the effect that this witness was not present at the killing; that he was not in town, or had not left home, that day,—it is clear that no valid objection could have been made to it. And when the witness undertook to corroborate his story, and show his presence at the killing, by stating all his movements during the morning of the killing, and that his going to Mr. Copeland's store to buy tobacco had led him to be present, we think it was proper for the defendant to disprove the statement of the witness on this point. Although it was a collateral issue, it was a matter affecting his credit, and perjury could be assigned on it. Bishop says: "The credit of a witness is always an element adapted to vary the result of the trial of a fact. Therefore, it is a collateral issue therein. And it is perjury to swear corruptly and falsely to anything affecting such credit as that he has not made a specified statement material in the case; that he has not expressed hostility to the defendant; that he has never been in prison." 2 Bish. Crim. Law, (8th Ed.) § 1032. And again: "Where the evidence is simply to explain how the witness knew the thing he states, as where, testifying to an alibi, he mentions the party's residence and habits to show he could not be mistaken on the main point, since this incidental matter may incline the jury more to credit the substantial, it will sustain a conviction for perjury, if false." Id. § 1037.

2. The diligence which our Code, § 3033, requires of railroad companies in the running of trains is ordinary diligence. It was therefore error for the court to charge the jury, where it was alleged that the defendant company had killed a mule, that the evidence must show that the officers and agents of the defendant in charge of the train exercised all possible care in their effort to avoid it. This charge required of the company a greater degree of diligence than the law requires, and, in a very doubtful case on the facts, was sufficient to authorize a new trial. Judgment reversed.

YOUNG v. WALDRIP et al.

EXECUTION—CLAIM BY THIRD PERSON—LIABILITY ON FORTHCOMING BOND—ACT OF GOD.

The falling of a mule into a post hole overgrown and concealed by grass, if this occurred on the premises of the person chargeable with the care of the mule, is not the act of God, and will not relieve a bona fide claimant of the property from producing the same in fulfillment of his contract in a forthcoming bond given under the claim laws of this state. In an action upon the bond, the burden of proof being upon the defendants to account fully for the nonproduction of the property, the finding of the court in this case was unwarranted; the evidence not showing on whose premises, and under what circumstances, in detail, the mule was killed. A plea alleging the death of the mule without negligence or fault of the claimant was insufficient, and should have been stricken on demurrer, there being no allegation that the death was caused by the act of God.

Error from city court of Cartersville; Shelby Attaway, Judge.

Action by P. M. B. Young against Fannie Waldrip and others on a forthcoming bond. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

John W. Akin, for plaintiff in error. Neel & Swain, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, J. Young obtained a judgment against J. C. Waldrip, and had it levied upon a mule, as the property of the defendant. Mrs. Waldrip claimed the mule, and gave a forthcoming bond to the sheriff, whereby she agreed to produce it on the day of sale, if it should be found subject. Upon the trial of the claim case the property was found subject, and it was readvertised by the sheriff. On the day appointed for the sale the claimant failed to produce the mule. Suit was brought upon the forthcoming bond, and a plea was filed, alleging that the mule "did, after the giving of said bond, die, without any fault or negligence upon the part of either of the defendants, and therefore they were unable to produce said mule to the sheriff, as stipulated in said bond; and these defendants say that their inability to produce said mule was on account of his death, and that this was sufficient in law to excuse and free them from their obligation to produce it under the bond." To this plea the plaintiff demurred on the ground that it set out no legal defense to the action. The demurrer was overruled, and the court, acting by consent of the parties, without a jury, tried the case, and decided that the claimant was not liable. To this ruling and finding the plaintiff excepted. All that appears from the record as to the manner of the mule's death is the following: "Defendants proved by J. C. Waldrip that he was the husband of Mrs. Frances Waldrip, and that the mule was killed by having its leg broken, by stepping in a post hole which was concealed by an overgrowth of grass, from which the mule died, without fault or negligence on his part or on the part of his wife, and the injury to the mule occurred without fault of himself or claimant." When property is levied upon, and a claim thereto is filed, and a forthcoming bond given, and the claimant takes the property into his possession, he is responsible for its care and safe-keeping; and, if it is injured or wasted while in his possession, it is at his risk. If it is a live animal, and dies while in his possession, he is responsible for its value, unless he can show that its death was caused by the act of God, and is in no wise the result of his own conduct. Some authorities hold that even the act of God will not excuse him; but, analogizing an action for the recovery of damages on a forthcoming bond to other actions for the recovery of damages where property claimed dies or is destroyed or injured pending the litigation, we are inclined to think that the act of God should relieve a bona fide claimant from the production of the property, or from the payment of damages on account of his failure to produce it. Section 3078 of the Code declares that "the death or destruction, or any material injury to the property, pending the litigation, shall be no defense to a mere wrong-doer. If the defendant is a bona fide claimant and the injury arises from the act of God, and (is) in no wise the result of defendant's conduct, the jury may take the same into consideration," etc. We are clear that nothing else than this will, or ought to, excuse a claimant for the nonproduction of the property according to the terms of the bond. A plea, therefore, which alleges that the animal, for the forthcoming of which the bond was given, died without fault or negligence on the part of the claimant, but which does not allege that its death was produced by the act of God, is defective, and should be stricken on demurrer. The falling of a mule into a post hole overgrown and concealed with grass, if this occurred on the premises of the person chargeable with the care of the mule, is not the act of God, and will not relieve a claimant from producing the mule in fulfillment of his contract in the forthcoming bond. The evidence in this case does not show upon whose premises and under what circumstances, in detail, the mule was killed. The burden of proof being upon the defendants to account fully for the nonproduction of the property, the finding of the court in favor of the defendants was unwarranted. Judgment reversed.

HEMATITE MIN. CO. v. EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. RY. CO.

CARRIERS—RECEIPTS FOR GOODS—AUTHORITY OF AGENT—EVIDENCE—STATEMENTS OF AGENT—MEMORANDA TO REFRESH MEMORY.

1. The general authority of a railway agent to give receipts for goods delivered for transportation extends only to such receipts as are given at the time the goods are delivered, or so near thereto as to be, according to business usage, a part of the res gestae. Unless special authority be shown, receipts executed by the agent several months after the transaction—more especially if litigation was then contemplated, or had become probable—are not evidence to affect the company.

2. Information furnished a witness by an agent of a railway company as to the contents of a record kept by the company is inadmissible in evidence against the company, when it appears that the information given related to transactions long past, and it does not appear that the furnishing of such information was within the scope of the agent's employment.

3. Although the plaintiff, while a witness on the stand, testified generally that he remembered certain facts stated by him, and that he used certain books and memoranda to refresh his memory, (the memoranda, but not the books, being then before him,) his evidence as to the numbers and destinations of certain cars, and the dates of their shipment, was inadmissible; it further appearing from his testimony that he could state none of these particulars without referring to the books, or to the memoranda he had taken therefrom, and that the entries in the books were sometimes written by himself, and sometimes by another in his employ; it being also apparent that at the time of testifying the witness was unable to state which entries were made by himself, and which by the other.

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by the Hematite Mining Company against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company for failure to deliver freight. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

J. F. Hillyer, for plaintiff in error. McCutchen & Shumate and Hoskinson & Harris, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1, 2. The plaintiff sought to recover damages for an alleged failure to deliver certain car loads of ore claimed to have been received by the railway company for transportation. If the agent of the company knew personally of the delivery of the ore, he would have been a competent witness to prove the fact, and should have been introduced for this purpose. Instead of doing this, however, the plaintiff undertook to make out its case, in part, by tendering receipts for the ore executed by this agent many months after the transaction. The rejection of this evidence is one of the errors complained of. In our opinion, the ruling of the court below was right. To render such receipts admissible, it must affirmatively appear that they were given at the time the goods were delivered for transportation, or so near thereto as to be, according to business usage, a part of the res gestae; otherwise they would be the mere declarations of the agent, not made dum fervert opus, and therefore not binding upon the company he represented. Under such circumstances the agent of a railway company has no authority to bind it by admissions of this kind, because it is manifestly not within the scope of his authority, as agent, to make them. It would be very dangerous to receive in evidence against a principal—whether an incorporated company or otherwise—declarations of an agent, made long after the business in which the agent was acting had been transacted. Of course, the individual is bound by his own admissions deliberately made, even if they relate to a matter long past. This is so because he is supposed to have in mind at all times his own interests, and, presumably, he will admit nothing against his interests which is not the truth. The policy of the law is different with reference to agents, and they cannot be allowed to take away, either in writing or otherwise, the rights of their principals, concerning a matter with which such agents have long since ceased to have any connection whatever. If, instead of offering written receipts, the plaintiff had offered the parol declarations of the railway company's agent, it is manifest that such sayings would have been properly excluded as mere hearsay. The fact that these declarations were reduced to writing, and signed by the agent, does not in the least change the principle. Of course, receipts obtained at the same time, not signed by the agent at all, but which the plaintiff proposed to show he intended to sign, but inadvertently omitted to do so, could not be received. The case before us affords an apt illustration of the wisdom of the rule above stated. The receipts in question were procured from the agent after the present litigation was in actual contemplation, and for the very purpose of being used as evidence in this case. It would have been better, and more in accord with the rules of evidence, to put the agent himself on the stand as a witness, and thus allow the company an opportunity, on cross-examination, to sift the correctness of his statements, and to test the reliability of his sources of information or recollection,—a substantial right, of which the company would have been deprived if the receipts themselves had been received in evidence. What has already been said with reference to the receipts offered is also applicable to the effort of the plaintiff to put in evidence, by introducing its own attorney as a witness, certain information which had been furnished the latter by an agent of the railway company at a point other than the alleged place of shipment, as to the contents of a record kept by the company in one of its offices at that point; it appearing that the information thus given related to transactions long past, and there being nothing to show that it was within the scope of this agent's duty or authority to furnish such information, or even that he himself kept the record in question, or had then, or had ever had, any personal knowledge of the matters concerning which he spoke.

3. The plaintiff in this case, though its name would indicate it was either a corporation or a partnership, really consisted of but one natural person,—Linton Sparks. Having failed in every other way to make out his case, he offered himself as a witness, and undertook to testify from his own personal knowledge to the delivery of certain car loads of ore to the railway company. Although he testified, in general terms, that he remembered the numbers by which these cars were identified, their destinations, and the dates of their shipment to be as stated by him on the stand, and that he used certain books and memoranda to refresh his memory, it is apparent he did not in fact have any definite or distinct recollection concerning the matters about which he spoke. He admitted on cross-examination that without the memoranda "he could not remember numbers, dates, or destinations of any particular car." The books which he stated he used to refresh his memory were not before him while testifying, and he relied solely upon memoranda taken therefrom. It further appeared from his testimony that the entries in the books were sometimes made by himself, and sometimes by another in his employ, and he was unable to state which entries had been made by himself, and which by the other. It is therefore manifest that, deprived of his memoranda, the witness would have been utterly unable to state anything definite concerning the alleged shipment of the cars, and that his professed recollection of the transaction really amounted to nothing. He was simply undertaking to swear to the correctness of information he himself had derived solely by consulting certain books, and copying extracts therefrom. Of the reliability of the books themselves there was no proof whatsoever. If the entries in the books had all been made by himself, and he had sworn to their correctness, and had stated that he had, at the time such entries were made by him, personal knowledge of the matters in question, his testimony would have been admissible. It appearing from his own testimony, however, that some of these entries were made by another person, and he not undertaking to distinguish those entries from others made by himself, or to state that he had ever had any personal knowledge of the matters to which they related, his testimony can only be characterized as being, to a greater or less extent, mere hearsay, and utterly unreliable. No reason appears why the books themselves, together with proper proof of their correctness, were not produced. Had this been done the witness might at least have verified the correctness of his statements based on entries made by himself, and thus have given some force to the assertion that his memory had thereby been refreshed. We think that his testimony, in the manner in which it was presented, was clearly inadmissible, and that the court properly rejected the same. The plaintiff having entirely failed to make out a case against the railway company, a nonsuit followed, as a matter of course. Judgment affirmed.

TREADAWAY v. RICHARDS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

GENERAL DEMURRER—OBJECTIONS TO DEPOSITIONS —SALE BY GUARDIAN—RATIFICATION BY WARD.

1. The refusal to strike the whole or a portion of a special plea on demurrer thereto is not cause for a new trial when the entire plea and the particular portion referred to contain some allegations which are good in law as a defense against the action, although in other respects the plea is defective and insufficient.

2. It is too late, after the plaintiff's case has been closed, and the defendant is introducing testimony, to object to the introduction of answers to interrogatories on the ground that one of the commissioners was an agent of the defendant, paid to execute the same, no objection in writing having been previously made and notice thereof given to the defendant.

3. Where a guardian sold land in which a minor ward had an interest, and the latter, after arriving at the age of 21 years, freely, voluntarily, and with a full knowledge of all the facts, received from her guardian in another state her full share of the proceeds of the sale, the same having been paid over to him by the guardian in Georgia during the ward's minority, and no fraud whatever having been practiced upon her, she was estopped from recovering any interest in the land from an innocent purchaser holding under the purchaser at the guardian's sale, even though that sale may not have been in all respects legal. The ward's actual knowledge of the facts concerning the sale, and her acceptance, after maturity and with full knowledge, of her share of the proceeds, amounted to a ratification by her of the sale, although she may not have known that under the law the sale was illegal.

4. There was no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Weems and Mrs. Terry against W. S. Richards to recover an interest in land. Verdict for defendant. Thereafter Mrs. Weems died, and a motion for new trial was made by E. P. Treadaway, as her administrator, which was denied, and he brings error. Affirmed.

Seaborn, Wright, Dean & Smith and Max Meyerhardt, for plaintiff in error. Ewing & Thompson and J. Branham, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Mrs. Weems and Mrs. Terry brought an action against Richards to recover the undivided two-thirds of a certain tract of land. The plaintiffs were daughters of S. M. May, deceased, to whom the land in question had been conveyed, as trustee for his wife and children, on the 14th day of December, 1866. At that time there were in life only two children, William J. May and Mollie May, who afterwards became Mrs. Terry. Mrs. Weems had not then been born, and, consequently, her name was stricken from the declaration as a party plaintiff. Mr. and Mrs. May both died in the year 1877, the former on the 10th of May, and the latter on the 4th of August. After the death of Mr. May, R. H. Jones was appointed in his stead as trustee for the children, and he also became their guardian. Under an order from the court of ordinary, Jones, as guardian, sold the land, in February, 1886, to William J. May, and it passed from him by a regular chain of title into the defendant. Mrs. Terry, the plaintiff, contended that, under the facts above recited, the entire title to the land in question did not vest in Jones as guardian, but that he held at least an undivided interest therein in his capacity as trustee, and consequently could not, as guardian, sell and convey the whole fee. After a verdict had been rendered for the defendant, Mrs. Terry died, and a motion for a new trial was made by Treadaway, as her administrator.

1. Besides the general issue, the defendant filed a plea of estoppel, which was, in effect, as follows: Plaintiffs directed the land sued for to be sold by their guardian, Jones, against his advice. They were present at the courthouse on the first Tuesday in February, 1886, when the sale was made by the guardian, stood by and made no objection to the sale, and allowed the property to be sold as theirs, and purchased by innocent purchasers. They were afterwards present when the guardian executed deeds conveying the property to the purchasers, and saw the money paid by the purchasers to their guardian, without objection thereto, and afterwards each of them received her pro rata share of the purchase money. The purchasers, and those under them, believing they were getting a good title to the land, entered into immediate possession thereof, and made valuable improvements thereon, (as set forth in an exhibit to the plea,) to that extent enhancing and increasing the value of the land, wherefore defendant says plaintiffs are estopped to deny defendant's title and right to the land, and have ratified and confirmed the same. The plaintiff demurred generally to this plea, and also moved specially to strike all of it, except the part that related to putting improvements upon the land. The court overruled the demurrer, and refused to strike the plea. While the plea is in some respects obviously defective and insufficient, it certainly contains some allegations good in law as a defense to the action upon the issues involved. This will more fully appear in the brief discussion constituting the third division of this opinion.

2. The objection to the introduction of the answers to certain interrogatories, on the ground stated in the second headnote, was not well taken. The plaintiff's case had been closed, and the defendant was introducing his testimony. The objection made was certainly "to the execution and return" of the commission, and, in order to be available, should, under section 3892 of the Code, have been "made in writing, and notice thereof given to the opposite party before the case [was] submitted to the jury." This was not done, and therefore the court was clearly right in overruling the objection and admitting the evidence.

3. We deem it unnecessary to decide whether Jones, the guardian, had the legal right, as such, to sell and convey the entire estate in the land under the order from the court of ordinary. There would be much reason for holding, under the peculiar facts of this case, that he did; but, be this as it may, he certainly undertook to exercise this right, and, if human conduct ever amounted to a ratification of the acts of another, Mrs. Terry undoubtedly ratified, after she attained her majority, all that Jones did in the premises. Her husband, who was her guardian in Tennessee, received from Jones, her guardian in Georgia, prior to her becoming of age, her full share of the proceeds of the sale; and after she became of age, and with a full knowledge of all that had been done, she received from her Tennessee guardian the money turned over to him by Jones, and receipted to him in full for the same. No fraud of any description whatever was practiced upon her by either of the guardians; so it makes no difference whether the sale of the land by Jones was in all respects legal or not. Mrs. Terry was, by her conduct, conclusively estopped from recovering any interest in the land from an innocent third party who held under the purchaser at the guardian's sale. It was contended that Mrs. Terry was not estopped because, at the time she accepted the money, she did not know that under the law the sale by the guardian was illegal. If, in point of fact, the sale was illegal, she was bound to know it, and, if she saw proper, to decline to ratify it by accepting her share of its proceeds. As already seen, she had full knowledge of all the facts, was in no way deceived nor imposed upon, and acted deliberately in the matter after reaching her majority. Her ignorance of the law, or of her special and peculiar rights thereunder, affords no reason whatever for setting aside the sale at her instance. The charge of the court was in accord with the views herein expressed, and contained no error.

4. Both the law and justice of the case coincided in bringing about the verdict in favor of the defendant, and the court was right in refusing to set it aside. Judgment affirmed.

NORMAN v. GEORGIA LOAN & TRUST CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

EXECUTION OF NOTE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Taken in connection with the entire charge, there was no error in the charges or refusal to charge complained of, the evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Henry county; J. S. Boynton, Judge.

Action by the Georgia Loan & Trust Company against D. W. Lewis and W. P. Norman, as executor of H. C. Lewis, on a note. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Norman brings error. Affirmed.

Bryan & Dicken and Hall & Hammond, for plaintiff in error. Beck & Cleveland, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. This was an action upon a promissory note against D. W. Lewis and W. P. Norman, as executor of H. C. Lewis. The former made no defense. The defenses mainly relied on by the latter were (1) that H. C. Lewis was of unsound mind, and incapable of contracting, at the time the note was executed; and (2) that he did not, in fact, himself sign the note, nor authorize any person to do so for him. The evidence was voluminous, and decidedly conflicting, but that introduced on the part of the plaintiff was amply sufficient to support a finding by the jury that the deceased was mentally capable of contracting, that he freely and voluntarily authorized D. W. Lewis to sign his name to the note, and that this was done in his immediate presence. The court below was satisfied with the verdict returned by the jury, and the judgment refusing to grant a new trial ought not, therefore, upon the merits of the case, to be set aside.

Error was assigned upon the following charge of the court: "If he, [referring to H. C. Lewis] signed himself, or if he instructed another to sign it for him, and if another signs his name to the note with his consent or authority, then it would be his contract, and as legally binding on him as if he had done it himself; so that if another signed it for him, or he authorized another to sign for him, you would be authorized to find against the plea of non est factum to the note, and in favor of its being his contract." The alleged error was that this charge was given without a statement or qualification to the effect that the rule stated would be true only in case H. C. Lewis had sufficient mind to make a contract. To test the fairness of this exception, it is only necessary to refer to the charge itself. In the charge, immediately preceding the words above quoted, we find the following language: "If you find from the evidence, gentlemen of the jury, that H. C. Lewis had mental capacity to make a contract, and that he authorized D. W. Lewis to sign his name to the paper sued on, then you would be authorized to find against the plea of non est factum." Comment is unnecessary, except to refer to the second division of the opinion of Bleckley, C. J., delivered in Fletcher v. State, 90 Ga. —, 17 S. E. Rep. 101, where the practice of detaching from its context a short extract from the charge of the court, and predicating an assignment of error upon it thus isolated, is declared to be altogether improper. The court was requested to charge: "It does not require a high degree of mental power to make a binding agreement. One who has enough of mind and reason equal to a clear and full understanding of the nature and consequence of his act in making a deed is to be considered sane. One who lacks this capacity is to be considered insane." This entire request was given, with the exception of the last sentence, and complaint is made of this omission. It would, perhaps, have been better to give the request as presented, but we do not think it possible that the jury could have failed to understand from the instruction as given that one who did not possess the requisite capacity, as explained to them, would be incapable of contracting, and would not be bound by a contract purporting to have been entered into by him. Besides, in view of the whole charge, we are fully satisfied the jury were not misled in this particular. Where the converse of a proposition is plainly manifest even to a mind of but ordinary comprehension, it need not be stated.

The only remaining ground of the motion for a new trial assigns as error the following charge: "If the defendant H. C. Lewis was at times insane, but had lucid intervals, during a lucid interval he would have the right to make a contract; and, if he made a contract during a lucid interval, then it would be a binding contract." This, certainly, is a sound and correct statement of the law, and counsel for the plaintiff in error so concede, but contend that it was error to give this instruction, unaccompanied by any qualification to the effect that if a person is shown to be insane, the presumption is that he remains insane, and that a person may have what are called lucid intervals, and yet not have sufficient mind to make a contract. If it was desired to have the attention of the jury specially called to these qualifications of the principle announced by the court, counsel should have preferred a request to this effect. The charge as given did not necessarily require the qualifications mentioned, and certainly cannot be said to have been misleading. On the whole, there is, so far as we can perceive, no merit whatever in this writ of error, and accordingly the judgment of the court below is affirmed.

HANEY v. BOARD OF COM'RS OF ROADS & REVENUES OF BARTOW COUNTY.

GENERAL ROAD LAW—GENERAL OR SPECIAL LAW—POWER OF GRAND JURIES—DELEGATING LEGISLATIVE POWERS—JURY TRIAL—UNIFORMITY OF TAXATION—TITLE OF STATUTE.

The act approved October 21, 1891, (Acts 1890-91, vol. 1, p. 135,) in relation to public roads, is a general law, and as such does not, because it provides that it "shall not go into effect in any county in this state until it is recommended by the grand jury of said county," violate the constitutional requirement that laws of a general nature shall have uniform operation throughout the state. Nor does the act confer upon grand juries the powers of legislation. This act is not unconstitutional, in that it denies the right of trial by jury, nor as creating a rate of taxation not uniform in its character, nor as containing more than one subject-matter, or matter different from what is expressed in its title.

Error from superior court, Bartow county; T. W. Milner, Judge.

Action by the board of commissioners of roads and revenues of Bartow county against D. J. Haney, as a defaulter, under the general road law. Judgment for the board of commissioners, and Haney brings error. Affirmed.

J. W. Harris, Jr., for plaintiff in error. A. W. Fite, A. S. Johnson, and John H. Wikle, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. This case involves the constitutionality of the act approved October 21, 1891, (Acts 1890-91, vol. 1, p. 135,) known as the "General Road Law." We will briefly deal with the several objections to this act in the order in which they were presented to us.

It was insisted that, viewed as a special or local law, this act must fall—First, because there was at the time of its passage a general law on the same subject already in existence, and embodied in the Code, from section 597 to section 606, both inclusive; and, secondly, because it was passed without local publication, as required by the constitution. We do not think this act either is, or was intended to be, special or local legislation, and will therefore proceed to inquire whether or not, viewed as a general law, it can constitutionally stand. The learned counsel for the plaintiff in error earnestly contended that, regarded as a law of a general nature, this act violates the constitutional requirement that such laws shall have uniform operation throughout the state, because the territory in which it can operate is limited to less than the whole state by the provision in the law itself that it "shall not go into effect in any county of this state until it is recommended by the grand jury of said county." That this objection is not well taken has been settled by the principle announced with reference to the "general local option liquor law" in Crabb v. State, 88 Ga. 584, 15 S. E. Rep. 455. What is therein said concerning the general liquor law is equally true of the general road law, viz. that there is no county in the state to which this law will not, in certain contingencies, which the law itself anticipates, be applicable. If every grand jury in Georgia should recommend that this road law go into effect, its operation would become universal all over the state; and therefore, in our opinion, the act may and does apply to every county in the state. The distinction between this act and the county court act, as construed by this court in Lorentz v. Alexander, 87 Ga. 444, 13 S. E. Rep. 632, is the same as that between the latter act and the general liquor law, which was pointed out in the Crabb Case, supra.

The objection that the act before us confers upon grand juries the powers of legislation is, also, not well taken. It has for many years been the policy of our general assembly to leave to local authorities, such as municipal governments and grand juries, and to the people themselves, the determination of the question whether or not particular legislation should be operative in given counties or localities. This policy has been so generally recognized as sound and constitutional, we deem it unnecessary to state the numerous instances in which it has been followed. The county court act provided that it should not "take effect so as to allow a county judge to be appointed for any county until the grand jury thereof [should,] by a majority, so recommend." It has never been held that the establishment of a county court in any county of this state by recommendation of the grand jury was legislation by that body. It was argued, however, that the county court act is, in itself, complete and operative in all the counties to which it can apply, and that the only thing left for the grand jury to do is to recommend the appointment of a judge, while the road law now under review cannot go into effect in any county except by a recommendation of the grand jury that it shall go into effect, and is therefore no law at all, in any county, until such recommendation has been made. The distinction thus sought to be drawn between the two acts is practically no distinction at all. In either case the act is nugatory and inoperative in any particular county until after action by the grand jury, and the form of that action is immaterial.

The next objection to the act was that it denies to defaulters who fail to work the public roads, or to pay the commutation tax, the right of trial by jury. The ruling of this court in Blankenship v. State, 40 Ga. 680, in principle, decides the question thus made. In that case it was held that a judge of the superior court could try and punish defaulting road commissioners, and that they were not entitled to demand a trial by jury. To work the public roads, or to pay a fair tax in lieu of such work, is a public duty, and a failure to perform this duty may be punished by the exercise of a police power lodged with the proper authorities. A proceeding of this kind is altogether different from an indictment and trial for an offense against the criminal statutes of the state. It is similar in many respects to the proceedings had by the various recorders' and mayors' courts in our cities and towns, and is also somewhat analogous to the proceedings by which judges compel the attendance of jurors and witnesses, and the performance by them of their respective duties. To allow demands for jury trials in such cases would practically obstruct all progress in these matters, a result which, we are quite sure, was never contemplated nor intended by the framers of our organic law.

Another objection was that the rates of the taxation provided for by the act may vary in different counties, which would be contrary to the constitutional requirement of uniformity in taxation. This objection is not sound. The several counties of this state have different rates of taxation for county purposes; and according to the doctrine announced by this court in Railway Co. v. Wright, 89 Ga. 574, 15 S. E. Rep. 293, so long as a county tax upon all subjects or persons within its jurisdiction is at the same rate, the uniformity required by the constitution is observed. See, specially, page 594, 89 Ga., and page 300, 15 S. E. Rep.

The only remaining objection was that the act refers to more than one subject-matter, and contains matter different from what is expressed in its title. We think an examination of the title, in connection with the body of the act, will be sufficient to show that this objection is also without substantial merit.

On the whole the act is not unconstitutional for any of the reasons presented, and we agree with our learned brother of the circuit bench in so holding. Judgment affirmed.

FERGASON et al. v. ETCHERSON et al.

ETCHERSON et al. v. FERGASON et al.

WILLS—PROBATE—CAVEAT—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—EVIDENCE—MISCONDUCT OF WITNESS—HEARING EXCUSE—EXCLUDING WITNESS—NEW TRIAL AS TO ONE CAVEATRIX—FILING EXCEPTIONS.

1. One of the grounds of the caveat being that the testator was mentally incompetent to make a will, evidence that he derived from his wife, by marriage, the bulk of the property upon which he built up his estate, was admissible; the will making for her a provision somewhat inconsistent, in point of liberality, with this fact, according to what might be a natural course of conduct on the part of a husband. That the widow acquiesced in the will, and was no party to the caveat, would not affect the admissibility of the evidence.

2. Where a witness has been sequestered, and ordered to remain out of the court room, there is no error in hearing, in the presence of the jury, his excuse for alleged disobedience of this order.

3. When such witness, as his excuse for returning to the court room, or within hearing of other witnesses who were being examined, presented the fact that counsel had assured him he would not be introduced, and his statement was confirmed by the counsel and accepted by the court, and the witness was thereupon discharged from the proceeding for contempt, this court will not control the discretion of the trial judge in afterwards refusing to allow counsel on that side to introduce and examine this witness, the ground of the application to examine him being that the counsel was mistaken in thinking that the witness would not be sworn and examined. The facts of this case, on the point in question, are different from those in the case of May v. State, 17 S. E. Rep. 108, (last term.)

4. The verdict, on the pleadings and the evidence, was warranted, in so far as it found in favor of one of the caveatrixes, but not so as to the finding in favor of the other. Consequently, there was no error in refusing a new trial as to the former, and in granting a new trial as to the latter.

5. The denial in vacation of a motion to dismiss a motion for a new trial is cause for a separate and independent writ of error, and if none is sued out, and no exceptions are entered pendente lite, it is too late, after the expiration of 30 days from the date of the decision, to bring the question to this court.

Error from superior court, Hurd county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Robert D. Ferguson and others, executors, propounded a will for probate. A caveat was filed by Amelia Etcherson, and Mrs. Duke was made a party thereto. There was verdict for the caveatrixes. A new trial was granted as against Mrs. Duke, and refused as against Mrs. Etcherson. Propounders bring error. Caveatrixes bring a cross bill of exceptions. Affirmed.

P. F. Smith, W. H. Daniel, and Adamson & Jackson, for plaintiffs. P. H. Brewster and Frank S. Loftin, for defendants.

SIMMONS, J. 1. The will was caveated on several grounds,—among them, that the testator was not of sound and disposing mind and memory. The caveatrix proved by her mother that when she married the testator he had no property, but was a poor man, and that, as her husband, he got from the estate of her father $4,500. This was objected to, on the part of the propounders, on the ground that it was irrelevant and immaterial. The objection was overruled, and this ruling is alleged to be error. We agree with the trial judge that the evidence was admissible. Any fact or circumstance which would tend to show unsoundness of mind on the part of the testator was admissible in evidence. The fact may not be of much weight, but it was not for the court to judge of its weight. That was the province of the jury. The testator, by his will, made a liberal provision for all of his children, except two daughters. to whom he gave five dollars each, and left nothing to his wife, further than to direct that his son Robert should support her out of the property devised to him; this to be in lieu of dower, as well as a year's support. In other words, she was to get nothing at all under the will, unless she waived the provision which the law makes for the wife in all cases. We think a jury might properly consider, in passing upon the mental condition of the testator, that a husband who had derived his property, or the bulk of it, from his wife, might not have made a provision for her so far inconsistent with that fact, and so far different from what would be expected of a husband under such circumstances, if he had been of sound and disposing mind and memory at the time of making the will. A fact thus tending to show the unreasonableness of the will would undoubtedly have a legitimate bearing upon the question of the testator's mental condition. The fact that the widow did not contest the will would not affect the admissibility of this evidence. It could not preclude the party attacking the will from showing that the provision made for the widow was unreasonable, and indicative of mental unsoundness on the part of the testator.

and should have done so then and there. To compel the court to receive the testimony of the witness, under these circumstances, would be to virtually abrogate that section of the Code which gives to either party the right to require the witnesses to be separated during the trial. It would allow a witness and counsel to entrap the court, and any order the court might give to separate the witnesses would be rendered nugatory. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case, we will not control the discretion of the court below in refusing to allow the witness to testify. The facts of this case, on the point in question, are not like those in the case of May v. State, 17 S. E. Rep. 108, (decided at the last term.) In that case counsel asked that a brother of the accused might be allowed to remain in the court to assist in the defense. The solicitor general objected, whereupon the court ruled that he must retire. Counsel for the accused then agreed not to put him on the stand as a witness, and upon this statement the court allowed him to remain. Subsequently, this person was offered for the sole purpose of impeaching a witness. Under these facts it was held that the court erred in not allowing the witness to testify. In that case the judge ought not to have required the agreement made that the witness should not be placed upon the stand as a condition for allowing him to remain in the court room, because the accused was entitled to have him present to aid in the defense, whether he was a witness or not, it being a capital case; and, besides, in that case the witness was offered merely to impeach a witness for the state, while in this case the witness was offered upon a vitally important question. There was no error in hearing the excuse of the witness in the presence of the jury.

4. When the will was offered for probate, it was caveated by Mrs. Etcherson alone. Subsequently, her sister Mrs. Duke asked to be made a party to the caveat, and an order was taken, making her a party. Mrs. Duke filed no caveat, and did not adopt the grounds of the caveat filed by Mrs. Etcherson. The verdict of the jury was that the paper offered for probate was the last will of the testator, except as to Mrs. Etcherson and Mrs. Duke, and that as to them it was made under a mistake of fact in regard to their conduct. In passing upon the motion for a new trial made by the propounders, the court refused the motion as to Mrs. Etcherson, but granted a new trial as to Mrs. Duke. The propounders excepted to the refusal of a new trial as to Mrs. Etcherson, and Mrs. Duke filed a cross bill excepting to the judgment granting a new trial as to her. There was sufficient evidence to authorize the finding as to Mrs. Etcherson. Her caveat fully set out the grounds on which the will was made void as to her; among them, the ground upon which the jury predicated their finding. But, as before remarked, Mrs. Duke filed no caveat, and did not adopt that already filed by Mrs. Etcherson; so there were no pleadings on the part of Mrs. Duke upon which the jury could base the finding in her favor, nor was there any evidence that the will was made on account of a mistake of fact concerning her conduct. We think, therefore, that the court was right in granting a new trial as to her and in refusing one as to Mrs. Etcherson.

5. A motion for a new trial was made in term, and an order taken to hear it in vacation. When the motion came on for a hearing in vacation, counsel for the respondents moved to dismiss it, for the reason set forth in the motion, which it is unnecessary to mention here. The court overruled the motion to dismiss, and heard the case. After the court passed upon the motion the propounders sued out their bill of exceptions, in proper time, complaining of the judgment of the court refusing to grant a new trial as to Mrs. Etcherson. Mrs. Etcherson and Mrs. Duke sued out a cross bill of exceptions, complaining jointly of the judgment refusing to dismiss the motion for a new trial, and Mrs. Duke complained separately of the judgment granting a new trial to her; but this cross bill was not sued out in 30 days from the time of the decision refusing to dismiss the motion for a new trial. The motion to dismiss a motion for a new trial is not a motion connected with the merits of the case. The refusal to sustain such a motion is cause for a separate and independent writ of error, which should be sued out within 30 days from such refusal. If not sued out within that time, or if no exceptions are entered pendente lite, it is too late after the 30 days have expired to bring the case to this court. For this reason we cannot consider the questions made in this part of the cross bill of exceptions. Judgment on both bills of exceptions affirmed.

PATTERSON v. EVANS et al.

NOVATION—MORTGAGE—DESCRIPTION.

1. An absolute deed conveying land as security for a debt is a security of a higher nature than a mortgage for the same debt on the same premises, and when the mortgage is entered satisfied, and surrendered up because of the execution of such a deed, the transaction operates as a novation.

2. While the description of the mortgaged premises, in these terms: "Two hundred and ninety acres, more or less, of land situate in the fifth district of Wilkinson county, upon which an incumbrance of $125 exists, due October 15, 1888, taking priority of this mortgage; also two gins and one gristmill located on said described land,"—is meager and vague, yet whether such terms will serve to identify the premises is a question of fact, and hence the mortgage is not necessarily void because the description is not more complete.

Error from superior court, Wilkinson county; W. F. Jenkins, Judge.

To the fund remaining in the sheriff's hands after the foreclosure and satisfaction of a mortgage, A. W. Patterson, Evans & Turner, and others filed claims, and from the judgment determining the priority of such claims Patterson brings error. Affirmed.

Roberts & Pottle, for plaintiff in error. J. W. Lindsey, Whitfield & Allen, and F. Chambers, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. Eady's land was sold by the sheriff under a mortgage fi. fa., which appears to have been junior to several other fi. fas. against him. It was agreed by all the parties that the fi. fa. under which the property was sold should be paid off, and the contest was over the balance of the money left in the sheriff's hands. This contest was principally between Greenwood, Evans & Turner, and Patterson. Greenwood's judgment being the oldest, the court ordered it paid, and directed that the balance be applied in part payment of the execution of Evans & Turner. To each of these rulings Patterson excepted. It appears from the record that Eady had given Patterson two mortgages, on two different tracts of land, one being dated in 1885 and the other in 1886. In 1887 he gave Evans & Turner a mortgage on some of the same land. On the 1st of February, 1888, Eady made to Patterson two deeds to secure the debts embraced in the mortgages, together with an additional debt of $165, conveying the same land described in the mortgages, which deeds were recorded in January, 1890, and the mortgages were surrendered and canceled. Under this state of facts, we do not think Patterson was entitled to claim anything under his mortgages. When he surrendered and canceled them, and, to secure the mortgage indebtedness and the additional debt of $165, took absolute deeds covering the same property, the lien of the mortgages was extinguished. The deeds were a security of higher dignity than the mortgages, and the change effected in the nature and form of the contract was such as amounted in law to a novation. Patterson, from being the holder simply of a lien upon the land, became vested with the absolute title. The lien of his mortgages being extinguished, he was left to stand upon his deeds, and, the Evans & Turner mortgage being older than the deeds, the court was right in awarding the money to them, instead of to Patterson.

2. On the trial, Patterson objected to the introduction in evidence of the mortgage fi. fa. of Evans & Turner, and the mortgage upon which it was founded, upon the ground that they were absolutely void for want of description. The descriptive part of the fi. fa. and the mortgage is set out in the second headnote to this opinion. The description is certainly very meager and vague, but whether such terms will serve to identify the premises is a question of fact, and not of law. Collier v. Vason, 12 Ga. 441, and Oatis v. Brown, 59 Ga. 711. The judge, acting as a jury, having found that the land could be identified by the description as given, we cannot hold that it was so defective as to render the mortgage void. Judgment affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK OF COLUMBUS v. LEONARD et al.

PROMISSORY NOTES — WHEN NEGOTIABLE — INDORSEMENT—LIABILITY OF INDORSER.

1. Under the Code, §§ 2775, 2776, a promissory note not containing any words of negotiability is so far negotiable by indorsement of the payee in blank as to pass the title to a bona fide holder, and enable him to sue the maker in his own name. This was so ruled in Goodman v. Fleming, 57 Ga. 350, which case is imperfectly reported, it appearing from the transcript of the record on file in this court that the indorsement involved in that case was in blank only.

2. The payee of a promissory note not negotiable, who indorses the same in blank, and delivers it to another for value, is, by virtue of the above sections of the Code, liable on his indorsement.

3. Where, at the time a promissory note was indorsed in blank, another between the same parties was folded in it, the indorsement of the former did not operate as an indorsement or to more than an equitable assignment of the latter, although such may have been the intention of the parties. Consequently, a holder could not maintain a suit upon the latter in his own name without equitable pleadings setting up the requisite facts.

Error from superior court, Talbot county; John Peabody, Judge.

Action by the National Bank of Columbus against one Leonard and others on two promissory notes. Defendants had judgment, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

G. E. Thomas, Jr., for plaintiff in error.
J. H. Worrill, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, J. It appears from the record that Leonard gave to Hatcher & Wilkerson two obligations, in writing, whereby he promised to pay them a certain amount of money. Neither contained any words of negotiability. They indorsed one of them in blank, and negotiated both of them to the First National Bank of Columbus. It seems that one of them was written upon a large piece of paper, and the other upon a smaller piece, and, when they were negotiated to the bank, the smaller one was inclosed in the other, and the indorsement was made upon the latter. There was no indorsement upon the smaller one. These obligations not being paid when due, suit was instituted thereon by the bank in its own name against the maker and indorsers. When they were tendered in evidence at the trial, counsel for Leonard objected to their admission (1) because the indorsement on one of the papers was merely in blank, and did not put title into the plaintiff, so as to authorize it to recover against the defendant Leonard in this action; and (2) because the other paper had no indorsement at all. The court sustained the objection; and, the indorsers having filed no plea, the plaintiff moved judgment by default against them, which was refused, and the court granted a nonsuit. To each of these rulings the plaintiff excepted.

1. Under the common law, an indorsement in blank by the payee upon a promissory note containing no negotiable words did not pass the title to the indorsee, so that he could bring an action in his own name thereon. But in this state we think the rule has been changed by statute. The Code (section 2775) declares: "A promissory note is negotiable by indorsement of the payee or holder, or if payable to bearer, by transfer and delivery only. The maker may restrain the negotiability thereof by expressing such intention in the body of the instrument." Section 2776 is as follows: "All bonds, specialties or other contract in writing for the payment of money or any article of property, and all judgments and executions from any court in this state, are negotiable by indorsement or written assignment, in the same manner as bills of exchange and promissory notes," etc. Indeed, this court has decided that an indorsement in blank does pass the title so as to enable the indorsee to maintain an action in his own name against the maker. See Goodman v. Fleming, 57 Ga. 350. That case is not fully reported, but, upon looking at the record of file here, we find that the paper sued on had no words of negotiability; that the indorsement was in blank; and that the suit was brought by the indorsee against the maker. The maker demurred to the action, on the ground that the indorsee of a promissory note without words of negotiability in it could not maintain an action thereon in his own name. The trial judge overruled the demurrer, and, upon exception thereto, this court affirmed the judgment. See, also, the reasoning of Bleckley, J., on the same subject, in the case of Cohen v. Prater, 56 Ga. 203.

2. If the payee of a promissory note without negotiable words can, by indorsement in blank, transfer the title to the indorsee, it follows that when the payee thus indorses it, and delivers it to another for value, he becomes liable on his indorsement.

3. The remaining question is covered by the third headnote to this opinion. Judgment reversed.

PRINCE v. DICKSON.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 29, 1893.)

JUDGMENT — COLLATERAL ATTACK — RENEWAL — SUMMONS—CERTIFICATE OF SERVICE.

1. Where the record shows on its face that the court rendering a judgment had acquired jurisdiction of defendant, on a subsequent proceeding to renew the judgment, defendant will not be permitted to contradict the record by showing lack of service of summons.

2. The return on a summons for the renewal of a judgment was indorsed and signed by the sheriff in these words: "By my special deputy, [naming him,] delivered a copy of this notice to [defendant] personally, at her residence, [giving place and date,] and left the same with her." Held sufficient to confer jurisdiction of defendant.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Chesterfield county; Q. D. Witherspoon, Judge.

Action on a judgment by W. L. T. Prince, administrator of the estate of J. C. Colt, deceased, against Mary A. Dickson. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Newton and A. A. Pollock, for appellant. Prince & Stevenson, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This was a summons to renew an execution issued to enforce a judgment, originally docketed on the 14th day of September, 1866, which, as the plaintiff alleges, was renewed first by an order of court bearing date 10th September, 1875. The defendant, in her answer, showed for cause why said execution should not be renewed: "(1) That the judgment debt which purports to be represented by the alleged execution has been fully paid and discharged in law. (2) That she denies the allegation in the said summons contained that the execution was renewed in 1875, and alleges that the pretended renewal thereof is void. (3) That she is advised, and therefore alleges, that there is no valid record upon which to base an execution in this case. (4) The respondent has been recently informed that there is a purported order of renewal of the alleged execution in the above cause. She is surprised at this, for the reason that no notice or summons was ever served upon her informing her that application would be made to renew the execution in this case. She is further informed that there is a notice in the record of this case, which has upon it a certificate or statement purporting to be made by Sheriff Spofford, to the effect that by his special deputy, Isham Drake, he served a copy of said notice upon her on the 2d day of January, A. D. 1875, at deponent's place of residence in Chesterfield county; that the said certificate is based upon an erroneous statement of facts; that Isham Drake never delivered to respondent any such copy, notice or other paper on 2d day of January, A. D. 1875, nor at any other time." Appended to her answer was the affidavit of one Isham Drake, in which he says "that he never served any papers for Sheriff Spofford on Mrs. Mary A. Dickson in his life, and that said return, so far as it alleges service by this deponent, is erroneous; that he never did carry any paper of any kind from Sheriff Spofford to her." The case came before his honor, Judge Witherspoon, for hearing, when the original record was produced, showing that judgment had been duly entered as stated in the summons in the present case; and accompanying said record, as a part thereof, were the proceedings showing that the execution had been renewed in 1875, to wit, the summons, bearing date the 1st of January, 1875, calling upon defendant to show cause why a new execution should not issue, upon which were the following indorsements: "Lodged 1st January, 1875. [Signed] P. F. Spofford, S. C. C." "By my special deputy, Isham Drake, delivered a copy of this notice to Mary A. Dickson personally, at her place of residence in Chesterfield county, on the 2d day of January, 1875, and left the same with her. [Signed] P. F. Spofford, S. C. C." Also an affidavit of the plaintiff to the effect that no part of the judgment had ever been paid, but the same remains wholly unsatisfied for the whole amount; and an order signed by his honor, Judge Townsend, renewing the execution. The plaintiff in the case was permitted to testify, against objection by defendant, that no part of the judgment had ever been paid. The circuit judge rendered judgment that the plaintiff was entitled to renew his execution, and granted an order of renewal accordingly. From this the defendant appeals, upon the several grounds set out in the record, which, under the view which we take, need not be repeated here.

Inasmuch as more than 20 years had elapsed from the original entry of the judgment before the present proceedings were instituted, it is quite clear that defendant's plea of payment, by operation of law, would have to be sustained, unless the proceedings instituted in 1875 will rebut the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time. The real question, therefore, is as to the legal effect of those proceedings. If those proceedings show on their face that the court which granted the order of renewal in September, 1875, had then acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant by legal service of the summons by which such proceedings were commenced, then, even if in fact no such service had been made, the order of renewal would be final and conclusive in any subsequent collateral inquiry into the validity and effect of such order of renewal, for its validity could only be inquired into under some direct proceedings, in which alone the question of fact as to whether such service was really made or not could be determined. In other words, where the record of a judgment shows upon its face that the court rendering the judgment has acquired jurisdiction of the party against whom it is rendered, neither that party nor any other person can assail such judgment for want of jurisdiction, except by some direct proceeding instituted for the purpose of correcting any alleged error in what appears upon the record, and such record must be treated as importing absolute verity until it has been so corrected. Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C. 398; Crocker v. Allen, 34 S. C. 452, 13 S. E. Rep. 650. Unless, therefore, the present proceeding can be regarded as a direct proceeding instituted for the purpose of correcting an alleged error in the record of the proceedings instituted in 1875, it is very obvious that the court could not now enter into any inquiry as to whether the defendant was in fact served with the summons by which that proceeding was inaugurated. It seems to us that it cannot be so regarded, for, in the first place, this proceeding was not instituted by the party claiming that there was an error in the record; and, if the defense which is set up here should be allowed to prevail, the record would still stand as it stood before. This matter of correcting errors in records is too serious a matter to allow any laxity in the proceedings for that purpose. The public records are designed for the information of all persons who may have occasion to consult them, and hence the importance of the rule that a proceeding to correct an error in the record must be taken in the same case, (Crocker v. Allen, supra,) so that the inquirer may at once see that what purports to be a valid judgment is not so in fact. We do not think, therefore, that the defendant can be permitted, by way of defense to another proceeding, to set up an alleged error in the record, and hence any inquiry into the fact of service upon her of the summons under which the order of renewal was obtained in 1875 was not competent to the inquiry here presented.

The question, therefore, is narrowed down to the inquiry whether it appears by the record of the proceedings to renew the execution in 1875 that the court had then acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant in that proceeding. As will be seen by the indorsement found upon the notice or summons by which the proceeding to renew the execution in 1875 was inaugurated, which is copied above, the sheriff certified that by his special deputy he delivered a copy thereof to the defendant, and left the same with her, and it is contended by the appellant that it was no proof of service at all, and hence that the record does not show on its face that the defendant was properly made a party. The ground upon which this contention seems to be made is that, by section 161 of the Code in force at the time, proof of service of the summons must be made as follows: "(1) If served by the sheriff, his certificate thereof. (2) If served by any other person, his affidavit thereof." And, as there was no affidavit of the special deputy who made the service, (as it is assumed erroneously, as we think,) there was no legal proof of service. In the first place, it will be observed that section 161 relates solely to the service of a summons by which a civil action is commenced; and as the summons here in question was not issued for the commencement of a new action, but a mere continuance of the original action, (McDowall v. Reed, 28 S. C. 466, 6 S. E. Rep. 300,) it may well be questioned whether the legislature intended to require the same strictness of proof of service of a paper issued after the action was commenced as would be required for the service of a summons by which an action is commenced. But waiving this, and assuming, without deciding, for the present, that there is no difference in the requirement as to proof of service, it seems to us that the proof of service in this case was sufficient. Reading the indorsement according to its terms, it must be regarded as a certificate that the service was made by the sheriff, through his agent or "special deputy," as he is termed; and, under the maxim "qui facit per alium facit per se," it should be regarded as a certificate that the sheriff had made the service. The phraseology of the certificate is somewhat peculiar. "By my special deputy, Isham Drake, delivered a copy of this notice to Mary A. Dickson, personally; * * * left the same with her,"—signed by the sheriff in his official character, is equivalent to saying that he, by his agent, delivered the paper to the defendant, and left it with her, and that certainly would be a service by the sheriff. Suppose that the sheriff had handed the paper to Drake with a request to deliver it to defendant, who was present at the time, standing on the other side of Drake; would not that be a service by the sheriff? And, if necessary to sustain the return, the court would assume, after this lapse of time, that such were the facts. The extent to which the court has gone in order to give effect to a sheriff's return may be seen by reference to the case of Mathewson v. Moore, 2 McCord, 315, cited by respondent's counsel.

It is earnestly contended, however, by the counsel for appellant, that so much of the act of 1839 (11 St. 41) as provided for the appointment of a special deputy has been impliedly repealed by the act of 1870, (14 St. 332,) and expressly repealed by Gen. St. 1872, p. 829; and therefore there was no statute in force in 1875 authorizing the appointment of a special deputy at that time, and hence the alleged service by a special deputy of the summons to renew the execution in 1875 was illegal and void. This position is founded upon the erroneous assumption that a special deputy is an "officer," whereas, in fact, he is nothing more than an "agent" of the sheriff. Accordingly it has been held that even a minor, who is incapable of holding any office, may act as a special deputy of the sheriff, and service made by him is legal and valid. McConnell v. Kennedy, 29 S. C. 190, 7 S. E. Rep. 76; State v. Toland, 36 S. C. 520, 15 S. E. Rep. 599. See, also, to same effect, Railroad Co. v. Fisher, 109 N. C. 1, reported also in 13 S. E. Rep. 698. In the absence, therefore, of any statute forbidding the sheriff to act through an agent or special deputy, (and we know of no such statute,) the sheriff, like all other persons, may, and oftentimes must, act through the agency of another. It seems to us, therefore, that the record of the proceedings to renew the execution in 1875 shows on its face that the court had then acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and the order of Judge Townsend passed on the 10th September, 1875, rebuts the presumption of payment of the original judgment by adjudicating that the same was then still due and unpaid; and, as 20 years have not elapsed since the date of that adjudication, the said judgment, in the absence of any evidence (and there is none) of any payment thereon, must still be regarded as unsatisfied either in whole or in part. The cases of State v. Cohen, 13 S. C. 198, and Barron v. Dent, 17 S. C. 75, relied on by appellant's counsel, are not in point; for those cases originated in a trial justice's court, and, what is more important, the record in neither of those cases purported to show any service by any competent authority, or rather any service by a person who could prove the service except by affidavit, and no such affidavit appeared on the record. It follows, therefore, that there was no error on the part of Judge Witherspoon in granting the order for the renewal of the execution. This would be conclusive of the case, but it may be as well to refer briefly to some other points made by the grounds of appeal.

The fourth ground is based upon alleged error on the part of Judge Witherspoon in allowing the plaintiff in execution to testify that the judgment debt had never been paid. As we understand the law, it is always necessary for a plaintiff, when he applies for a renewal of execution, to satisfy the court that the amount due on the judgment is still unpaid, and in this view the testimony objected to was clearly competent. Besides, it was directly in reply to the plea of payment set up in the answer of the defendant.

The seventh ground of appeal takes exception to the form of the notice issued to renew the execution in 1875, and the point of the objection seems to be that such paper was not in the form, and did not contain the requisites, of a summons. We are not informed of any statute prescribing any form or any special requisites of a summons. As has been held in the case of Genobles v. West, 23 S. C. 154, a summons is a mere notice addressed to the defendant giving him information that a certain proceeding has been commenced for a certain purpose; and when the defendant was informed, by the notice here in question, that a motion would be made, at a specified time and place, "for an order to issue a new execution for the enforcement of the judgment above stated," it seems to us that all the essential requirements were complied with. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McGOWAN and POPE, JJ., concur.

NORFOLK & W. R. CO. v. WILSON.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1893.)

RAILROADS—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON TRACK.

Plaintiff, having started to cross two main tracks 50 feet east of a depot, saw a west-bound train moving on the northern track, and, thinking he could not cross in front of it, turned onto the east-bound track. He testified that he then looked west, and the track was clear to a curve 400 yards away; that he crossed the track diagonally to the south ends of the ties, and walked slowly east, watching the west-bound train, and waiting for it to pass; that after a few steps he was struck by the engine of an east-bound freight; that he heard no bell or whistle. Two of his witnesses swore that the whistle blew "about the depot," and a third was sure that, when plaintiff turned, the train was in sight and hearing. Defendant's evidence went to show that the whistle blew about the west end of the depot. The train was running 25 or 30 miles an hour. The place was not a regular crossing, but had long been used by foot passengers, with defendant's consent. Held, that plaintiff had failed to look and listen carefully enough, knowing, as he did, that he was on a main track.

Error to circuit court, Montgomery county.

In an action of trespass on the case, where in J. W. Wilson was plaintiff, and the Norfolk & Western Railroad Company was defendant, the defendant demurred to the evidence, and the jury thereupon conditionally assessed the plaintiff's damages at $680. The circuit court gave judgment on the demurrer for the plaintiff, to which judgment the company obtained a writ of error from one of the judges of this court. Reversed.

Plegar & Johnson, for plaintiff in error.
Hoge & Hoge and Penn & Cocke, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, P. The plaintiff was struck by a freight train on the defendant's tracks at Christiansburgh, and this action was brought to recover damages for the injuries thus inflicted. The company's tracks at this point run east and west, and there are two main tracks,—one for east-bound trains, the other for west-bound trains,—and there are one or more sidings. The accident occurred about 40 or 50 feet east of the depot building, which is on the south side of the tracks. The plaintiff's account of the matter is that, immediately before the accident, he started to cross the tracks, on his way to his boarding house, on the north side of the railroad; that, after he had partially crossed, he observed a west-bound train moving on the northern track, and, deeming it too near for him to safely cross in front of it, he turned, and stepped back on the middle, or east-bound, track; that, as he did so, he looked west to see if the track was clear, and no train was in sight between him and a certain curve in the road, about 400 yards west of him; that he then walked diagonally across the middle track to the southern ends of the cross-ties, upon which he slowly walked eastwardly, at the same time "watching the west-bound train, and waiting for it to get out of his way;" and that he had taken but a few steps when he was struck by the engine of an east-bound freight train, and seriously injured. He says, if the whistle was sounded or the bell rung before he was struck, he did not hear it. But two of his own witnesses say the whistle blew "about the depot;" and while a third, who was an eyewitness of the accident, says no signal was given, he is equally positive that the train had rounded the curve, and was in full sight and hearing, when the plaintiff turned to cross the middle track. The evidence for the defendant tended to show that an alarm whistle was sounded about the time the engine reached the west end of the depot, or more than 50 yards from the place of the accident. The train was running 25 or 30 miles an hour. About 50 yards west of the depot is a highway grade crossing; and a rule of the company provides that "the engine bell must be rung for a quarter of a mile before reaching every road crossing at grade, and until it is passed," which rule was not observed in the present case. The plaintiff, however, was not at this crossing, but over 100 yards east of it.

It appears that for many years before the accident the public had been in the habit of crossing the railroad, on foot, at the place of the accident, without objection by the company; that the spaces between the ties were filled with cinders; and that there was a wide and well-beaten path there. This acquiescence amounted to a license, and imposed upon the company the duty to exercise reasonable or ordinary care to avoid injuring pedestrians crossing at that point. Railroad Co. v. White, 84 Va. 498, 5 S. E. Rep. 573; Railroad Co. v. Carper, 88 Va. 556, 14 S. E. Rep. 328; Troy v. Railroad Co., 99 N. C. 298, 6 S. E. Rep. 77. But the plaintiff was, nevertheless, bound to take ordinary precautions for his own safety, and the necessity for his doing so was not relieved by negligence, if there was any, on the part of the company. It was his duty to listen, and to keep a constant lookout, for approaching trains, to make sure the track was safe. He admits he knew he was on one of the main tracks, over which east-bound trains pass at all hours; and had he exercised the vigilance the rule, in such a case, requires, instead of fixing his attention on the west-bound train, after he had changed his course to avoid it, he would not have been injured. It is unnecessary, therefore, to decide whether or not the company was negligent, for, be that as it may, the negligence of the plaintiff defeats a recovery. Railroad Co. v. Houston, 95 U. S. 697; Marks' Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 88 Va. 1, 13 S. E. Rep. 299; Hogan's Adm'r v. Tyler, (Va.) 17 S. E. Rep. 723. Judgment reversed.

JOHNSON v. NORTON LAND & IMP. CO.
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Sept. 12, 1893.)

APPEAL—RECORD—EVIDENCE.

In the absence of a bill of exceptions, agreed facts copied in the record by the clerk, and certified as the facts on which the judgment rested, cannot be considered, since the clerk has no power to add anything to the record.

Error to circuit court, Wise county; H. S. K. Morison, Judge.

Action by the Norton Land & Improvement Company to enforce a forfeiture of Mr. Johnson's title to certain land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Duncan, Mathews & Maynor, for plaintiff in error. Burns & Fulton, for defendant in error.

LACY, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the circuit court of Wise county rendered on the 12th day of December, 1892. The suit was instituted by the defendant in error company against the plaintiff in error to enforce a forfeiture of his title to a lot of land in the town of Norton because of a violation of a condition in the deed. The facts were agreed, and the forfeiture adjudged by the court. The defendant in the action thereupon applied for and obtained a writ of error to this court. There is no bill of exceptions in the case, and no evidence certified in the record, and no motion to set aside the finding of the court, (a jury being waived,) and no exception taken and certified by the court throughout the proceedings. There is nothing, therefore, by which this court can review the judgment. The case must be heard and considered in this court upon the errors apparent upon the face of the record. If no exceptions are taken to any supposed errors of the court which tries the case, these acts are not in the record, and cannot appear in the transcript thereof, and the party aggrieved remains, as at common law, without relief. 4 Minor, Inst. 728, 729. And this applies to the action of the court in refusing to set aside the judgment, and grant a new trial, because the same is contrary to the law and the evidence. The evidence cannot be reviewed by the court, because it is not in the record, and is not made a part of the record by bill of exceptions in any form; and a deposition taken in such case is not a part of the record, although copied in the transcript, and certified by the court, and certified by the clerk. It is not the province of the clerk to add anything to the record. Cunningham v. Mitchell, 4 Rand. (Va.) 189; Bowyer v. Chesnut, 4 Leigh, 1. In the case of Improvement Co. v. Karn, 80 Va. 592, this subject is fully considered, and the authorities controlling this question cited and approved. In that case the deposition taken in the case, and certified by the clerk, and affidavits filed in the case, and notices copied and certified by the clerk, were not considered by this court; this court saying of these they are not made a part of the record by the court, and it is not the province of the clerk to make anything a part of the record; his province is to copy the record as it is,—citing Judge Green as saying in Cunningham v. Mitchell, supra, that “the certificate of the clerk that these papers were the evidence upon which the judgment was founded cannot be received as part of the record. His certificate to that effect, can have no more effect than that of any other individual. He can certify that such records exist in his office, but not what use was made of them. That ought to have been shown by the record; and it was the duty of the party wishing to avail himself of the fact to have made it a part of the record.” Judge Tucker, P., said in Bowyer v. Chesnut, supra: “The evidence produced upon the trial can only be known by its being spread upon the record by bill of exceptions, or by the certificate of the judge himself.” 2 Bac. Abr. 527; 2 Minor, Inst. 428. The court sees nothing but the process, the pleadings, the verdict, and the judgment, (or the judgment when the jury was waived by the parties.) The certificate of counsel affords no evidence of evidence, of opinion expressed or evidence given, nor the certificate of the clerk of the papers produced before the jury, or the depositions read in the cause. Mr. Minor says, (4 Minor, Inst. 242:) “The record proper is nothing but the formal allegations or pleadings on either side, the issue, the impaneling of the jury, the verdict, and the judgment.” See, also, Magarity v. Shipman, 82 Va. 806, 7 S. E. Rep. 381. There is no question better settled in this court. It follows that the agreed facts copied in the record by the clerk, and certified as the facts upon which the judgment rested, cannot be considered here, and that the case cannot be reviewed here. We can therefore perceive no errors in record by which the judgment can be reversed. See, also, Scott v. Lloyd, 9 Pet. 418, (opinion of Chief Justice Marshall); Lawrence v. Com., 86 Va. 579, 10 S. E. Rep. 840; Offendinger v. Ford, 86 Va. 920, 12 S. E. Rep. 1; Fry v. Leslie, 87 Va. 275, 12 S. E. Rep. 671. In the case of Newberry v. Williams, (Va.) 15 S. E. Rep. 865, cited by counsel as the most recent adjudication upon the subject, it was held that, as there was no objection to the verdict at the proper time, this failure to object must be considered as a waiver of the exceptions taken during the trial. In this case there was no exception to the finding and judgment of the court, and for that reason, also, we are unable to review and correct the judgment, and the same must be affirmed.

McMAHAN v. MITCHELL.

EJECTMENT—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

On the evidence as a whole and the unmistakable merits of the controversy, the verdict of the jury was correct, and, although the court may have committed some immaterial errors, the denial of a new trial was also correct. The newly-discovered evidence could not rightly change the result.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Dale county; Thomas W. Milner, Judge.

Ejectment by L. C. Mitchell against Alexander Gibson and John McMahan. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant McMahan brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

An action of ejectment was brought by L. C. Mitchell against Alexander Gibson, tenant, the real defendant being McMahan. The petition was filed July 12, 1890. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and, defendant's motion for new trial being overruled, he excepted. The motion contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc. Also because the court erred in charging: “Permissive possession cannot be the foundation of a prescription until an adverse claim and actual notice to the other party;” alleged to be error because without evidence to justify it. Error in charging: “In order to perfect the defendant's title under these deeds, it must appear that he took possession under his deed in good faith, believing that he had good title thereunder, and that he kept possession in an open and notorious manner, and continuously, for seven consecutive years before the commencement of this suit, and that the possession of defendant must be for the whole of the seven years under a continuous claim of right;” alleged to be error as being misleading, and calculated to lead the jury to believe that, even if he went in in good faith, yet, if he afterwards learned his title was bad, it would vitiate his holding. Because the court, in charging as to character of possession, erred in charging: “Such acts as amount only to casual acts of trespass do not constitute the kind of possession on which prescriptive title can be perfected;” alleged to be error because without evidence on which to base it. In a note to this ground the court states that the charge complained of immediately followed this charge: “The possession must be continuous, open, and notorious, and of such character that the true owner might, by going on the premises, see that some one else is in adverse possession." Error in charging: "If the evidence shows that Gentry went into possession under plaintiff Mitchell, or went into possession under Morrison, who was authorized to put a tenant in possession, then such possession by Gentry constituted a break in defendant's possession, and he (defendant) cannot tack any possession he may have had before that time to his possession subsequently, to make up the requisite seven years;" alleged to be error because it affects McMahan by the acts of plaintiff's agent, who obtained permission of defendant to put the tenant in possession without disclosing anything about his instructions from plaintiff. Error in charging: "If Gentry went into possession as the tenant of plaintiff and defendant both, then this would also break the defendant's possession. Possession to support prescription must be exclusive during the whole term necessary to perfect his prescription, and, if he and plaintiff had a joint tenant, such possession would not be a possession on which prescription could be based;" alleged to be error for the same reason as stated in the exception to the charge last above mentioned, and because without evidence on which to base the charge as to a joint tenant. Error in charging: "When the party having the legal title is in possession, every one in possession without legal title is in law considered as holding under the party having the legal title;" alleged to be error because inapplicable to the facts, and because there was no evidence that plaintiff ever had possession. Error in refusing to give in charge the following written request of defendant: "If Gentry got permission of the defendant to take possession of the property as his tenant, and he so went into possession, it would not cause any break in defendant's possession, even if Gentry went in also by permission of Morrison, acting as agent for Mitchell, if the jury should find that Morrison got permission for Gentry to go in from defendant, and did not tell him that he was also putting Gentry in as tenant of Mitchell." Because of newly-discovered testimony. In support of this ground, defendant produced the affidavit of one Cummings that on November 2, 1883, Alexander Gibson was living on the land in dispute; also the affidavit of Tatum that Gibson was living on the land in the latter part of 1883; also the affidavit of W. G. Morrison that he was a witness and testified on the trial of the case, and that since he testified he has examined his old books, and now swears that Gentry went into the house on the land in the spring of 1883, and remained there until the latter part of the summer or fall of the same year; also affidavit of defendant and his counsel that they did not know that they could prove the facts shown by the affidavits above mentioned until after the trial of the case. It is proper to state the following, as bearing upon the question made as to newly-discovered evidence: It appeared on the trial, from the evidence for defendant, that the land in dispute was sold under a fi. fa. to W. U. Jacoway, March 2, 1880; that on March 6, 1880, Jacoway conveyed it by deed to McMahan; that defendant claimed to have bought the land in good faith, and without notice that the title was not good; that soon after his purchase he went into possession, and cut off wood from an acre or so, that in 1881 he cut off more, but put no house or fence on the land; that in the winter of 1881-82 he sold some iron ore from it to one Woolbright, and in the spring he and Woolbright built a house on it, which was occupied by men working for Woolbright in raising ore, and a small lot was also inclosed that year, the men living there until the fall; that, after this, defendant let a man named Davis live on it; that a few days after one would go out another would go in; that in the spring of 1883 a man named Gentry came to him, and got permission to go in the house, and stayed there until the summer or fall, and soon after he went out defendant rented it to Alexander Gibson, who paled in a garden, enlarged the inclosure, taking in three or four acres, and continued to live there until the spring of 1890, when he left, but left his daughter there, who has continued to live there until the present; that defendant has paid taxes on it all the time. Gibson testified that he moved to the county in the fall of 1882, and rented the place from McMahan, moved into the house, paled in a garden, cleared up and inclosed a field, and had been living on the land all the time up to the spring of 1890, when he left, leaving his daughter there, who lives there still. There was evidence by Mrs. Gentry that about May 15, 1883, her husband went into possession of the land as tenant for McMahan, and remained there until July 1, 1883; that he never went in as tenant of Mitchell, never knew such a man, or had any contract with him. Morrison testified, among other things, that in 1883 or 1884 plaintiff asked him to put some one in the house for him, but his recollection was he neither promised nor declined to do so, but wanted the house to put in a man who was working for him, (Morrison,) and, knowing that defendant claimed the land, went to defendant, and got permission from him to put the man in, and, under this authority from both parties, told Gentry to go into the house, which he did, but learned from Gentry that defendant had given Gentry permission to go in. Witness did not tell defendant anything about putting the man in as Mitchell's tenant; did not want to get into trouble with anybody. This was before August, 1883 or 1884. There was other evidence to the effect that it was in the spring of 1883, or before August, 1883, when Gentry went into possession under permission from defendant, and that Morrison said nothing to defendant about Mitchell giving him any authority to put Gentry in. Plaintiff testified that in March, 1884, the house was empty, and he authorized Morrison to put a tenant in the house for him, which Morrison promised to do.

R. J. & J. McCamy and W. U. & J. P. Jacoway, for plaintiff in error. McCutchen & Shumate, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

LANIER v. HUGULEY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 24, 1893.)

ANTENUPTIAL CONTRACT—ACTION AGAINST EXECUTOR—BURDEN OF PROOF—NEW TRIAL.

1. The instruction on the burden of proof, as applied to the facts of this case, was correct.

2. An executor who has notice of a debt outstanding against the testator, and who resists payment on the ground that the debt was discharged by the testator in his lifetime, cannot justify himself for the nonproduction of assets with which to pay it by setting up that he retained in his hands an ample amount of stock in a private corporation, and that, pending litigation which he inaugurated and carried on in resistance to the creditor's suit, the stock became depreciated in value, so as to be insufficient to satisfy the creditor. This is true, notwithstanding the will disposed of the whole estate, including the stock, by directing the executor to deliver the same to the legatees in kind.

3. In a suit by a widow against the executor of her husband on an antenuptial contract, neither the will of the husband nor any expressions of the testator contained therein can be used by the executor as evidence that the antenuptial contract was discharged by the testator in his lifetime.

4. There was no error in refusing to grant a new trial on any of the grounds stated in the motion.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Troup county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Action on a contract by Sallie H. Huguley against La Fayette Lanier, executor of the estate of George Huguley, deceased. Plaintiff had judgment, from which, and an order denying a new trial, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

P. H. Brewster, T. H. Whitaker, and R. A. S. Freeman, for plaintiff in error. F. M. Longley and N. J. & T. A. Hammond, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. George Huguley, in consideration of a marriage about to be solemnized between himself and Sallie White, made a contract with her wherein he agreed and directed that his executors should, of the first money coming into their hands of his estate, and as soon as it should come into their hands, after paying his debts, expenses of last sickness, and funeral expenses, pay over to his then widow $4,000. After his death the widow sued Lanier, the executor, upon this contract, and one of the pleas filed was that of payment. Upon this branch of the case the court charged the jury that, the burden being upon the defendant to prove the truth of the plea of payment, it must be shown by a preponderance of the evidence, or the plea would fail. This charge is alleged to be error. The plea of payment is an affirmative defense, and the Code (section 3758) declares that "the burden of proof generally lies upon the party asserting or affirming a fact, and to the existence of whose case or defense the proof of such fact is essential." The plaintiff tendered in evidence a valid subsisting contract calling for the payment of $4,000 by the executor. If payment had been made, as alleged in the defendant's plea, the burden was upon him to establish the fact to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of evidence. The party upon whom the law casts the burden of proof cannot make out his case or defense by evidence which simply raises a doubt as to the matter in issue, or leaves the proof equally balanced in the minds of the jury. See Tipplin v. Brockwell, 89 Ga. 467, 15 S. E. Rep. 539.

2. The executor also filed the plea of plene administravit, alleging therein, in substance, that, at the time notice of the plaintiff's demand was served upon him, he had in his hands assets of sufficient amount and value to pay all the claims against the estate; that he held certain factory stock worth $11,200, and other assets; that this stock had without fault on his part and unexpectedly, and by reason of the financial failure of the factory, become worthless; and that other debts of higher dignity would consume the other assets of the estate. The court was requested to charge that, if the allegations of this plea were established, the executor would not be liable. The request was refused, and the court charged to the contrary. The evidence in the record discloses that the executor took possession of a large amount of stocks and bonds at the death of the testator; that, in accordance with the will, he distributed these stocks and bonds in kind to the legatees; that, before this was done, he had notice of the widow's claim, and reserved 112 shares of factory stock to pay it in case the defense thereto was not successful; and that, pending the litigation over this claim, the stock became worthless, by reason of the failure of the manufacturing company. It was the duty of the executor to administer this estate, and for this purpose the law allowed him 12 months. It was his duty to convert the assets into cash, especially the surplus which he reserved after paying the bequests in kind as directed by the will. According to the allegations of the plea, the stock which he reserved to pay this debt in case his defense should not prevail was worth nearly $12,000. He should have converted enough of this into cash to pay the debt. The antenuptial contract, of which he had notice, was not payable in stock, but in cash, and he should have turned the stock into cash in order to make the payment when required of him. If, by reason of his failure to do this, he was unable to make the payment, the stock having become worthless while in his hands, the loss should not fall upon an innocent creditor, especially where nearly $100,000 in value was paid to the legatees while the litigation over this claim was pending. When an executor or administrator pays out money to heirs or legatees, or turns over assets to them, after he has notice of a claim against the estate, he does so at his own risk, and this is so, although the will may direct the executor to turn over the assets in kind to the legatees. In the case of McIntosh v. Hambleton, 35 Ga. 94, this court held: "Though an administrator is not liable for property lost or destroyed without fault on his part, he is bound to administer the estate according to law, by paying the debts before making distribution to legatees or heirs. This duty is enjoined upon him by law, by his oath of office, and by a sound public policy. An administrator who, with notice of an outstanding debt, paid to the heir, before the expiration of 12 months from the grant of administration, a portion of the estate, retaining, in slaves and other property, enough to meet said debt, is not protected against the creditor's claim by the results of the late war in the way of the abolition of slavery and the serious depreciation of the other assets retained. The administrator, in such case, must make good the deficiency caused by his own illegal act." See, also, Sharp v. Bonner, 36 Ga. 421.

3. As to the exclusion of the will as evidence that the contract was discharged in the lifetime of the testator, it is unnecessary to add anything to what is said in the third headnote to this opinion. There was no error in refusing a new trial on other grounds of the motion. Judgment affirmed.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY NEWS CO. v. RUSSELL.

WITNESS—SELF-CRIMINATION—EXTENT OF PRIVILEGE.

1. The privilege of a witness not to give testimony tending in any manner to criminate himself continues, although a prosecution for the offense would, if commenced after the time of testifying, be barred by the statute of limitations, unless it affirmatively appears that no prosecution against him, commenced in due time in any court having jurisdiction of the offense, is then pending.

2. From the interrogatories propounded to the witness in the present case, it sufficiently appears, in view of the statute of Alabama, that truthful answers to the same might tend to criminate him, and, this being so, the claim of privilege was properly allowed.

Fort & Watson, for plaintiff in error. B. P. Hollis and E. A. Hawkins, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. It appears from the record that Russell had been a locomotive engineer on a railroad in Alabama, and that on one occasion, while so employed, he left the depot in Birmingham, with his train, without orders to do so, and leaving the conductor of the train behind; that after running several miles he discovered that the conductor was missing, and thereupon started to back the train towards the depot, first sending Davis, a news agent who was on the train, to the rear, to act as watchman for him. While backing the train he came into collision with another train, and Davis was killed. It seems that a suit was instituted against the railroad company, in the state of Missouri, for the homicide of Davis, and the plaintiff in that suit sued out a set of interrogatories for Russell. Russell had in the mean time removed from Alabama to this state. When the interrogatories were presented to him, he refused to answer, and this fact was reported to the judge of the superior court of the circuit wherein Russell resided; and the judge, under section 3885 of the Code, required Russell to appear before him to show cause why he should not answer. Russell appeared, and in response to the rule stated that the answers to the interrogatories would tend to criminate him, under the laws of Alabama. The judge refused to compel him to answer, and the plaintiff in error excepted, and brought the case here for review.

It was claimed on the part of Russell that his answers would tend to criminate him under the following section of the Criminal Code of Alabama, (Code 1886, § 4110): "If from the negligence, carelessness or want of proper skill of any engineer or conductor having the control or management of any steam engine running on any railroad in this state, or any brakeman, the engine or cars are thrown off the track, or any other accident occurs, and the life of any human being is thereby endangered, such engineer, conductor or brakeman must, on conviction, be fined not less than five hundred nor more than two thousand dollars, and may also be imprisoned in the county jail or sentenced to hard labor for the county for not more than twelve months." The plaintiff in error insists that under section 3711 of the same Code, which declares that "the prosecution of all misdemeanors before the circuit, city or county court, unless otherwise provided, must be commenced within twelve months next after the commission of the offense," any prosecution of Russell under section 4110, above quoted, is barred,—the offense punishable by that section being a misdemeanor, and more than 12 months having elapsed since the homicide in question,—and therefore his answers could not tend to criminate him. We think it was not enough for the petitioner in the court below to show that the period of limitation prescribed by the statute had elapsed, but that he should have gone further, and shown affirmatively that no accusation had been preferred or no indictment found against Russell within that period in any court having jurisdiction of the offense, or that no prosecution was then pending. Until this is shown the privilege of the witness continues, and he cannot be compelled to answer any questions which would tend to criminate him under the statute. See Rap. Wit. (Ed. 1887.) p. 442, where it is said: "It is no answer to a witness' claim of privilege that the statute of limitations has run against the offense, unless it appears affirmatively that no proceedings to enforce a penalty were commenced within the period of limitation." If it is shown that the period of limitation has elapsed, and no indictment or accusation was preferred within that period, and none is pending, the witness cannot excuse himself on the ground that his answer would tend to criminate him.

2. Under section 4110 of the Code of Alabama, above quoted, it sufficiently appears that the answers of the witness to the interrogatories propounded might tend to criminate him. The court was therefore right in refusing to compel him to answer. Judgment affirmed.

CHAPMAN et al. v. ATLANTA GUANO CO.

ACTION ON NOTE—DEFENSE—FRAUD OF PLAINTIFF'S AGENT.

On the trial of an action upon a promissory note for $90.20, it was error to strike pleas alleging that the real consideration of the note was the price of certain guano sold to defendant for $53.10; that the signing of the note was induced by fraud on the part of plaintiff's agent, and done through mistake on the part of defendant; that the note was signed at night, when defendant could not well see, and he was informed by plaintiff's agent that it represented only the indebtedness above set forth, and upon that representation defendant signed it; and, further, that the note was made at night, when defendant signing it could not see the amount, but, relying on and having confidence in the plaintiff, defendant signed the same upon the representation that the note was for the account, at the price stated in the plea; that the note was procured by fraud or mistake, and is in excess of the amount due, $37.10, and defendant did not know said excess was in the note, when signing.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; Marshall J. Clarke, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by the Atlanta Guano Company against J. A. Chapman & Son. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Hutcheson & Key, for plaintiffs in error.
Geo. S. Thomas, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. The question made in this case is a close one, concerning which we have been unable to reach a perfectly satisfactory conclusion. We have endeavored, however, to follow what seems to be the true spirit of previous adjudications by this court, and in so doing have decided that the merits of the defendants' pleas, the substance of which is set forth in the headnote, should have been submitted to the jury. The two cases most like the case at bar are those of Bostwick v. Duncan, 60 Ga. 383, and Angier v. Brewster, 69 Ga. 362. Both came from Spalding county, and in each the action was brought upon a promissory note given for the purchase of guano. At first glance, the two cases cited do not seem to be in harmony. We think, however, having reference to the particular facts upon which the decision in each of them was based, they may be reconciled, and that our ruling in the case now before us can be upheld, consistently with both. In the Bostwick Case the pleas of the defendant alleged that the plaintiffs, by one W. T. Cole, "obtained said note by fraudulent representations, saying the same was an ordinary guano note; that, relying upon said agent, he [defendant] did not read the same, or have the same read, said agent saying, 'Sign note,—that is all right,' and defendant signed the same, not knowing that plaintiff did not — the same, and, shortly before signing, said agent saying, if the guano was not good, not to pay for the same;" that "at the date of said note said agent sent to defendant the note sued on, and represented that he desired to close up the contract as to the purchase of said guano, as made with said defendant, relying upon the contract made at the time of said purchase, with said agent, and believing that the said guano note, so presented to be signed, contained only the terms of ordinary guano notes, and in which ordinary notes only the cotton option delivery and the waiver of homestead were contained, said defendant, without reading said note sued on, but relying on the contract and agreement in said note contained as being the same existing in parol, made and signed said note." The plea still further alleged that by the fraudulent conduct and representation of plaintiff's agent, as before alleged, the conditions and terms of the note were falsely and fraudulently imposed on defendant as to the clause, "without warranty of vendor, and with all faults, and at purchaser's risk," to which he never really assented. A close inspection of these pleas will show that the defendant does not assert that the plaintiff's agent represented to him that the note in question did or did not contain any particular statement or stipulation. According to these pleas the plaintiff's agent merely characterized the note as "an orduary guano note," and he might have been perfectly honest in entertaining this opinion of the note, as it stood. The defendant did not take the trouble to inquire of the agent what he meant by the expression, "an ordinary guano note," nor did he inform the agent what his (defendant's) idea of such a note was. The defendant, with equal good faith, might have had an entirely different conception from that entertained by the plaintiff's agent of what constituted "an ordinary guano note." Indeed, the expression is certainly ambiguous, and does not convey any very clear idea of the kind of note sought to be described. The writer would find it a very difficult, if not impossible, task to accurately define what is "an ordinary guano note." It therefore does not appear by these pleas that the plaintiff's agent made the defendant any clear and definite statement as to the contents of the note in question, or that the statements he did actually make could, with any fairness, be said to have been made with intent to defraud. Again, it would seem that the plaintiff's agent was not present when the note was actually executed. The plea says the agent sent the note to defendant some time after the guano was purchased, and that defendant, without reading it, signed it upon the faith of the representations made by the agent at the time of the purchase as to the character of the note he would take. Certainly, under all these circumstances, there was no excuse whatever for not reading the note before signing the same, and accordingly this court declared, through Chief Justice Warner, that the pleas were bad, and that it was not the duty of courts to relieve parties from the results of their own gross negligence. In the Angier Case the purchaser of the guano read the note, and objected to signing it, so long as certain stipulations remained in it. The plaintiff's agent then agreed to strike the same out, and with a pen pretended to do so, but in fact struck out some other portion of the note. The defendant, relying upon the honesty of the agent, and seeing him apparently make the correction desired, signed the note without taking the pains to see if the proper erasure had been made. Here there was an actual, positive, and inexcusable fraud perpetrated upon the defendant by the plaintiff's agent. Accordingly, this court held that the plea was not demurrable, and could be sustained by parol evidence; Speer, J., stating the rule to be that "parol evidence would be admissible under a plea alleging fraud, where the fraud charged is some device or trick by which either stipulations were fraudulently left in a paper, which it was expressly agreed should be left out, or where it was agreed the stipulations should be inserted, and they were fraudulently left out." This rule seems to be founded upon the idea that one is not bound to exercise, as against actual, deliberate, and palpable fraud, that degree of diligence which could reasonably be expected and required when persons are dealing with each other at arm's length, and when each is expressing to the other his mere opinions with regard to the transaction in which they are mutually engaged. The distinction, therefore, between the two cases, may be said to be that in one the defendant acted with the grossest kind of negligence, without attempting to inform himself what the plaintiff's agent really meant by using certain words of description, and, very probably, without himself having any clear or definite conception of what those words meant, while in the other the plaintiff's agent practiced upon the defendant a fraudulent trick, and the latter was deceived and injured by relying upon the good faith and honesty of the agent, who, well knowing of the confidence reposed in him, deliberately and willfully took undue advantage of the same. The present case more closely resembles the latter of these two cases. The pleas, in effect, state that the plaintiff's agent represented the note to be for $53.10, while in point of fact it turned out to be a note for $90.20. This was not a matter for a mere difference of opinion. If the pleas speak the truth, the plaintiff's agent perpetrated a palpable fraud upon the defendants, involving nothing short of actual dishonesty. It is true that in the last plea the defendants aver that the note was signed upon the representation that it was for the amount at the price stated in the plea, to wit, $53.10, without alleging by whom this representation was made; but, construing all the pleas together, we think it was sufficiently alleged that the representation in question was made by the plaintiff's agent, and that the note was signed upon the faith of this representation. In our opinion, therefore, this case is clearly distinguishable from that of Bostwick v. Duncan, supra, as to the character of the representations made by the plaintiff's agent, and the tendency of these representations to mislead and deceive the defendants. We also think it is distinguishable from the case last mentioned upon the question of diligence. In the former case no reason whatever was given for failing to read the note, except that the defendant chose to rely upon the agent's statement as to what kind of a note it was. In the case at bar one of the pleas alleges that the note was signed at night, when defendant signing the same could not well see, and another avers that the note was made at night, when defendant could not see the amount. These allegations, it is true, are not strong. They do not show that a light might not easily have been obtained, if the defendant had desired it, or that there was any haste about the transaction, or that the plaintiff's agent urged or requested an immediate execution of the note, or did anything, except the making of the representations complained of, to prevent the defendant from fully informing himself of the amount set forth in the note. Still, we think the pleas contain enough to authorize the case to be submitted to a jury, and allow them to determine whether or not a fraud was actually practiced upon the defendant. We are fully aware of the great importance of the rule that persons who are diligent in having their contracts reduced to writing ought to be amply protected, and that, generally, neither by plea nor by the introduction of parol evidence should a party be permitted to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written instrument. But we do not understand the law to cut off defendants from pleading and proving actual frauds upon them by the insertion in written contracts of something which one of the parties well knew could not be honestly incorporated in it, and which the other party never intended should be embraced within its terms. If, in the present case, the defendants did not actually owe the plaintiff more than $53.10, and if the amount of $90.20 was dishonestly inserted in the note, and the defendants signed the note under the circumstances set forth, in ignorance of this fact, they ought not to be compelled to pay the larger amount. As already stated, the question with which we have here attempted to deal is not free from doubt or difficulty, but we have endeavored to follow what we regard as the safer and better course. It will be observed that, even under the law as we have ruled it, the plaintiff will still have the advantage of making out a prima facie case by the introduction of its written contract, and the burden will rest upon the defendants to establish, by a preponderance of the testimony, the fraud complained of, if it in fact exists. We express no opinion as to the merits of this particular case, but leave the same to be determined by the jury at the next trial, in view of the evidence which may be offered in support of the pleas, and of the evidence with which the same may be met by the plaintiff. Judgment reversed.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — ALTERATION — EFFECT — PLEADINGS.

1. Where a promissory note due at a future time did not when executed specify any place of payment, nor any rate of interest from date, it is materially altered by inserting the name of a bank, which name includes the location of the bank, as the place of payment, and 6 as the rate per cent. of interest from date. This is true although the body of the note was printed, and blank spaces were left in the printing for expressing a place of payment and rate of interest. With these spaces unfilled, the note would be payable generally, and not at any particular place, and would bear no interest at any rate whatever until after maturity.

2. A special plea on oath offered in due time as an amendment to a plea of non est factum should have been allowed if it had been pleaded as a partial defense only, the same alleging that "the note, the foundation of plaintiff's action, has been altered or changed since signed by defendant, and without defendant's knowledge, consent, or authority, in this: that, as signed, the note was payable generally, and not at any bank, whereas it is now, as altered or changed, made payable to National Bank of Dalton; further, defendant says said note when signed did not have on its face the figure 6 between the words "at" and "per," but that same has been added since signed, without defendant's knowledge, consent, or authority." The effect of the plea, if sustained by evidence, would be only to defeat the action as to interest from the date to the maturity of the note, there being in the plea no allegation that either of the alterations was made by a person claiming a benefit under the note, with intent to defraud the defendant. In order to render the note void, these allegations as to one or both of the alterations would have to be made and supported by proof. Code, § 2832. As the plea was to the whole action, and set up that the note was void by reason of the alteration, and was not insisted upon as a partial defense only, there was no error in striking the same.

3. Where a plea of non est factum has been filed to a suit on a promissory note, the note is admissible in evidence upon proof of the defendant's admission that he signed it, and without explanation of any of its contents, which do not appear as alterations on the face of the note.

4. The court did not err in overruling the certiorari, inasmuch as the special plea stricken was not a defense to the whole action, and was not pleaded or insisted upon as a partial defense only.

Error from superior court, Gordon county; T. W. Milner, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by Anderson & Bros. against J. T. Gwin. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

W. R. Rankin, for plaintiff in error. O. N. Starr and R. J. & J. McCamy, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, J. This was an action in a justice's court on a promissory note in the following words and figures: "Gordon County, State of Georgia, Aug. 7th, 1890. $36.00. On or before the first day of August, 1891, I promise to pay L. Cahill & Co., or bearer, without offset, thirty-six dollars, at Nat. Bank of Dalton, value received. If paid at maturity, interest at six per cent. from August 1st, 1891; but if not paid when due interest at six per cent. per annum from date until paid. Homestead and all other exemption waived by the maker and each indorser. [Signed] J. T. Gwin." To this action the defendant filed a plea, in which he alleged that the note had been altered or changed since signed by the defendant, and without his knowledge, consent, or authority, in this: that, as signed, the note was payable generally, and not at any bank, whereas it is now, as altered or changed, made payable at the National Bank of Dalton; and that when signed it did not have on its face the figure 6 between the words "at" and "per," but that the same has been added since signed, without his knowledge, consent, or authority, whereby his liability is increased, and, under the law, he ought not to be held liable for any sum. Upon demurrer this plea was stricken. The plaintiff proved the execution of the note, and then offered it in evidence. The introduction of the note was objected to by the defendant, and the objection was overruled. The justice rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant sued out a certiorari to the superior court, and on the trial of the case in that court the certiorari was overruled. The defendant excepted, and brought the case here for review.

1. It appears that this note, when executed, did not specify any place of payment, or any rate of interest from date. The place of payment, as well as the rate of interest from date, was afterwards inserted. This, in our opinion, was a material alteration. As originally executed, the note was payable generally, and not at any particular place; and, not containing, when executed, any rate of interest from date, it would not have borne any interest at all until after maturity. The fact that the body of the note was printed, and blank places left for expressing a place of payment and rate of interest, would not authorize the holder of the note to fill these blanks. There is some conflict in the decisions of different courts on this subject, but we think the sounder and better view is that the filling of these blanks, as above stated, was a material alteration of the note.

2. Section 2852 of the Code declares: "If a written contract be altered intentionally, and in a material part thereof, by a person claiming a benefit under it, with intent to defraud the other party, such alteration voids the whole contract, at the option of the other party. If the alteration be unintentional, or by mistake, or in an immaterial matter, or not with intent to defraud, if the contract, as originally executed, can be discovered, and is still capable of execution, it will be enforced by the court. If the alteration be made by a stranger, and not at the instance or by collusion of a party or privy, if the original words can still be restored, the contract will be enforced." When, therefore, a party sued upon a written contract seeks to avoid it entirely by setting up that it was altered in a material part, he must allege in his plea that the alteration was made by a person claiming a benefit under the contract, and with intent to defraud. If this allegation is made, and is sustained by proof, he will not be held liable for any amount on the contract. If the alteration is unintentional, or made by mistake, or in an immaterial matter, and without intent to defraud, the court will enforce it, if the original contract can be discovered, and is capable of execution. Lowry v. McLain, 75 Ga. 372, (3.) The plea above set out not alleging that the alterations were made by a person claiming a benefit under the contract, and with intent to defraud, and no proof being offered to show these facts, the court did right in holding that the note was not void. The effect of the plea, as above set out, if sustained by evidence, would be to defeat the action as to interest from the date to the maturity of the note; but it was not insisted on as a partial defense, or as a defense to the amount of interest. The defense relied upon being that the defendant was not liable for any amount on the note, because of the material alterations therein, and the plea not containing the allegations required by the Code, the court did right in striking the plea.

3. In order to meet the plea of non est factum, the plaintiff proved by a witness that the defendant had admitted signing the note. When this was done, it was admissible in evidence without any explanation of its contents, which do not appear as alterations on the face of the note.

4. Inasmuch as the plea stricken was not a defense to the whole action, and was not pleaded or insisted upon as a partial defense only, the court did not err in overruling the certiorari. Judgment affirmed.

THOMAS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 26, 1893.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — SPECIAL ACTS — FENCES — IMPOUNDING ANIMALS — HOMICIDE — SELF-DEFENSE — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The act of November 26, 1890, amending the fence laws of the state, and repealing section 1449 of the Code, is a general law, and is constitutional. A part of its effect is to apply the prior laws on the subject of impounding stock to the new conditions established by the amending act in all counties in which those conditions prevailed when that act was passed. One of these being the county of Monroe, live stock running at large in that county on the premises of any person other than the owner in the month of October, 1891, could be lawfully taken up and impounded.

2. Inasmuch as the facts recited in the following instructions to the jury would not only negative the offense of murder on the part of David Thomas, the accused, but would equally negative the offense of manslaughter, it was error to enumerate these facts, and restrict them to the element of murder alone, without elsewhere in the charge informing the jury with equal explicitness that they were alike applicable to the element of manslaughter; in other words, that, if these facts were found to exist, the accused would be guilty of no crime whatever. The instructions referred to were as follows: "If you believe from the evidence that the Thomases went to the house of Gossett to break the pound, and did nothing more, went there with the purpose of repossessing themselves of the property peaceably, to negotiate terms by which they could regain possession of the property without any violence, then if Gossett drew a gun, or if Gossett was manifestly intending or endeavoring to kill or to commit a felony upon the person of John Thomas, then John Thomas would have the right to defend himself by using such force as would prevent such an injury; and if a struggle ensued to prevent such an injury, and the gun was fired accidentally, or if it was discharged without any fault or intention on the part of any person engaged in the struggle to discharge the gun, then, although Dave Thomas may have joined in the struggle, you would not be authorized to convict him of the crime of murder." On account of this error alone the court erred in not granting a new trial, the other grounds of the motion for a new trial not embracing any cause for reversing the judgment.

Error from superior court, Monroe county; James S. Boynton, Judge.

David Thomas having been convicted of a homicide, and his motion for a new trial having been overruled, he brings error. Reversed.

Berner & Bloodworth and Hall & Hammond, for plaintiff in error. James J. Hunt, Sol. Gen., and Stewart & Daniel, for the State.

SIMMONS, J. 1. The act approved November 26, 1890, amending the fence laws of the state, and repealing section 1449 of the Code, (Acts 1890-91, vol. 1, p. 69,) is a general law, and is constitutional. It operates generally throughout the whole state. Every county in the state may avail itself of the provisions of this act, and of the one of which it is amendatory. Whenever and wherever an election is held, and fences are abolished by a vote of the people, this act applies. No county or section of the state is excluded from its operation. All that is necessary to put it in force in any county is to comply with the requirements of the act of which it is amendatory. It is very similar in its provisions to the local option act, which has been held by this court to be a general law and constitutional. Crabb v. State, 88 Ga. 584, 15 S. E. Rep. 455. Being an amendment to the original act, it takes the place of the section in the Code repealed by it, and becomes a part of that act. Its provisions went into effect immediately in all those counties which had attempted to abolish fences, but had not succeeded on account of the want of legislative power to pass special acts for particular counties. The same provisions are likewise applied to other counties when they hold elections and abolish fences by popular vote. When this is done according to the requirements of the original act, the boundary lines of each lot or tract of land will be a lawful fence. In the same manner the act went into immediate operation in all those counties which had attempted to abolish fences by special legislative enactment, and the provisions of the original act in regard to impounding stock were applied to the new condition established by the amending act in all those counties, and the same provision will apply in all counties which hereafter adopt the act by popular vote. Monroe county being one of those which had attempted to abolish fences by a special act, the amending act went into effect immediately in that county, and live stock running at large in the county on the premises of any person other than the owner in the month of October, 1891, could be lawfully taken up and impounded. There was, therefore, no error in refusing the request to charge on this subject made by counsel for the accused.

2. We think the court erred in the charge set out in the second headnote of this opinion. We are of the opinion that, if the jury should believe the facts recited in this charge, they would be authorized and required to find the defendant not guilty. This charge instructs them that they could not on the hypothesis therein stated find him guilty of murder. It should have gone further, and negatived the idea of manslaughter, as well as murder, and it was error to restrict the jury to the element of murder alone, as they might have inferred from this charge that the court intended to do. Limiting them to the element of murder might have been understood as equivalent to saying that they might find the defendant guilty of manslaughter upon the facts recited. The court ought to have instructed the jury that, if these facts were true, they should acquit the defendant. We think this error requires the grant of a new trial. Speaking for myself, I think the refusal of the court to continue the case on account of the sickness of the leading counsel for the accused was also error, but in this the other members of the court do not concur. I think when a party makes a motion for a continuance on account of the absence of his leading counsel, and makes the proof required by section 3525 of the Code, the judge has no discretion in the matter, no more than he has when proof is made that a party is providentially prevented from attending the trial of the cause. Section 3524 of the Code declares that, if either party shall be providentially prevented from attending at the trial of any cause, "such cause shall be continued," when the proper showing is made. Section 3525 provides that, where certain facts appear, the illness or absence of counsel from providential cause "shall be a sufficient ground for continuance." My brethren differ from me in this view, and think continuances should be controlled by section 3531, which declares that "all applications for continuances are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and, if not expressly provided for, shall be granted or refused as the ends of justice may require," and that, under the special facts of this case, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing the continuance.

The other grounds of the motion for a new trial do not embrace any cause for reversing the judgment. Judgment reversed.

MILLER et ux. v. SMYTHE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. June 5, 1893.)

TRUSTEE AS LANDLORD—FAILURE TO REPAIR—LIABILITIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

1. Where a trustee legally and rightfully assumes, in his representative capacity, the relation of landlord, he is liable, in that capacity, to answer to the tenant for the violation of any duty which the general law attaches as an incident to that relation. Accordingly, where a trustee, duly authorized, rented a store belonging to the trust estate, and in the contract of rental agreed to keep the shelving in the store in thorough order and repair, the trust estate is liable for damages occasioned by his failure so to do.

2. Whether or not there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff, causing or contributing to the injury complained of, is a question for the jury; the declaration imputing negligence to the defendants, and not conceding, directly or by necessary implication, any on the part of the plaintiff.

Error from city court of Richmond; W. F. Eve, Judge.

Action by Mary D. Smythe against L. J. Miller, trustee, and Mrs. Miller, for damages for failure to repair leased premises. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

The declaration of Mary D. Smythe against Miller, trustee, and Mrs. Miller, his cestui que trust, was demurred to by defendants, which demurrer was overruled, and to this ruling defendants excepted. The petition alleged: Petitioner rented from the trustee, and was in possession of, a store described, and the shelving against the walls therein, from October 1, 1890, to October 1, 1891, for carrying on the crockery business therein,—which was known to defendants,—for $1,500 per year, the trustee agreeing to keep the store and shelving in thorough order and repair. Petitioner carried a large stock, and placed and displayed it upon the counters and shelving, and on November 12, 1890, had a large quantity of the goods upon the shelves placed against the western wall of the store, when, without cause or negligence on her part, the shelving broke, fell, and destroyed a large quantity of her stock, which had been placed thereon for safety and display in the usual course of business. At the time of the renting of the store to petitioner, the shelving was rented with it, and was, to all outward appearance, in good condition, and suited to the use intended, but, for some reason unknown to her, bulged out from the wall half an inch, in which condition the attention of her landlord was called thereto by her as soon as it was discovered, and he agreed to fix it, but before doing so it fell. He agreed to make all repairs to keep the store in the condition in which it was rented. The notice mentioned was given him some time in the summer, after she had re-rented for the next year, to strengthen the shelving in the store; and a day or so before November 12, 1890, when the bulging was discovered, notice was again given to him, and he agreed to fix it, but did not do so at the very time it was necessary. In the contract of rental, he did not allow her to make the repairs for him. A short time prior to the fall, her agent in charge of the store inspected the shelving, and came to the opinion it was not strong enough, and called upon Miller, brought him to the store, and showed him the same. He (Miller) said it was secure, but that, in any event, he would have it repaired and strengthened, since it had been there some time. Petitioner relied upon this promise, but Miller never carried it out, and failed to keep the shelving in proper repair. Petitioner did not put upon the shelving any greater strain than had been put upon it many times before, but, after discovering the bulging, lightened the weight on the shelving; but notwithstanding this precaution the shelving fell, and broke other goods placed on tables in front of the shelving, by means whereof her business was interrupted, goods destroyed, etc., to her damage $2,500. The declaration described the manner in which the trust estate was created, and alleged that the store and property of the estate were worth $15,000, yielded a net income of about $1,800, and an encroachment upon the corpus was necessary and proper in order to pay petitioner's damages; that the financial condition in life of the cestui que trust was of the best, and her wants not sufficient to absorb all of the income; that her husband was well off, and they had no children. The terms of the trust deed were set forth, and it was alleged that the trustee had authority under it to buy, sell, etc., the trust estate, privately or publicly, and otherwise manage and control it, at his discretion; that the trust estate and cestui que trust obtained the benefit of the contract of rental, and have received the rental from petitioner, including the year in which the loss occurred, and failed to keep the store and shelving in repair, as required by law and the contract of rental. The grounds of demurrer were: (1) Because the declaration set out no cause of action; (2) because, if the acts specified made a cause of action against the trustee, the trust estate was not liable for the acts of the trustee set out in the declaration; (3) because the trustee was individually liable for the acts complained of, if any one was so liable; (4) because the declaration showed plaintiff was guilty of such negligence she cannot recover.

J. R. Lamar, for plaintiffs in error. W. K. Miller, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. The error complained of is the overruling of a demurrer to the plaintiff's declaration. The substance of the declaration, and of the demurrer thereto, will be found in the reporter's statement. The main contention of the plaintiff in error was that a trust estate could not be subjected to damages resulting from the negligence of the trustee, whether the same be regarded as a breach of contract, or as a breach of duty amounting to a tort. It was insisted that, under section 3377 of the Code, there could be no recovery against a trust estate except "for services rendered to said estate, or for articles, or property, or money, furnished for the use of said estate." The section declares that any person having against a trust estate a claim of the kind indicated by the words just quoted, "or where a court of equity would render said estate liable," may proceed at law for the collection of the debt. The words last quoted are of considerable importance, and the entire section simply means that any person having a valid claim against a trust estate may collect and enforce the payment of the same without resorting to a court of equity; and the section does not limit the liability of trust estates to the payment of such claims, only, as are indicated by the words first quoted. Besides, under the uniform procedure act of October 24, 1887, there can be no doubt of the right to proceed by a petition at law, with proper allegations, to enforce any kind of a just demand against a trust estate. The real question, therefore, is, can the trust estate, in the present case, be made liable for damages occasioned by the failure of the trustee to repair and put in safe condition the shelving in the store rented to the plaintiff. It will be observed that the declaration expressly alleges the trustee agreed to keep the store and shelving in thorough order and repair. Even without this distinct agreement, it would, under section 2284 of the Code, have been the duty of the trustee, as landlord, to keep the premises in proper repair. There can be no doubt that Mr. Miller, as trustee, had authority to rent the premises to the plaintiff. He therefore, legally and rightfully, in his capacity as trustee, assumed the relation of landlord; and, this being true, it is, to our minds, a plain proposition, both of law and of justice, that he was bound to perform the duty enjoined by statute upon all landlords, of keeping the premises in repair, and especially so when he expressly undertook, by agreement with his tenant, so to do. It follows, necessarily, that he is, in his representative capacity, liable to the plaintiff for a violation of this duty, and of the contract he made in pursuance thereof. And this is right, because the trust estate obtained the benefit of the contract made by the trustee, and should, as to the tenant, bear whatever burden the law imposes upon landlords. As to the ultimate liability, if any, of the trustee to the cestui que trust, for his failure to perform his duty in the respect indicated, we are not now called upon to determine. We simply hold that, if the plaintiff supports by evidence the allegations of her declaration, she is entitled to a judgment subjecting the trust estate to whatever damages she may have sustained.

2. It was also contended that the plaintiff ought not to recover because her declaration sets forth facts which show that her own negligence either wholly caused, or very largely contributed to, the injury complained of. We do not think this a fair construction of the declaration. It expressly alleges that, "without cause or negligence on her part, the said shelving broke, fell down, and destroyed a large quantity of her stock," etc. In view of this allegation, and also of the fact that the declaration nowhere concedes, either directly or by necessary implication, that there was any fault or negligence on her part, it is, in our opinion, a question for the determination of a jury as to whether or not her conduct caused the injury, or contributed thereto, and, if so, to what extent. Judgment affirmed.

WOOD et al. v. HAYNES et al.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—SCHEDULES—OMISSIONS—SETTING ASIDE ASSIGNMENT—INJUNCTION—RECEIVER.

1. Omissions from and inaccuracies in the schedule of assets and schedule of creditors which the law requires to be attached to a voluntary assignment by an insolvent debtor may or may not be sufficient to invalidate the assignment. It is impracticable to lay down any rule as to what may be safely omitted from such schedules. In each particular case the question should be determined with reference to the number, materiality, and importance of the omissions, and whether they were made by oversight and inadvertence, or deliberately, and with intention to defraud. In applications for injunction and receiver, the determination of this question is addressed to the sound discretion of the presiding judge. Intention to defraud in any material matter whatever will always vitiate the assignment.

2. In the present case there was no abuse of discretion in granting the injunction against the assignee as such, or in appointing the same person receiver to take charge of and hold the assets until the final hearing.

(a) At the final hearing, the jury, under proper instructions from the court, and in view of all the surrounding facts and circumstances, should decide whether or not the assignment should be set aside.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Cherokee county; G. F. Gober, Judge.

Action by Haynes, Henson & Co. and others against Wood & Lovingood to set aside an assignment for benefit of creditors, and for injunction and receiver. Injunction was granted, and a receiver appointed pending final hearing. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

On November 3, 1892, Wood & Lovingood filed an assignment executed by them for the benefit of creditors to William Galt. On January 14, 1893, Haynes, Henson & Co., Everett, Ridley, Ragan & Co., and the Beck & Gregg Hardware Company, creditors, brought their petition to set aside the assignment as null and void, and for injunction and receiver. The injunction was granted, and William Galt was appointed receiver to hold the assets of the defendants under order of the court until the final hearing. To this decision the defendants excepted. The assignment conveys all the goods, etc., specified in the attached schedule, in trust to sell, sue for, demand, receive, and recover all such sums of money as may be due and payable thereon, and after paying all reasonable and proper costs, charges, and expenses, including a reasonable fee for the services of P. P. Du Pre, attorney, for writing the deed and schedule, to pay to each and all of the assignor's creditors that may be due and owing to them from the schedule attached; and, if the proceeds of said goods, etc., be not sufficient to pay off all creditors, then to pay them pro rata, except $126.60, to J. and Mrs. M. Galt and Mrs. M. Roberts, which is preferred, etc. The petition alleges that the assignment is absolutely null and void, for the following reasons: The assignment failed and neglected to make a full and complete schedule of their creditors. The schedule filed by them does not contain the names of the following creditors: E. A. Fincher, $13.50; B. F. Perry, $25.98; R. T. Jones & Co., $32.64; H. H. Davis, $2.10; J. D. Johnson, $6; Lamar Rankin Drug Company, $6.98; Jack Payne, $4; J. H. Kilby, $1.98; A. B. Coggins, $6. The amounts due the creditors as stated in the schedule are incorrect, in this: The amount due Everett, Ridley, Ragan & Co. is stated to be $936. In fact the assignors owed them $990, besides interest. The amount due J. J. & J. E. Maddox is stated in the schedule to be $360. In fact the assignors owed them only $328.20. The amount due John Silvey & Co. appears in the schedule to be $160.90. In fact the assignors owed them $190, besides interest. The schedule of assets is incorrect and incomplete, and does not contain all the assets of the assignors. They operated two stores in Cherokee county, in which they carried on a general mercantile business,—one in the town of Canton, and the other at Pitts' old stand, about 10 miles away. When the assignment was made, no inventory of the goods and other assets in the storehouse at Pitts' old stand was made, but the assignors made what purported to be an inventory by guessing at the goods contained in that store, which purported inventory is incorrect, incomplete, and utterly unreliable. It does not contain a full and complete inventory of the goods. It is impossible to specify in what respect it is incomplete, and to enumerate the particular goods that are not enumerated therein, for the reason that no complete and correct inventory of the goods was ever taken. The purported inventory, as filed, contains goods and assets of the value of $696.42, when in fact the assignors did not have assets of any such amount, but only goods of the value of about $400. They owned a large lot of peas, which were not measured, and the amount and value of which were not correctly stated in the inventory. The paper purporting to contain a list of their notes and accounts is incorrect and incomplete. W. C. Harralson was indebted to them $5.23, besides interest, for which they had his note, which was not listed in the schedule. W. A. Davis owed them $10.40, besides interest, for which they held his note, which also was not listed; and so as to an open account for $4.50 due by A. B. Coggins. The petition also charges that the assignors, and each of them, are hopelessly insolvent, and that the assignee accepted the trust, took charge of the assets, disposed of the goods and merchandise to the amount of $300 or other large sum, which he has in his possession, and that he has other assets undisposed of, of the value of $500 or other large sum.

The defendants, in their answer, set up the following: The schedules were as full and complete as they were able to give at the time of the making of the assignment. They deny any intention or purpose to defeat or injure any of their creditors. The creditors that were not listed were very small, and were not on the books on which the names of their creditors were kept, except E. A. Fincher, whose name is found on the book with that of J. Allen, Smith & Co., and the account is so stated. When the book was inspected in getting up the list of creditors, the name of Fincher was overlooked. The amount due him is only $8.10, as shown by said book and by the statement submitted by him to the assignee. The claim of H. H. Davis for $2.10 on duebill was correct. The duebill was given for chickens bought of him with the understanding that the price was to be liquidated in trade at the store; and it was given by Lovingood, one of the firm, at the Canton store, in the absence of Wood, who had charge of the business in Canton generally, while Lovingood operated the store at Pitts' old stand. Lovingood failed to enter the duebill on any book. When the schedule of creditors was made out, Wood gave out the list of creditors for the business of Canton, and did not know of this duebill. According to the best of their knowledge, and according to their own books, the assignors owed nothing to the Lamar Rankin Drug Company. They owed A. B. Coggins nothing. Jack Payne owed them an account.

They were not indebted to him as charged, but there was due him on some barter $1.77, which had not been credited on his account. The amount due B. F. Perry, as shown by their books, was a credit of $11.23. He had done some advertising and job work for them, and the amount of his charges was not known to them; but, on investigation, they found that the amount due him is $7.96, which they did not know was due at the time of making the assignment. It is not true that they owed R. T. Jones & Co. $32.00. On the contrary, they owed them only 30 cents, taking the books of Jones & Co. for the facts, while the books of Wood & Lovingood showed that Jones & Co. were indebted to them $6.59. At the time of making the assignment the books showed that J. D. Johnston was indebted to them, and the payment to them of some cotton seed, worth $6, was forgotten. His account was not credited, as it should have been, through inadvertence of the clerk Wood, and, after allowing said credit, nothing is due him as charged. Defendants have no knowledge of being indebted to J. H. Kilby in any amount. The account presented by him has been settled. The amount set forth in the schedule as due John Silvey & Co. is correct, as shown by statement made them by Silvey & Co., which they followed in making the schedule. The amount due Everett, Ridley, Ragan & Co. was $937.18, as shown by the books, which were mere transcripts of bill furnished by that firm from time to time. It is not true that the assets at Pitts' old stand were lumped together and inventoried by guess, but a complete and minute inventory of said assets was taken by Lovingood and one Forrester. It is true the peas were not measured bushel by bushel, but the boxes in which they were were gauged by one Wiley, and the amount of peas ascertained in that way. The inventory thus obtained was returned as a part of the assignment. Leaving out of the list of assets the notes against Harralson and Davis was a clear oversight. They were in a blank book by themselves, which was overlooked by the parties making the inventory. The notes were called out by one party, and the list made by another. It was mentioned at the time that these notes should be among the assets, but they were not found. However, they are of no value, and the makers thereof are utterly insolvent. The assignment was made in the utmost good faith. Defendants desired all of their creditors to share alike in their assets. If any were left out, it was a mere inadvertence or oversight. At the time it was made, they had not been sued by any person or firm; and, when they discovered their failing condition, they sought to do the best they could for all of their creditors.

At the hearing, there was evidence adduced tending to support the allegations on both sides. B. F. Perry, with a claim of $7.96, and E. A. Fincher, with a claim of $8.10, were made parties plaintiff. The defendants said they would pay off these claims, which they could do by borrowing that amount of money; but no money was offered or presented, and this offer was not accepted. The hearing was on January 28th. On January 30th, before the decision was rendered, John Silvey & Co. were made parties plaintiff on application. The defendants contend that, at the time of the argument, Silvey & Co. were not complaining of any error in the amount of indebtedness to them in the schedule of the assignors, and that such alleged discrepancy should not have been considered by the court for that reason. They further say that the failure to include B. F. Perry and E. A. Fincher in the list of creditors is fully explained in the answer, and, when the assignors offered to pay said claims, the same ought not to have been considered by the court as a ground for granting the prayer of the plaintiffs. It is also insisted that the evidence shows that the assignment was made in good faith, and that the discrepancies in the lists of assets and of creditors were not material, and do not show fraud or any good reason for setting aside the assignment.

J. P. Brooke, for plaintiffs in error.
Brown & Hutcherson, for defendants in error.

LUMPKIN, J. Wood & Lovingood, an insolvent firm of traders, made a voluntary assignment for the benefit of their creditors to one William Galt. There were several omissions from and inaccuracies in the schedule of assets and schedule of creditors, the nature of which will appear from the reporter's statement. Because of these omissions and inaccuracies, certain creditors filed their petition to set the assignment aside, and for injunction and receiver. The court granted the injunction, and appointed Galt receiver to hold the assets of the defendants under order of the court until the final hearing. We are asked to reverse this action of the court below. To do this, it would be necessary to hold that there was an abuse of discretion. In our opinion, there was none. While it is true that every error or omission in the schedules which the law requires shall be attached to voluntary assignments by insolvent debtors would not be sufficient to invalidate an assignment, it is also true that such errors and omissions may, and usually will, produce this result. If the schedules are in the main complete and accurate, and, through mistake or mere inadvertence, something of no great importance is left out, and it is manifest there was no intention to defraud, the assignment may very properly be upheld. An intention to defraud or deceive in any material matter will, however, always vitiate the assignment; and, even when no such intention really exists, an assignment should be set aside when there are omissions of important matters from the schedules attached to it, or when these schedules contain inaccuracies of a substantial nature. As ruled in Turnipseed v. Schaefer, 78 Ga. 109, it is impossible to lay down any positive and definite rule as to what may be safely omitted from such schedules when such omissions are occasioned by oversight or inadvertence, and without intention on the part of the assignor, or any purpose to mislead creditors by filing a false, deceptive, or incomplete schedule. The doctrine announced in the second headnote of that case very clearly and accurately states what the rule should be in such cases, and attention is also directed to the opinion of Mr. Justice Hall, which evidently was carefully prepared after thorough and mature consideration. The conclusion seems to be that, in each particular case, whether the assignment should stand or fall should be determined with reference to the number, materiality, and importance of the omissions and inaccuracies, and also with reference to the question whether they were made by mere oversight and inadvertence, or deliberately, and with intention to defraud. See, also, Stultz v. Fleming, 83 Ga. 14, 9 S. E. Rep. 1067. In the present case, the judge below, by appointing the assignee receiver, and granting the injunction prayed for, adopted a course which will preserve the rights of the contending parties until the jury, at the final hearing, shall have decided, in view of all the surrounding facts and circumstances, and under proper instructions from the court, whether the assignment should stand or be set aside. This was a wise and proper direction to give to the case. Judgment affirmed.

REDMOND v. PIPPEN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

EXECUTOR OF SURETY ON SEALED NOTE—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS.

Code Civil Proc. § 152, subd. 2, provides that an action may be brought on a sealed instrument "against the principal thereto" within 10 years. Section 153, subd. 2, provides that an action may be brought by any creditor of a deceased person against his personal or real representative within seven years next after the qualification of the administrator. Section 155 restricts within three years an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability arising out of a contract, express or implied, except on contracts under seal. Section 164 provides that, "if a person against whom an action may be brought die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof, and the cause of action survive, an action may be commenced against his personal representative after the expiration of that time and within one year after the issuing of letters testamentary," etc. Held, that section 153, subd. 2, does not apply to the ordinary obligations of a deceased person, and that the time within which an action may be brought against the representative of a deceased surety on a note under seal is governed by sections 155 and 164.

Appeal from superior court, Edgecombe county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Action by Claudia Redmond against F. L. Phippen, administrator of the estate of J. H. Phippen, deceased, and M. H. Phippen, executrix of the estate of W. M. Phippen, deceased, on a promissory note under seal, executed by J. H. Phippen as principal, and W. M. Phippen as surety. From a judgment in favor of defendant M. H. Phippen, executrix, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Defendants admitted liability to plaintiff for the balance due on the note as to the defendant F. L. Phippen, administrator of J. H. Phippen, the principal thereto, but contended that as to the executrix of W. M. Phippen, the surety to the note, the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations protecting sureties in three years. It was admitted that the note was executed much more than three years before commencement of this suit by J. H. Phippen as principal and W. M. Phippen as surety, and summons in the action was issued on April 5, 1892. It was also admitted that J. H. Phippen died in June, 1888, and defendant F. L. Phippen qualified as his administrator on October 15, 1891; that W. M. Phippen died June 6, 1889, and defendant, his executrix, was qualified as such on June 8, 1889. It was further proved that J. H. Phippen, the principal to the note, paid the interest thereon continuously as same became due, down to and including March 23, 1888, which was the last payment made by him, and such payments were duly entered as credits on the note. There was no evidence offered that claim had been presented to either administrator or executrix. The court, being of the opinion on the facts admitted that the cause was barred as to the surety by the statute of limitations, so instructed the jury, who returned a verdict on the evidence in favor of the defendant surety. Plaintiff excepted.

John L. Bridgers & Son, for appellant. Gilham & Son, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. Since Welfare v. Thompson, 83 N. C. 276, it has been firmly established that three years is a bar to actions upon sealed notes as against the sureties thereto. Clark's Code, § 152, subd. 2. As to the surety, W. M. Phippen, himself, there is no question but that the statute of limitations would bar an action against him in three years after the last payment. It is contended, however, that, as he died before the action was barred as to him, by virtue of section 153, subd. 2, the time is extended; or, as said in the plaintiff's argument, "that his death puts a stop to the running of the statute, and brings to an end all limitations in favor of the dead man's estate. Upon the qualification of the personal representative, a new and different statute of limitations begins to run, to wit, the statute governing the bringing of actions against the personal representatives of decedents, (Code, § 153, subd. 2;)" and that, notwithstanding the fact that the statute had begun to run during the life of the surety, and had been merely suspended upon his death until the qualification of his executor, after such qualification an action may be brought upon the note at any time within seven years. This is the first time, as far as we know, that this construction has been sought to be put upon the section last named. The statute of limitations (title 3, Code Civil Proc.) is comprised of several chapters and many sections, and in the interpretation of any one section thereof regard must be had to its harmony with the whole. While section 153, subd. 2, standing alone, would extend the time "by any creditor or of a deceased person against his personal or real representative, within seven years next after the qualification of the executor or administrator," etc., we must take it in connection with section 155, which restricts "within three years an action upon a contract, obligation, or liability arising out of a contract, express or implied, except those mentioned in the preceding sections," which especially referred to contracts under seal, (section 152, subd. 2; Joyner v. Massey, 97 N. C. 148, 1 S. E. Rep. 702;) and with section 164, which provides: "If a person against whom an action may be brought die before the expiration of the time limited for the commencement thereof, and the cause of action survive, an action may be commenced against his personal representative after the expiration of that time and within one year after the issuing of letters testamentary," etc. The last section has been held to be an enabling, and not a disabling, statute, and to apply only in those cases where, but for its interposition, a claim would be barred in less than one year from the grant of letters. Benson v. Bennett, 112 N. C. 505, 17 S. E. Rep. 432. It will be found upon examination of the cases wherein the seven-years statute has been held to apply, that they were brought against the personal, and, where necessary, the real, representatives for the enforcement of some right of which the debt itself was but the foundation; as in Lawrence v. Norfleet, 90 N. C. 533, and Worthy v. McIntosh, Id. 536, which were brought by the administrator d. b. n. against the administrator of a former representative to recover the unadministered assets which were or ought to have been in his hands; or as in Cox v. Cox, 84 N. C. 138, which was an action for a legacy; or as in other instances which might be named, upon a devastavit, or to compel the sale of land to pay the debts of the decedent. This is the more reasonable, as the result of an action against the personal representative upon an ordinary obligation of the deceased is simply to ascertain the amount of the debt and fix it in a judgment. It is impossible by any other construction to reconcile the provisions of the sections cited. This action, then, as it appears, was barred at the time of its commencement. No error.

STATE v. BROWN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

HIGHWAY ROBBERY—SUFFICIENCY OF INDICTMENT—DESCRIPTION OF OFFENSE.

1. An indictment for highway robbery, charging the taking of "ten dollars in money," sufficiently alleges that money "of the value of ten dollars" was taken, and is not objectionable as failing to designate the value of the money taken.

2. An indictment is not bad for failure to state that defendant stole the money; the allegation that he "feloniously did take and carry away" the money being a sufficient allegation in that regard.

3. A charge in such indictment that defendant "did make an assault," and "put in bodily fear and danger of his life," and "then and there feloniously and violently did seize, take, and carry away" ten dollars from the prosecutor, sufficiently alleges the use of force.

Appeal from superior court, Edgecombe county; Hoke, Judge.

Preston Brown was convicted of highway robbery, and appeals. Affirmed.

The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. Upon inspection of the transcript, it appearing that though the "case on appeal" recited that there was a verdict of guilty and judgment, the record proper failed to show that there had been a trial by jury, and to set out the sentence of the court below, this court ex mero motu directed an instant certiorari to supply the defect, which has now been done.

The indictment sets out two counts,—one for highway robbery; second, for an attempt to commit the same. The verdict found the defendant guilty on the first count. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the exception made to the second count. But had the defendant been convicted of the attempt to commit highway robbery, the first count, if good, would have supported the verdict, since the act of 1891, (chapter 205, § 2,) provides: "Upon the trial of any indictment the prisoner may be convicted of the crime charged therein, or of a lesser degree of the same crime, or of an attempt to commit the crime so charged, or of an attempt to commit a lesser degree of the same crime." This statute is a copy of that in force in England and in New York and other states. It extends to all crimes the provision which to a more limited extent was already in force in this state by virtue of chapter 68, Acts 1885, and, indeed, at common law. Whart. Crim. Pl. & Pr. (9th Ed.) §§ 246, 465. The joinder of a count for a lesser offense or an attempt is now mere surplage.

The objections to the first count, raised by motion to quash, and renewed after verdict by a motion in arrest of judgment, were: (1) "For that there was no value of the money designated in the bill." In an indictment for this offense the value or description of the article taken, or attempted to be taken, is not material, for the gist of the offense is not the taking, but a taking by putting in fear or by force. State v. Brown, 73 N. C. 83, citing Rex v. Bingley, 5 Car. & P. 602. But in fact the charge of "ten dollars in money" is an allegation of "the value of ten dollars," since money is the measure of values. McCarty v. State, 127 Ind. 223, 26 N. E. Rep. 665. Indeed, the description would be sufficient, under our statute, even in an indictment for larceny, and would be sustained by proof of the theft of coin or bank or treasury notes. State v. Freeman, 89 N. C. 469; Code, § 1190. (2) "That the word 'steal,' nor any equivalent word, is charged in the bill." It is not necessary that it should be. The indictment is a copy of the form given in Whart. Pl. & Pr. § 410. Among the many definitions given of robbery probably the best is that by Lord Mansfield: "A felonious taking of property from the person of another by force," (Rex v. Donolly, 2 East, P. C. 715, 725;) or Blackstone's, (4 Bl. Comm. 242:) "The felonious and forcible taking, from the person of another, of goods or money to any value, by violence or putting him in fear." To make it highway robbery it is only necessary further to charge and prove that it was committed "in or near a highway." It is true, a defendant acquitted of this offense because violence or putting in fear is not proved, may be convicted of larceny, (State v. Cody, 60 N. C. 197; State v. Halford, 104 N. C. 874, 10 S. E. Rep. 524;) but the word "steal" is not an indispensable word, like "feloniously," either in this or an indictment for larceny. As to either, the words "feloniously did take and carry away" are a sufficient allegation in this respect. The addition of the word "seize," i. e. "feloniously did seize, take, and carry away," is a peculiarly appropriate substitute in an indictment for this offense for the word "steal," which is tautology, and a mere repetition of the idea embraced in the words "feloniously take and carry away." (3) "That no force is charged therein." The charge that the defendant "did make an assault," and "put in bodily fear and danger of his life," and "then and there feloniously and violently did seize, take, and carry away" $10 in money from the prosecutor, is a very explicit allegation of force. Indeed, the words "feloniously and violently" were of themselves sufficient. State v. Cowan, 29 N. C. 289, 250. But this indictment goes beyond that, and beyond the other words above quoted, and even adds, out of abundant caution, the express words "with force and arms," which have been held unnecessary in an indictment for any offense for three centuries and a half. State v. Harris, 106 N. C. 682, 687, 11 S. E. Rep. 377. No error.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

BOUNDARIES—ISLANDS—CHANGE OF WATER LINE.

1. Plaintiff testified that the land described in his title deeds as "Canary Island," included "the highland surrounded by the Dismal," and was marked by certain corners. It was in evidence that the water extended to some of the lines and corners, but had receded. Plaintiff testified that one V., deceased, pointed out to him the old lines marking the water line, and that these were the lines he showed the surveyor. Held good secondary evidence of the boundaries as including the original highlands.

2. Plaintiff's testimony that corner trees were marked on the boundaries of the original island, and that, when one marked tree had disappeared, plaintiff marked another to show where it had stood, was competent.

3. Declarations as to the boundaries, made by an adjacent landowner ante litem motam, are competent.

4. The law presumes that a grantee in possession claims up to the boundaries of the tract described in his grant.

Appeal from superior court, Washington county; Hoke, Judge.

Trespass by W. W. Lewis against the John L. Roper Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. Pruden, for appellant. A. O. Gaylord, for appellee.

AVERY, J. It is admitted that the title to the land in controversy has passed out of the state, and that the plaintiff, and those under whom he claims, have had an actual possession, including about 14 acres inclosed under fence, for about 50 years. In order to establish certain lines and corners claimed as the boundaries, and to show constructive possession up to them, the plaintiff, W. W. Lewis, offered the deed of his father, William Lewis, to himself, dated May 7, 1834, conveying a tract of land described as "Canary, containing 127 acres;" the deed of Clarissa Leggett to said William Lewis, dated the 20th of September, 1827, and conveying a tract of land described as "Canary Island, East Kendrick creek;" also, a deed from Henry Hardy to William Lewis, dated August 26, 1828, and conveying a tract of land described as "Canary Island, 100 acres, more or less." There were two older conveyances offered, also,—one describing the tract conveyed as "Canary;" the other, as the "East Lee Mill-Pond Canary tract, 100 acres, more or less." The plaintiff contended that he had offered testimony tending to show that the tract of land was known both as "Canary" and "Canary Island," which were generally understood to mean the same tract; that it lay adjacent to Kendrick's creek, on East Lee mill pond, which two names described the same body of water, and tending also to designate the known boundaries of the island, and to point out corners, which, as points upon lines, would indicate the exact location of the boundary around the whole tract. The defendant admitted that the plaintiff had acquired title to his inclosure, but contended that he had not offered sufficient evidence to go to the jury upon the question of the location of the lines. The plaintiff testified that the description "Canary" or "Canary Island" was used to describe a tract of land which was more definitely designated in two ways: (1) By certain corners at different angles on the outside boundary; (2) by including "the highland surrounded by the Dismal." It was in evidence, also, that the water originally extended to some of these lines and corners, but had receded on account of more recent drainage. The witness testified that one Vollway pointed out the old lines that included the highlands bounded by the Dismal. Though there was conflicting evidence as to the extent of the highlands, still, there was testimony tending to show that the lines pointed out by Vollway, the owner of an adjacent tract, was the original highland, not covered by the water at its ordinary height, though it was in evidence that not more than $1\frac{1}{2}$ acres, including plaintiff's dwelling house, were above the high-water mark in great freshets. The plaintiff testified that the corners shown by himself to the surveyor were on the margin of the highland, as pointed out by Vollway, and marked the angles on the original water line. In the absence of any evidence as to corners, the court might have left the question of the location of the boundary lines claimed by the plaintiff upon the declaration of Vollway that it was governed by the original extent of the highlands, or land not covered by the Dismal.

When an island in an unnavigable stream or in a swamp is granted by one name by which it is generally known, it is not necessary to run or call for lines and corners. The low-water margin of the island is esteemed more durable, and preferable, as a certain description, to courses and distances. Tied. Real Prop. §§ 836, 838. The testimony of the plaintiff is clearly susceptible of the construction that the deceased declarant, Vollway, had pointed out the original low-water line, which is still indicated by corners marked at some of the angles along said marginal line, though subsequent drainage may have caused the water to recede, and leave a larger area uncovered, in the ordinary condition of the swamp. Such enlargement of the original island by artificial means was not an accretion that inured to the plaintiff's benefit; and, if not, it was competent, as in all such cases, to show the original low-water line, as defining the limits of the island when granted. Tied. Real Prop. § 685 et seq.; Malone, Real Prop. Tr. 253. It is not necessary to cite authority to show that by the grant of an island, designated by the name by which it is generally known, all of the land surrounded by water at the low-water mark passes. When once it does so pass, sudden accretions are not added to it; and, when nature no longer marks the original line, man may prove by oral testimony of living witnesses, or competent declarations of persons deceased, where the land was located when the land was granted.

Without passing upon the sufficiency of the proof of course and distance offered, we think, therefore, that there was testimony upon which the jury might have located Canary or Canary Island by the original extent of the highlands. The question whether the greater weight of testimony was upon the one side or the other was not one addressed to the court below, and is not to be considered by us. However the boundaries of his deed may be ascertained, when located, the law presumes that the plaintiff claimed up to them. McLean v. Smith, 106 N. C. 177, 11 S. E. Rep. 184; Ruffin v. Overby, 105 N. C. 78, 11 S. E. Rep. 251. The plaintiff testified that the declarations of Vollway were made ante litem motam, and when Vollway was disinterested, and this was not denied. Though he was an adjacent landowner at the time, his declarations were nevertheless competent. Bethea v. Byrd, 95 N. C. 309; Dugger v. McKesson, 100 N. C. 1, 6 S. E. Rep. 746; Fry v. Currie, 103 N. C. 203, 9 S. E. Rep. 393.

For the reasons given, we think that there was no error in submitting the question of the extent of the plaintiff's boundary to the jury. The testimony as to the marking of corner trees was competent, if for no other purpose, as corroborative evidence to show that marks were made to indicate the margin of the original island, and, when one tree originally marked had disappeared, it was competent to show that another was marked to designate where it had stood. There was no error.

DAVIS et al. v. SMITH et al.

ASSIGNMENTS FOR THE BENEFIT OF CREDITORS — RESERVATIONS—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

1. The fact that two partners assigning for the benefit of creditors reserve, under an agreement between themselves, such exemptions out of the partnership effects as the law permits, raises no presumption of fraud.

2. Nor is it presumptive evidence of fraud that the deed of assignment, after reciting the reservations of the homestead and personal property exemption "allowed by law," provides that it "be set apart by the party of the second part," being evidence of nothing more than that the assignors were ignorant of the law, or misunderstood the procedure prescribed by statute.

Appeal from superior court, Craven county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Action by M. L. T. Davis and others against B. J. Smith & Co. to set aside an alleged fraudulent assignment for the benefit of creditors, made by defendants, and to recover money due plaintiffs. There was a judgment in favor of some of the plaintiffs, from which plaintiff Davis appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. McIver, for appellant. W. W. Clark, for appellees.

AVERY, J. The exceptions raise three questions: (1) Whether there was any evidence to support the finding upon the first issue, which alone was submitted to the jury; (2) whether the admitted facts shifted the burden of proof from the plaintiffs to the defendants by raising a presumption that the deed of assignment was fraudulent; (3) whether there was error in refusing the motion of the plaintiff for judgment upon the verdict. If it plainly appears upon the face of a deed of assignment that it was executed, not in good faith, but for the purpose of securing the ease and comfort of the debtor, the court is empowered to declare it void without the intervention of a jury. Woodruff v. Bowles, 104 N. C. 206, 10 S. E. Rep. 482; Brown v. Mitchell, 102 N. C. 368, 9 S. E. Rep. 702; Hardy v. Simpson, 13 Ired. 132. Is the reservation of personal property and homestead exemptions for both of the assignors conclusive evidence of a fraudulent intent on their part? We think not. The reservation of the right to the personal property exemption and the homestead "allowed by law" was neither conclusive nor presumptive evidence of a fraudulent purpose. Barber v. Buffalo, 111 N. C. 208, 16 S. E. Rep. 386; Eigenbrun v. Smith, 98 N. C. 207, 4 S. E. Rep. 122; Bobbitt v. Rodwell, 105 N. C. 244, 11 S. E. Rep. 245. While "it is well settled that each member of a partnership has a right to require the application of the joint effects to the joint debts before any portion of them can be directed to the satisfaction of the individual debts," it is a rule of law, as firmly established, that "with the assent of the partners any one of them is free to dispose of the company's effects for his individual use, and a creditor cannot interfere to prevent the application." Allen v. Grissom, 90 N. C. 92; Clement v. Foster, 3 Ired. Eq. 213; Rankin v. Jones, 2 Jones, Eq. 169. If there is no lien in favor of the creditors of the firm, we fail to see the force of the contention that the reservation of the exemptions out of the partnership effects, as the law permitted them to do by agreement among themselves, raised a rebuttable, if not a conclusive, presumption of a fraudulent purpose on the part of the assignors. The late Chief Justice Smith, in Allen v. Grissom, conceding that there was conflicting authority as to the right of partners under an agreement among themselves to apply partnership funds, by assignment or otherwise, to the payment of individual debts, says: "This is the doctrine established by repeated recognitions in this court, from which, whatever may be the decisions elsewhere, we are not at liberty to depart, and it commends itself to our approval." Admitting, therefore, that the research of the industrious counsel for the plaintiff has enabled him to array much authority from text writers and courts which have adopted different views, we are not required to again renew the discussion of questions so long ago settled by our learned predecessors.

The admitted fact that the plaintiffs in the deed attempted to secure a larger amount of indebtedness to any of the preferred creditors than was actually due, while it fell as far short of presumptive proof, was evidence of a fraudulent purpose, which, as we understand the case, was submitted to the jury as bearing upon the first issue. The weight of the testimony, in view of all accompanying circumstances shown, was to be determined by them. After reserving the homestead and personal property exemption "allowed by law," the use of the subsequent language, "to be set apart by the party of the second part," constitutes neither conclusive nor presumptive evidence of fraud. Having reserved only such exemptions as the constitution and laws recognized, the designation of some irregular method of either setting apart the homestead or appraising personal property would not vitiate the instrument, or taint it with fraud. It would be simply evidence that the assignors were ignorant of the law, or misunderstood the method of proceeding prescribed by statute, while it was still permissible for any aggrieved creditor, who should obtain judgment, and sue out execution, to pursue the proper remedies to enforce his own judgment. We can see no error in the charge of the court that the burden still rested upon the plaintiffs to show the fraud which they alleged to the satisfaction of the jury. We find no testimony which in law would have shifted the burden of proof, but only circumstances bearing upon the inquiry involved in the issue submitted, the weight of which was properly submitted to the jury. There is no error.

GALLOP v. ALLEN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—SETTING ASIDE DEFAULT JUDGMENT.

A judgment rendered by a justice of the peace without due notice to defendant of the time and place of hearing cannot be set aside by suit in the superior court. The remedies are a motion before the justice, or a writ of recordari in the superior court.

Appeal from superior court, Currituck county: John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by J. C. Gallop against William F. Allen & Co. to set aside a judgment, and for injunction. Application dismissed. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This was a civil action commenced in the superior court of Currituck county to vacate and set aside as null and void a judgment rendered by a justice of the peace of said county in favor of the present defendants and against the plaintiff in this action. The complaint alleged that the summons in the action before the justice was served upon this plaintiff on the 5th of September, 1892, returnable on the next day at the courthouse in said county before the justice named; that this plaintiff, then defendant, was sick on the return day, and could not attend at the place of trial; that thereupon the cause was continued for his absence, and for further hearing, but that no notice was given him of the time or place for the further hearing, and that he heard nothing further of the matter until a few days before this action was begun, when he was notified by the sheriff of said county that said sheriff had an execution in his hands against said plaintiff, who was the defendant in said execution, upon a judgment rendered by said justice in said action on the 27th of September, 1892, at Shawboro, in said county, a place other than the courthouse. This plaintiff alleged in his complaint, used as an affidavit, that he had a meritorious defense to the said action. A restraining order was made returnable before his honor, Judge Bynum, at chambers, in Elizabeth City, on May 2, 1893, upon which return his honor dissolved the restraining order, and dismissed the application for an injunction, for want of jurisdiction, and the plaintiff appealed.

Grandy & Aydlett, for appellant.

MacRAE, J. Assuming the affidavit of the plaintiff to be true, the judgment rendered by the justice was irregular and voidable. The remedies open to the defendant in that action, (the plaintiff herein,) were a motion before the justice who rendered the judgment, or his successor in office, to set aside the judgment, or a writ of recordari in the nature of a writ of false judgment in the superior court. If it had been alleged that the judgment was obtained by fraud, an action to set it aside would have been the proper procedure. The subject has been so recently discussed and explained that it will be unnecessary now to do more than refer to King v. Railroad Co., 112 N. C. 318, 16 S. E. Rep. 929, and Whitehurst v. Transportation Co., 109 N. C. 344, 13 S. E. Rep. 937. As an action did not lie to vacate the judgment, his honor properly dissolved the restraining order and denied the application for an injunction. Affirmed.

HARE v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF GATES COUNTY.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

WHITE AND COLORED SCHOOLS—WHITE CHILDREN—OPINION EVIDENCE.

1. Code, § 1810, provides that "all marriages between a white person * * * and a person of negro or Indian descent to the third generation inclusive are void." Laws 1889, § 42, provides "that in determining the right of any child to attend the white or colored schools, the rules laid down in section 1810 of the Code, regulating marriages, shall be followed." Held, that the children of a white woman and a man whose mother was white, but whose father was a negro, were not entitled to attend the white schools.

2. A witness need not possess any peculiar scientific knowledge to render him competent to testify as to whether or not a certain person has African blood in his veins.

Appeal from superior court, Gates county: Bynum, Judge.

Action by James R. Hare against the board of education of Gates county for a writ of mandamus to compel defendant to admit plaintiff's children to the white school of his district, in such county. From a judgment entered on the verdict of a jury in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Smith, for appellee.

AVERY, J. But a single question was raised by the exception to the charge, and that is whether the court, in any aspect of the testimony, should have instructed the jury that the children of the plaintiff belonged to the white race, and had a right to insist upon admission into the district school provided for white children. The inference might have been drawn from the statement of one of the witnesses that the plaintiff's father was a mulatto, while others testified that he was a negro. "All marriages between a white person * * * and a person of negro or Indian descent to the third generation inclusive are void." Code, § 1810. The statute (Laws 1889, § 42) provides "that in determining the right of any child to attend the white or colored schools, the rule laid down in section 1810 of the Code, regulating marriages, shall be followed." It is manifest that the jury, acting under the instructions given them, must have found from the testimony that Charles Jones was the father of the plaintiff, and was a full-blooded negro. There was no error in the charge of the court, of which the plaintiff could complain. Whether we concede or deny that for the purpose of establishing the right of a person of mixed blood to contract a marriage with a white person, or gain admission into school for white children, testimony tending to show that the reputed father of his father was only a negro of the half-blood is admissible, or that it is competent for either purpose to go behind the presumption that an admitted slave was a full-blooded negro, and attempt to show the exact proportions in which the Caucasian and negro blood were intermingled in his conception, in either event, if the plaintiff's father was in fact a full-blooded negro, as the jury must have determined that he was, his children would not be beyond the third generation. This court, in State v. Chavers, 5 Jones, (N. C.) 11, construed the language of the old statute, (Rev. Code, c. 107, § 79,) "all persons, descended from negro ancestors to the fourth generation inclusive," as classifying with the whites only persons who were removed beyond the fourth, or belonged to the fifth, generation. The words used in section 1810, "to the third generation inclusive," must therefore be construed to prohibit intermarriage of whites with persons who are not beyond the third or in the fourth generation from the pure negro ancestor. The statute in reference to schools is expressly required to be interpreted in the same way as section 1810 of the Code is construed, and it would follow that the plaintiff's children could not rightfully demand admission into the schools for white children without showing that the negro ancestor was more remote than the father of Charles Jones, and that they themselves belonged to the fourth succession from such ancestor. McMillan v. School Committee, 107 N. C. 609, 12 S. E. Rep. 330; State v. Watters, 3 Ired. 455. It will be observed that in the statute creating schools for the Croatan Indians the exclusion extends to the fourth generation, omitting the word "inclusive," which is synonymous with "the third generation inclusive." If it was material to know whether Charles Jones or a white man was the paternal grandfather of the children, and this was a question in dispute, it was competent to show that their grandmother was living with Jones about nine months before the birth of the plaintiff.

While, in doubtful cases, only an expert would be qualified to testify, from the appearance of a person, as to the exact extent to which white and negro blood are commingled in his veins, it does not require any peculiar scientific knowledge "to be able to detect the presence of African blood by the color or other physical qualities of the person." Hopkins v. Bowers, 111 N. C. 178, 16 S. E. Rep. 1; State v. Jacobs, 6 Jones, (N. C.) 288. There is no error.

ROOKER v. CRINKLEY et al., (two cases.)
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—RESIDENT ALIEN.

An alien defendant, who is a resident, cannot remove the cause from the state to the federal court under Act Cong. March 3, 1887, which provides for removal of suits between citizens of different states, between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens and subjects, and certain other suits, wherein defendants are nonresidents of the state in which they are brought.

Appeal from superior court, Warren county; Hoke, Judge.

Two actions,—one by George W. Rooker against W. B. Crinkley, and the other by same plaintiff against A. Crinkley and others. From orders denying defendants' petitions for removal of the causes to the federal court on the ground that they are aliens, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. H. Day and W. A. Montgomery, for appellants.

MacRAE, J. We concur with his honor that the affidavit and petition of defendants show no removable cause. The act of congress governing removals of causes from the state to the federal courts, and which is applicable to these cases, is that of March 3, 1887, and embraces (1) suits arising under the constitution and laws of the United States, and treaties made in pursuance thereof; (2) suits in which the United States are plaintiff; (3) suits between citizens of different states; (4) suits between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants from different states; and (5) suits between citizens of a state and foreign states, citizens, and subjects. Section 2 provides, among other things: "Any other suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, of which the circuit courts of the United States are given jurisdiction by the preceding section, and which are now pending, or which may hereafter be brought in any state court, may be removed into the circuit court of the United States for the proper district, by the defendant or defendants therein, being nonresidents of that state." Cudahy v. McGeoch, 37 Fed. Rep. 1; Walker v. O'Neill, 38 Fed. Rep. 374. These are suits between a citizen of this state and an alien resident in this state, and are not removable, under the act of congress. No error.

HINTON v. GREENLEAF et ux.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

MORTGAGE BY HUSBAND AND WIFE — PRINCIPAL AND SURETY—DISCHARGE OF SURETIES.

Where a husband and wife include in a trust deed as security for the debt of the husband not only property of the husband, but the separate property of the wife, her property occupies the position of a surety, and will be discharged by a valid agreement by the creditor with the husband without the knowledge of the wife for a postponement for a definite period of the sale of the property included in the deed, there being no reservation in such agreement of the creditor's rights against the wife.

Appeal from superior court, Pasquotank county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by John L. Hinton against H. T. Greenleaf and wife. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Reversed.

Grandy & Aydlett and F. H. Busbee, for appellants. W. D. Pruden, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. It is settled by abundant authority that, "where a husband mortgages his property for his debt, and in the same mortgage the wife conveys her own separate property as security for the same debt, her property so conveyed will be treated in all respects as a surety, * * * and will be discharged by anything that would discharge a surety or guarantor who was personally liable." 1 Brandt, Sur. § 82; Cross v. Allen, 141 U. S. 528, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 67; Spear v. Ward, 20 Cal. 659; Gahn v. Niemcewicz, 11 Wend. 312; Bank v. Burns, 46 N. Y. 170; Bish. Mar. Wom. 604; Jones, Mortg. 114; Gore v. Townsend, 105 N. C. 228, 11 S. E. Rep. 160; Purvis v. Carstarphan, 73 N. C. 575. The deed in trust in the present case was made for the purpose of securing the payment of certain indebtedness of the husband, H. T. Greenleaf, evidenced by his notes executed to C. W. Grandy, Jr. The deed conveys certain property of the said Greenleaf, and also the real estate of the wife; the latter alone being the subject of this controversy. It plainly appears from the said instrument that the property of the wife was conveyed as additional security for the indebtedness of the husband, and there can be no question as to the trustee, the cestui que trust, Grandy, and his assignee, Hinton, being affected with notice thereof. There is evidence tending to show that Grandy, before assigning the notes, and after they were due, entered into a valid agreement with Greenleaf to postpone the sale of the property contained in the deed of trust for a definite period. There is also evidence tending to show a similar agreement on the part of Hinton, the assignee, under which a sale of the said property was to be postponed for four years. These contracts of forbearance were made without the knowledge or assent of Mrs. Greenleaf, and, in our opinion, resulted in a discharge of her property from all liability under the said deed of trust. This property occupied, as we have seen, the position of a surety, and it is common learning that "time or forbearance given by the creditor to the principal debtor by a contract which binds him in law, and would bar his action against the debtor, will discharge the surety." Bank v. Lineberger, 83 N. C. 454; Carter v. Duncan, 84 N. C. 679; Forbes v. Sheppard, 98 N. C. 111, 3 S. E. Rep. 817; Scott v. Fisher, 110 N. C. 311, 14 S. E. Rep. 799. It is insisted, however, by the plaintiff's counsel that the above principle does not apply to the facts of this case, because in the contracts of forbearance the remedy against the property was reserved. It is undoubtedly true that the surety will not be discharged when, at the time of the agreement for indulgence, there is a reservation of the creditor's rights and remedies against the surety, but such reservation must be distinct, explicit, (2 Brandt, Sur. § 376,) and unqualified, (Bank v. Lineberger, supra.) We are unable to find in the record any evidence of such a reservation, as it is very clear that the testimony of Greenleaf that "Hinton did not agree to give up the mortgage" does not amount to such a reservation of the remedy against the surety property as is contemplated by the law. Had there been a valid agreement of that character, it would have amounted to an equitable discharge of the trust, in which event the creditor could not have reserved his right to proceed against the said property. Nicholson v. Revill, 4 Adol. & E. 675; Kearsley v. Cole, 16 Mees. & W. 136. The fact, therefore, that the "mortgage" was not given up or discharged, is entirely consistent with the principle invoked by Mrs. Greenleaf, which principle, indeed, would have nothing to operate upon but for the contemplated continuance of the liability. The agreement was in effect to postpone the sale of the entire property contained in the trust. This was an alteration of the original contract without the consent of Mrs. Greenleaf, and deprived her of her right to discharge the indebtedness at maturity, and to immediately proceed against the principal. In order to retain the security, there should have been a clear reservation of the right to sell her property, but, instead of doing this, the creditor, as we have said, entered into a binding contract with the principal to forbear the sale of any part of the property contained in the trust. We think his honor erred in directing a verdict against Mrs. Greenleaf; for, if her contention be true, the assignee, Hinton, who purchased at the sale made by the trustee, acquired only a naked legal title, and would not be entitled to recover. We will add that we have carefully perused the testimony, and have been unable to find any evidence that Greenleaf, in making the agreements above mentioned, was authorized to act as the agent of his wife. There must be a new trial.

EDWARDS et al. v. CHARLOTTE, C. & A. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Sept. 29, 1893.)

SURFACE WATER—OBSTRUCTION.

The common-law rule as to the disposition of surface water prevails in South Carolina, and a landowner has a right to take any measures necessary to protect his property therefrom, even if, in so doing, he throws it back on adjacent land, to its damage.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; I. D. Witherspoon, Judge.

Action by Elizabeth H. Edwards and another against the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Henderson Bros. and John R. Cloy, for appellants.

Cotheau & Abney and Croft & Chafee, for respondent.

If it was necessary for the railroad company to construct an embankment on its right of way in order to protect its roadbed from injury by the surface water, it is not liable for the damages to adjacent land by thus turning the water back onto it: Railroad Co. v. Hammer, 22 Kan. 763; Gibbs v. Williams, 25 Kan. 214; Angell, Water Courses, § 108; 1 Add. Torts, 105; Cooley, Torts, 574; Hil. Torts, 584; Taylor v. Flickar, 64 Ind. 167; Schlichter v. Phillippy, 67 Ind. 201; Gannon v. Hargodon, 10 Allen, 106; Hoyt v. City of Hudson, 27 Wis. 656; Pettigrew v. Village of Evansville, 25 Wis. 223; Fryer v. Warne, 29 Wis. 511; Sowers v. Shiff, 15 La. Ann. 300; Martin v. Jett, 12 La. 503; Walker v. Railway Co., 103 Mass. 10; Morrison v. Railway Co., 67 Me. 353; Moyer v. Railway Co., 88 N. Y. 351; Railway Co. v. Wicker, 74 N. C. 220.

McIVER, C. J. The plaintiff, who is a married woman, joining her husband with her as a coplaintiff, brings this action against the Charlotte, Columbia & Augusta Railroad Company to recover damages alleged to have been done to her property, as well as to her health, by reason of the obstruction, by the defendant company, of the natural flow of surface water over and across the right of way and railroad track of defendant. The allegations in the complaint, substantially, are that some time in the year 1867 the defendant company constructed its railway through the town of Graniteville, over and along Canal street of said town, running north and south, parallel with Horse creek, a natural water course, on the west of the railway; that plaintiff is the lessee of certain premises situate at the northeast corner of Canal street and Cottage, the latter being a street running perpendicular to the former; that on the eastern side of the town of Graniteville the land is hilly, and gradually slopes towards Horse creek; and that the surface water which would accumulate on the eastern side was accustomed to flow, in part, down and along Cottage street, across Canal street, to said Horse creek, previous to the construction of defendant's road, and for some time afterwards, without injury to plaintiff's premises, but that some time in the year 1878 "the defendant negligently, unlawfully, and unnecessarily" erected a large sand bank, at the intersection of Canal and Cottage streets, whereby the surface water was forced back on plaintiff's premises, and has continued to maintain and increase said sand bank. The defendant claims that the sand bank complained of (which was constructed on defendant's right of way) was necessary to protect its roadbed and right of way from being undermined and washed away by the flow of the surface water, and therefore its construction was no invasion of the legal rights of the plaintiff, and the defendant is not liable for any damages which plaintiff may have sustained by reason of such obstruction of the flow of the surface water. The circuit judge, in effect, charged the jury that the first question for them to determine was whether the construction of the sand bank was necessary for the protection of defendant's roadbed and right of way, and, if so, then the defendant was not liable. The jury, under this instruction, found a verdict in favor of the defendant, and judgment being entered thereon, the plaintiff appeals upon the several grounds set out in the record. Under the view which we take we do not deem it necessary to repeat these grounds, for the whole case, in our judgment, turns upon the inquiry whether there was any error in the instruction thus given to the jury.

It is not, and cannot be, denied that the rule in regard to interference with the flow of surface water is wholly different from that which prevails in regard to the waters of a natural water course. We shall therefore confine our attention entirely to the rule as to surface water. What that rule is has been the subject of debate in numerous cases in the other states, many of which we have examined in preparing this opinion. Some of the states have adopted what is known as the "civil-law rule," while others seem to have adopted what is designated as the "intermediate rule," while others, again, (a majority of the states, as is said in a note to Goddard v. Inhabitants of Harpswell, [24 Atl. Rep. 958,] 30 Amer. St. Rep., at page 391,) adhere to the rule of the common law. In this state, so far as we are informed, there is no adjudication upon the subject, for what was said upon the subject by the late Chief Justice Simpson was "not intended as a final adjudication, and conclusive of said question in the future," as he himself expressly said in that opinion, but simply his own opinion as to the comparative merits of the several rules. But in view of the express declaration of the lawmaking power, as embodied in section 2738 of the General Statutes, we feel bound to declare, in the absence of any constitutional provision, statute, or even authoritative decision to the contrary, that the common-law rule must still be recognized as controlling here, for that section expressly declares that "every part of the common law of England, not altered by this act, nor inconsistent with the constitution of this state, and the customs and laws thereof, is hereby continued in full force and virtue within this state in the same manner as before the passage of this act." Under the common-law rule, surface water is regarded as a common enemy, and every landed proprietor has a right to take any measures necessary to the protection of his own property from its ravages, even if, in doing so, he throws it back upon a coterminous proprietor, to his damage, which the law regards as a case of damnum absque injuria, and affording no cause of action. This rule was applied in a case very much like the present,—Rowe v. Railroad Co., 41 Minn. 384, 43 N. W. Rep. 76; also in Railroad Co. v. Stevens, 73 Ind. 278; O'Connor v. Railroad Co., 52 Wis. 526, 9 N. W. Rep. 287; Johnson v. Railroad Co., 80 Wis. 641, 50 N. W. Rep. 771. See, also, Chadeayne v. Robinson, 55 Conn. 345, 11 Atl. Rep. 592, and Abbott v. Railroad Co., 83 Mo. 271, in which the case of Shane v. Railroad Co., 71 Mo. 237, relied upon by appellant, as well as the case of McCormick v. Railroad Co., 70 Mo. 359, are commented on and practically overruled, so far as the question now under consideration is concerned. These cases, as well as many others which might be referred to, together with those cited by respondent's counsel in his argument, abundantly show that there was no error on the part of the circuit judge in giving the instruction complained of to the jury. The case of Staton v. Railroad Co., recently decided by the supreme court of North Carolina, and reported in 16 S. E. Rep. 181, seems to be much relied on by the counsel for appellant. But we do not think it in point. The question there was different from that presented here, and the discussion was principally devoted to an inquiry into the rights acquired by a railroad company from the exercise of its right to condemn lands under the power of eminent domain, with which we are not concerned here. Here we freely and fully concede the doctrine laid down in that case, that a railroad company has no higher rights in reference to the treatment of surface water than an individual land proprietor; and that is as far as that case is applicable to the present. Besides, as we understand, North Carolina is one of the states which recognizes the civil-law rule in reference to surface water, and hence the decisions in that state would afford no assistance where the common-law rule prevails. So, too, the cases of Mills v. Railroad Co., 13 S. C. 97, and Wallace v. Railroad Co., 34

S. C. 66, 12 S. E. Rep. 815, and again reported in 16 S. E. Rep. 36, being cases in reference to natural water courses, and not cases of surface water, have no application to the present case. Nor are we able to discover anything in the case of Gregory v. Layton, 36 S. C. 93, 15 S. E. Rep. 352, which throws any light upon our present inquiry. Under the view which we have taken, the other grounds of appeal become immaterial; for, even if the alleged errors there complained of were well founded, the result reached would not have been affected. Assuming, as we must do, that the jury found as matter of fact that the sand bank complained of was necessary for the protection of defendant's right of way and roadbed, we are unable to see how the instructions complained of could possibly have affected the result. We may add, however, that we see no error in any of the instructions complained of. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McGOWAN and POPE, JJ., concur.

THOMPSON et ux. v. RAY.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 17, 1893.)

PAROL GIFT OF LAND—LEADING QUESTIONS.

1. A parol gift of land, accompanied by possession, based upon a consideration meritorious, and to some extent valuable, is not of itself sufficient to pass title into the donee. Nor will the making of valuable and permanent improvements upon the property, after the death of the donor, complete the gift, although the materials for such improvements may have been ordered during the donor's lifetime, and with his knowledge.

2. An interrogatory which assumes the existence of a material and vitally important fact, and suggests an answer which will establish that fact, is leading, and for this reason there was no error in rejecting the answer to the same; it not appearing or being suggested that the objection was not in writing, or that it was not made at the proper time.

3. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in refusing a new trial.

Error from superior court, Campbell county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by L. R. Ray, as administrator, against J. E. Thompson and wife, to recover land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

The action was on the demises of Ray, as administrator of Reid, against Thompson and his wife, to recover a certain tract of land in Fairburn. Mrs. Thompson pleaded, in brief, that her husband claimed no title or interest in the land; that she is now, and has been for from long before the death of Reid, the owner of the land; that Reid was a great friend to her father and mother, and, when she was born, had her christened into the Catholic Church, becoming her godfather; that he was closely attached to her, and she was taught to look on him as a father and guide; that he was a bachelor, and before the death of her father made her father's house his home, and lived in the house as one of the family, and after her father's death boarded a great deal of his time there, and defendant and her mother and sisters waited on him as they would on their father, doing his washing, mending, etc.; that the work they did for him, and the trouble and expense they were at in caring for him, was worth a great deal of money, and he so recognized it; that he would tell defendant he was going to make liberal provision for her, and fix his property so she would get it; that, relying on these promises, she and her mother and sisters would not try to collect any money from him for their labor, but would let the matter stand, believing they would be amply paid by him in the distribution of his property, and her mother was perfectly willing that her labor should be compensated for by Reid's provision for defendant and her sisters; that, as part performance of his promise, Reid delivered to defendant the house and lot sued for before his death, putting her in possession, and from that date to his death relinquishing any right or title which he had to the premises to her, and ever afterwards recognizing the title as being in her; that she thought that he had either made a deed to the land to her, or was going to do so; that he told her distinctly the land was hers, and he gave it to her, and on the strength of this gift she made valuable improvements, (stating them,) and it would be against equity to allow plaintiff now to administer the property; that, if no deed can be found, plaintiff should be required to make her a deed, etc. Further, that in his lifetime Reid owed her $1,000 for her services in waiting on him and caring for him, and, in order to settle the debt, or so much of it as the house and lot sued for would settle, said to her: "I owe you for your service $1,000. If you will receive this house and lot for part compensation for said service, I will deliver the same to you, and sell it to you to pay as much of the debt as $600 would settle;" that she then and there agreed to the proposition, and accepted the land as such part compensation, and no longer looked to Reid for any further pay, and the delivery by him of the property was made in accordance with the contract, and the contract was completed, etc. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and, defendants' motion for new trial being overruled, they excepted. The motion contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc. Also, that the court erred in refusing to allow defendants to prove that Mrs. Thompson had made valuable improvements on the land in dispute, by having the house celled, at an expense to her of $50; she offering to prove by competent witnesses that the improvements which she had made on the land were permanent, and were made immediately after the death of Reid. Error in refusing to allow defendants to ask Mrs. McDonald, "What did Matthew Reid ever pay you or your daughters for boarding and waiting on him, except the houses and lots he gave your daughters?" and in refusing to allow her answer, as follows, to be read to the jury: "They have not paid me anything, nor has he paid me anything, but gave my daughters the two houses and lots in Fairburn for our trouble." The court held that the interrogatory was inadmissible, because leading and irrelevant, and that the answer could not be read, for the same reason. One Smith had already testified that Reid said he gave the land in dispute to Mrs. Thompson for what she had done for him.

Roan & Golightly, for plaintiffs in error.
Thos. W. Latham, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. The facts appear in the reporter's statement. It will be observed that the evidence fails to show that Mrs. Thompson was entitled to the land in dispute under a contract of purchase with the deceased, Mr. Reid. At best, her claim of title rests solely upon a parol gift, accompanied by possession, based upon a consideration which was meritorious, and perhaps, to some extent, valuable. It is well-settled law that this, of itself, would not be sufficient to pass title into Mrs. Thompson. It was insisted, however, that, under the provisions of section 3189 of the Code, she was entitled to the premises, because of having made valuable improvements upon the faith of the gift. Although there is evidence to show that some of the materials for the making of these improvements were ordered during the lifetime of Mr. Reid, and that he knew of this fact, it is admitted that the improvements themselves were not made until after his death. In our opinion, therefore, the gift never became complete. It was within the power of the deceased to revoke it at any time before the improvements were actually made. He could have done this even after the materials for the improvements had been purchased. This being so, Mrs. Thompson could not complete the gift by making the improvements after his death. Inasmuch as it cannot be known that Mr. Reid would not have exercised his undoubted right of revocation before the improvements were made, his estate cannot be bound by anything done which he might have forbidden, had he lived. Moreover, it does not appear that, by ordering or procuring the materials in question, any injury resulted to Mrs. Thompson. In no event would her claim of title, under the facts stated, have any shadow of legal merit, unless it had been further shown that, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the deceased, she had incurred some substantial loss because of the gift. We do not, however, confine the principle involved within these narrow lines, but we hold distinctly that the mere procuring of materials would not put Mrs. Thompson's claim on any better footing, even if she made it appear that, in case she had not used the materials in making improvements on the property in question, she would have been unable to dispose of them, except at a sacrifice. Mr. Reid could have revoked the gift even after she had bought the materials; and although, subsequently to his death, she used the same in making substantial improvements upon the property, she thereby gained no greater right than she had during his lifetime.

2. There was no error in rejecting the answer to the interrogatory referred to in the second headnote, and which is set out in full in the reporter's statement. It was plainly and manifestly leading. It assumed the existence of a collateral fact of vital importance to the issue then being tried, and suggested the answer desired; and the answer, as given, necessarily tended to establish incidentally the existence of this fact. Presumably, the objection to the interrogatory, as leading, was made in writing, and at the proper time, because, in endeavoring to sustain the admissibility of the answer, counsel did not make it affirmatively appear—nor, indeed, was it even suggested—that the objection was not made as required by the rule of court which prescribes that no exception to a written interrogatory, on the ground that it is a leading question, shall prevail, unless it be filed with the interrogatories before the issuing of the commission.

3. The verdict was sufficiently sustained by the evidence; no error of law was committed by the court, and the motion for a new trial was properly overruled. Judgment affirmed.

REEVES v. GAY.

STATUTES—AMENDMENT—COUNTY ELECTION AS TO FENCES—IMPOUNDING ANIMALS.

1. Section 1455 of the Code, which was so amended by the act of September 5, 1883, (Acts 1882-83, p. 49,) as to require that elections upon the question of "fence or no fence" should be held on the first Wednesday in July following the filing of a petition with the ordinary, instead of "at such time as said ordinary shall appoint," was not affected, as to the time of holding such elections, by the act of November 12, 1889, (Acts 1889, p. 60,) which prescribed the qualifications of voters in such elections. After the passage of the latter act, the above-mentioned section stood, as to the time of holding elections, not as it did originally, but as it did after being amended by the act of 1883, and it also stood thus after the passage of the act of November 26, 1890, (Acts 1890-91, p. 69,) "to amend the fence laws of this state, and to repeal section 1449 of the Code." Consequently, an election upon the question of "fence or no fence" held in Webster county on the 12th day of August, 1891, was unauthorized by law, and void, and no right to impound stock thereunder could arise, although such election was declared to be in favor of "no fence." The only day upon which the election could legally have been held was "the first Wednesday in July."

2. The stock of the plaintiff having been unlawfully impounded, and the magistrate before whom the case was tried having awarded him the custody thereof upon a possessory warrant, the superior court was right in upholding the magistrate's judgment, and in overruling the certiorari thereto.

Error from superior court, Webster county; W. H. Fish, Judge.

Action by Frank Gay against Jephtha Reeves for the possession of animals alleged to be unlawfully impounded. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

S. R. Stevens and Hudson & Blalock, for plaintiff in error. J. Harrell, B. F. Harrell, Thornton & McMichael, and M. O. Edwards, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. 1. Section 1455 of the Code authorized elections upon "the fence question" to be held at such times as the ordinary might appoint. The act of September 5, 1883, so amended this section as to require that these elections should be held on the first Wednesday in July following the filing with the ordinary of a petition for an election. Then came the act of November 12, 1889, the title of which is as follows: "An act to alter and amend section 1455 of the Code of Georgia of 1882, so as to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the several militia districts of the counties of this state, at any elections held in said districts for the purpose of establishing a stock law for said district, and for other purposes." The only purpose of this act was to prescribe the qualifications of voters in elections upon the question of "fence or no fence." This was accomplished by enacting that after the words "in said district," in the forty-fifth line of the section, there should be inserted certain words prescribing what the qualifications of voters should be. The act then declares how, as a result of this amendment, the section shall read, and proceeds to copy the section, retaining the words declaring that the election shall take place "at such time as said ordinary shall appoint" just as they stood in the original section. Bearing in mind the amendment to the section made by the act of 1883, it is obvious that no such reading would result from the amendment really made by the act of 1889. The fact is the act of 1883 was simply overlooked. Nothing in the title of the act of 1889 indicates in any manner whatever an intention to repeal, modify, or amend the act of 1883, and nothing in the body of the act of 1889 directly or expressly indicates any such intention. The whole difficulty arises from the fact that, because of overlooking the act of 1883, the act of 1889 was made to declare that the amendment it introduced into the section would produce a certain reading of the section which, in fact, it did not produce. We hold, without misgiving or doubt, that the act of 1883 was not thus repealed. In the first place, it is manifest that the legislature, by the act of 1889, did not intend to repeal it; and, secondly, if they had so intended, the intention was not constitutionally accomplished, because, in so far as the act of 1889 could be construed as having this effect, it most clearly contains matter different from what is expressed in its title. Accordingly, we rule that, even after the passage of the latter act, the section of the Code in question stood, as to the time of holding elections, not as it did originally, but as it did after being amended by the act of 1883. If the foregoing is sound, it follows, without argument, that the act of November 26, 1890, "to amend the fence laws of this state, and to repeal section 1449 of the Code," does not repeal the act of 1883, or affect section 1455 of the Code as thereby amended. The act of 1890 must be understood as referring to the section as it stood when the latter act was passed, and we have already shown that the section then had ingrafted upon it, unaffected by the act of 1889, the amendment made by the act of 1883. Under this section, therefore, the only day upon which an election of the kind therein provided for could be lawfully held was the first Wednesday in July. An election held on any other day was necessarily void. So held the justice of the peace before whom this case originated; so held the judge of the superior court; and so we hold. This settles the matter finally.

2. The hogs of the plaintiff, who sued out the possessory warrant, were unlawfully impounded, and the magistrate was right in awarding him the possession of them. Judgment affirmed.

GRESS LUMBER CO. v. LEITNER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 24, 1893.)

VENDOR AND VENDEE — ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE — BONA FIDE PURCHASER — SEPARATE SALE OF STANDING TIMBER.

1. An administrator, having an order to sell at private sale the wild lands of his intestate, first sold and conveyed the timber upon the land, receiving pay therefor, and afterwards, to a different purchaser, the land itself; giving notice to the latter that the timber had been sold, but, so far as appears, making no exception or qualification in the deed to this purchaser. Held, that one deriving his claim of title from the latter would, if a bona fide purchaser without like notice, be protected, but if he was affected with notice he would hold the land subject in equity to the rights of the purchaser of the timber; and a petition in the nature of a bill for injunction, and also for the recovery of damages, would be maintainable to restrain him from appropriating the timber to his own use, and from interfering with the purchaser thereof in cutting and moving the same from the premises within a reasonable time, and for the recovery of damages for timber already cut and appropriated. Whether, as matter of strict law, a separate sale of the timber was authorized by the order or not, yet, as the order was the basis of that sale, it was admissible in evidence, inasmuch as a mistaken execution of the order, together with the receipt of the purchase money, would operate to create an equity in favor of the purchaser of the timber, which he could enforce against a subsequent purchaser of the land, affected with notice of that equity.

2. An order of sale granted to an administrator, but not executed by him, remains operative after he has been succeeded by an administrator de bonis non, and may be executed by the latter.

Error from superior court, Dodge county;
D. B. Roberts, Judge.

Action by the Gress Lumber Company against C. M. Leitner for an injunction and other relief. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

De Lacy & Bishop, for plaintiff in error.
Martin & Smith, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. Kimball, the administrator of De Vaughn, applied to the ordinary for leave to sell certain wild lands belonging to the estate of his intestate, and leave was granted. Before the land was sold, he resigned, and Hall was appointed administrator in his place. Hall sold the standing sawmill timber on the land to the Gress Lumber Company, and received the purchase money therefor. Subsequently, he sold the land itself to Wilson, giving Wilson notice at the time of the sale that he had already disposed of the sawmill timber to the Gress Lumber Company; but so far as appears, no exception to the timber was made in the deed to Wilson. Wilson sold the land to Leitner, and Leitner entered upon it, and commenced cutting the timber, whereupon the Gress Lumber Company filed its petition to enjoin him from cutting the timber, and for the recovery of damages on account of timber already cut. Upon the trial of the case, it was admitted that both parties derived their title from Hall. The plaintiff offered in evidence a certified copy of the application for leave to sell the land, and of the order of the ordinary granting leave to sell at private sale. This was objected to by the defendant upon the ground that the order did not authorize the administrator to sell the timber on the land separately from the land itself. This objection was sustained, and the court ruled out the application and the order. The plaintiff also offered in evidence the contract of sale of the sawmill timber on the land in dispute, executed by Hall to the Gress Lumber Company in pursuance of the order granting leave to sell the land at private sale. The defendant objected upon the ground that no authority to the administrator to make such a sale of the timber was shown, and the court sustained the objection, and ruled out the contract in so far as it was a deed from Hall as administrator, but admitted it as his individual deed. This testimony being ruled out, the court granted a nonsuit. To each of these rulings the plaintiff excepted. It appears, as we have already said, that Wilson, when he bought the land from Hall, had notice that the sawmill timber had been sold to the Gress Lumber Company; but it does not appear whether Leitner, when he purchased from Wilson, had notice of the sale of the timber, or not. If Leitner was a bona fide purchaser of the land, without notice of the sale of the timber to the Gress Lumber Company, he would be protected, and that company would have no right to enjoin him from cutting the timber, or to recover damages for that already cut. If, upon the other hand, Leitner had notice that the timber had been sold to that company, he would hold the land subject, in equity, to the company's rights, and the company would have a right to enjoin him from appropriating the timber to his own use, and from interfering with the cutting and moving the same by it from the premises within a reasonable time, and to recover damages for timber already cut and appropriated by him. Whether, as matter of strict law, a separate sale of the timber was authorized by the order, or not, yet, as the order was the basis of that sale, it was admissible in evidence, inasmuch as a mistaken execution of the order, together with the receipt of the purchase money, would operate to create an equity in favor of the purchaser of the timber, which he could enforce against a subsequent purchaser of the land, affected with notice of that equity.

2. We think the court erred, also, in holding that where an administrator procures leave from the ordinary to sell land, and resigns before executing the sale, an administrator de bonis non cannot execute it. We think the order granted to the first administrator remains operative, and can be executed by an administrator de bonis non without a new application to the ordinary for leave to sell the same land. Judgment reversed.

HILL et al. v. LEWIS.

ADMINISTRATION—ALLOWANCE TO WIDOW HAVING LIFE ESTATE—RIGHTS OF REMAINDER—MEN.

1. A widow to whom the whole estate was devised and bequeathed for life, there being no minor children, and no debts except the expenses of the last illness and funeral expenses, was not entitled to more than one year's support out of the estate as a statutory right, although she kept the estate together for a longer time, she having so done by her own choice, being both executrix and tenant for life, and the will of her husband not containing any requirement or direction as to keeping the estate together. Whatever the statute may mean by the phrase "when an estate is to be kept together," the keeping of it together by the mere choice or election of the widow herself cannot be recognized as a basis for allowing her continued support from year to year.

2. The widow having, after the lapse of five years, procured an allowance of property in bulk for her support for that whole period, with no separation or specification for any one year, the proceeding before the ordinary resulting in this allowance was void as against a creditor of the person to whom the estate was given by the will in remainder.

Error from superior court, Greene county; H. McWhorter, Judge.

To the execution levy of John M. Hill & Co. on certain land, as belonging to Charles Doherty, H. T. Lewis interposed a claim as trustee. From the judgment entered on the trial of the claim, Hill & Co. bring error. Reversed.

John O. Hart and Payne & Tye, for plaintiffs in error. H. T. Lewis and Jas. B. Park, Jr., for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. John J. Doherty died in 1882, leaving a will by which he gave all his property, real and personal, to his wife, Charlotte, for and during her natural life, and, after her death, the whole of the property to his son Charles, who was then of age. The will appointed the wife as executrix. The testator left no debts except expenses of last sickness and funeral expenses. The wife went into possession of the property, and so remained until her death, in 1890. After she had been in possession for about five years, she applied to the ordinary of the county to set apart to her a support for each of the five years. Commissioners were appointed, and they set apart the whole property to her, and their action was approved by the ordinary. Shortly after this was done, she made a will by which she devised to Lewis, as trustee, all her property, with direction to pay annually to her son Charles, out of the income and profits of her estate, an amount sufficient for his comfortable support and maintenance during his life, the amount being left to the discretion of the trustee. Should the income and profits not be sufficient to supply her son with the necessaries of life and reasonable comforts, the trustee was authorized to encroach upon the corpus of the estate to such extent as might be necessary for the son's comfortable support. In case the son should die without children, the trustee was to pay over the money to another person. In a codicil to the will, she assigned as her reason for appointing a trustee for her son that he was "a person of such character and habits as section 2306 of the Code of Georgia authorizes a trust to be created for." Hill & Co. had obtained an execution against Charles Doherty before the death of his mother, and, after her death, had it levied on a house and lot. Lewis, the trustee, claimed the property under the will of Mrs. Doherty. The question is whether the property was subject as the property of Charles under the will of his father. Under that will, as we have seen, Mrs. Doherty had only a life estate, the remainder interest being in her son Charles. It is insisted on the part of the trustee that, by virtue of the judgment of the ordinary granting her a five-years' support out of the property, she became the absolute owner thereof. It is true that this court has held in several cases that, where a year's support is set apart to a widow, the title vests in her absolutely, and she can dispose of it as she sees fit; but this court has never held that where the whole property is left to a widow for life, with remainder to her children, she can take possession of it, and keep it together; and after the expiration of five years apply for, and have set apart to her, a five years' support in bulk, and thereby acquire the absolute title to the whole of it, thus setting aside the will of the testator, and depriving the remainder-men of their inheritance. There being no minor children; and no expenses except those of the funeral and last sickness, the widow in this case, if entitled to a year's support at all, was entitled only to one year's support. Although she may have kept the estate together for a longer time, she did so of her own choice, because she was both executrix and tenant for life, and the will contained no directions to her to keep the estate together. She was entitled to the whole of it as long as she lived. She could manage it as she pleased, and could dispose of her life interest, if necessary. What necessity was there for her to keep the estate together as the estate of the testator? If there were no debts and no minor children, and no direction in the will to keep the estate together, the property became hers as soon as she took possession of it, as life tenant, and was no longer the estate of her husband. Conceding, however, that it was the estate of the husband, and that she so treated it, we do not think that a widow, of her mere choice, can keep an estate together for several years, and then apply to the ordinary to set apart to her a support for those years in bulk. Whatever section 2572 of the Code may mean by the phrase "when an estate is to be kept together," it certainly does not mean this. It looks to us, under the facts in this case, that the application was made by the widow more for the purpose of getting the title into herself, so that she could dispose of it absolutely, than to obtain the year's support. To allow a widow, under these circumstances, to take possession of the bequest of her husband, live on the property, enjoy the income for a number of years, and then to apply to the ordinary, and have the whole property set apart to her as a support for all the years she has lived on it, would be to allow her to set aside her husband's will of her own volition, and to deprive the remainder-men of the provision left for them by their father. We are sure the law will not authorize such a proceeding. As no amount was specified for a first year's support, the support for that year must fail, together with the support for the subsequent four years.

2. Having shown that the widow, after the lapse of five years, cannot procure an allowance of property in bulk for her support for that whole period, with no separation or specification for any one year, the proceeding before the ordinary resulting in this allowance was void as against a creditor of the person to whom the estate was given by the will in remainder, and as against his creditors. The court therefore erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

RECEIVERS—ACTIONS AGAINST WITHOUT LEAVE OF COURT—VENUE—CARRIERS—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—EVIDENCE.

1. As receivers of railroads, operating the same under legal authority, exercise the charter franchises of the company, they are subject to suit in any county in which the railroad corporation itself may be sued for a like cause of action. While their personal residence is unaffected, their official residence coincides with that of the company they represent; the action being brought to enforce official, and not personal, liability. In order to sue a receiver appointed by a court of the United States, no permission of that court is requisite, there being an act of congress dispensing therewith.

2. The degree of diligence due from a common carrier to a passenger is extraordinary, no matter what means of conveyance may be employed; but what is extraordinary diligence by a freight train is different, in many respects, from that which is such diligence by a passenger train. In this case the jury would so understand from the charge of the court.

3. In a proper case, it is not error to charge that the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the pain and suffering he will probably endure in the future.

4. A passenger by a freight train takes the risk of the usual and ordinary jolts properly incident to handling and running such trains, and, when the nature and degree of the jolt complained of are material, a witness who was present, and had experience in such matters on the same railway, should be allowed to testify in behalf of the company that the car was not going faster than usual; that the jolt was not more than ordinary, and the shake was not sufficient to throw a man, unless he was standing. This evidence would serve to communicate to the jury, in appropriate language, some idea of the nature and violence of the jolt by which the plaintiff was injured.

Error from superior court, Polk county; C. G. Jones, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by H. W. Mabry against Charles P. Ball, receiver of the East & West Railroad. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

A. T. Loudon, I. F. Thompson, and J. P. Ramsand, for plaintiff in error. Irwin & Bunn and Broyles & Son, for defendant in error.

SIMMONS, J. 1. Mabry brought an action for damages in the superior court of Polk county against Ball, as receiver of the East & West Railroad of Alabama, under appointment of the circuit court of the United States, alleging that he was injured by the negligence of the defendant's agents and servants while a passenger on a train on that road. Ball filed a plea in which he alleged that "he is now, and was at the time of the bringing of this action, a resident of Cartersville, in the county of Bartow, in the state of Georgia, and is not now, nor has he ever been, a resident of said county of Polk." On demurrer this plea was stricken. The receiver of a railroad, who operates the same under legal authority, is not liable personally for his official acts. His official liability relates to the fund or property which the court is administering by the machinery of receivership. The receiver does not operate the railroad as an individual, but exercises the charter rights and franchises of the company of which he is receiver. As receiver, he resides in each county through which the railroad passes. Exercising the franchises of the company, he becomes a common carrier, and stands in the shoes of the company, and is liable to be sued in the county where the cause of action originated, as the company would have been, under section 3406 of the Code, before he was placed in charge as receiver. Nor is it necessary, where a receiver has been appointed by a court of the United States, to obtain permission of that court before bringing the suit. The act of congress of March 3, 1887, (24 Stat. 554,) dispenses with the necessity of obtaining that permission from the court. See Central Trust Co. v. St. Louis, A. & T. Ry. Co., 40 Fed. Rep. 426; Eddy v. Lafayette, 49 Fed. Rep. 807.

2. Whenever a common carrier undertakes to carry passengers for hire, he is bound to extraordinary diligence, no matter what means of conveyance may be employed to carry the passenger. This standard of diligence applies as well where the passenger is carried upon a freight train as it does where he is carried upon a passenger train. But what may amount to extraordinary diligence with respect to one class of trains may not amount to it with respect to another class. The standard of diligence is the same, but the manner of its exercise must depend upon the circumstances of the case, taking into consideration the character of the train, and the manner in which it is usually made up and run, and in which the cars are usually coupled to one another. It is well known that jolts and jars are usual and necessary in the running of a freight train,—much more so than in the running of passenger trains; and a passenger who voluntarily takes passage on a freight train takes the risk of the usual and necessary jolts and jars which happen in the making up and running of such trains. A jolt or jar which would be unusual and unnecessary in a passenger train might be usual and necessary in a freight train. But, where a common carrier takes a passenger on a freight train, he must use extraordinary care in preventing unusual and unnecessary jolts and jars, so as to protect the passenger, just as he is required to do to prevent any jolts or jars on a passenger train which would be likely to injure the passenger. See Orine v. Railway Co., 84 Ga. 651, 11 S. E. Rep. 555; Railroad Co. v. Huggins, 89 Ga. 495, (5) 15 S. E. Rep. 848.

3. Where a passenger on a railroad has been injured by the negligence of the company's servants, he is entitled to recover for the pain and suffering caused by the injury, and it is not error for the court to so instruct the jury.

4. The injury on account of which this action is brought was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant's agents and servants in allowing the freight cars to run together so rapidly as to produce an unusual and unnecessary jolt, which threw the plaintiff down from his seat, and injured him. The defendant offered to prove by a witness who was present, and who had had experience in such matters on the same railroad, "that the car was not going faster than usual, the jolt was not more than ordinary, and the shock was not sufficient to throw a man, unless he was standing." On objection of the plaintiff's counsel to this evidence, the court excluded it. We think this was error. As before remarked, a passenger on a freight train takes the risk of the usual and ordinary jolts incident to handling and running such trains. If he is injured by reason of such jolts, the nature and degree of the jolt complained of are material. It is material for the plaintiff to show that it is unusual and unnecessary. It is material for the defendant to show that it was a usual and necessary jolt. There is no machine or instrument by which the violence of the concussion may be determined. It can only be determined by its effect upon the cars and the passengers, and by the opinion of witnesses who have had long experience and training in the management of trains of this character, and who have seen or felt the jolt or jar in question, and who are thus qualified to give an opinion as to whether it was unusual, or usual and ordinary. We think the evidence offered would serve to communicate to the jury some idea of the nature and violence of the jolt by which the plaintiff was injured. Judgment reversed.

McCRORY v. GRANDY et al.

WIFE'S POWER TO CONTRACT—SURETY FOR OTHER THAN HUSBAND—NEW TRIAL—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. A married woman may borrow money for the exclusive benefit of any person other than her husband, and bind her separate property for its payment. The knowledge of the lender of her object in borrowing, and of the use intended to be made of the money, will not affect the validity of the transaction. If, however, the relation of debtor and creditor is established between the lender and the third person, the form given to the writings executed touching the loan and the security for the same being a mere device to cover up a real case of suretyship on the part of the married woman, her contract will not be obligatory.

2. That a case of suretyship was contemplated when the loan was first applied for and assented to will not vitiate the final transaction if, on discovering that the first design conflicted with the law, it was abandoned, and an actual lending to the married woman herself was substituted therefor.

3. Due diligence on the part of counsel conducting the trial of a cause requires that if a written instrument purporting to be signed by their client is offered in evidence, and counsel do not know it to be genuine, they should object, and require proof of its execution. If they fail in this, and the paper be admitted without objection, the subsequent discovery that it is not genuine will not be cause for a new trial, unless it appear that the party who introduced it or his counsel knew or had reason to believe that it was spurious.

4. While the court seems to have committed error in admitting certain letters in evidence, the error was harmless in view of the controlling facts, and is no cause for a new trial. All the answers to certain interrogatories being objected to as inadmissible because the witness derived his information from correspondence, overruling the objection is not cause for reversing the judgment denying a new trial, where it appears from the answers that some of the witness' information pertinent to the case was not so derived, but was matter of personal knowledge. More especially is this true where none of the evidence of the witness is set out in the motion for a new trial.

Error from superior court, Talbot county; A. L. Miller, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by C. W. Grandy and another against Jane McCrory. Plaintiffs had judgment, and, from an order overruling a motion for a new trial, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Grandy sued Mrs. Jane McCrory upon a promissory note for $1,200, principal, dated March 30, 1888, upon which there were certain credits. In addition to the plea of not indebted, defendant pleaded that the note was given to secure a debt for advances made to Ellis & McCrory, a firm composed of J. C. Ellis and J. C. McCrory, and at the time it was given and the contract made she was a married woman, her husband being L. M. McCrory; that Ellis & McCrory applied to plaintiffs for a loan, and asked her to stand their security; that the money was loaned to them, and she did not receive any part of it or any benefit from it, nor did it go to the benefit of her separate estate, but was for the benefit exclusively of Ellis & McCrory, and she was their security, at the time owning a separate estate, which facts were all known to plaintiffs. There was a verdict for plaintiffs, and defendant's motion for new trial being overruled, she excepted.

The motion contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc., and to a certain portion of the charge.

Also, because the court erred in permitting plaintiffs to read to the jury, over objection of defendant, interrogatories of A. H. and C. W. Grandy, defendant having objected to the same upon the grounds: Because the answers to the interrogatories showed that the negotiations for the loan were by letter, and there was no letter attached or produced from defendant offering to borrow the money, and they do not undertake to show that they received a letter from her which was lost or destroyed; and because the answers show that all the information Grandy & Son, who were the witnesses, had touching the matter was by correspondence, which correspondence would be the highest evidence of what took place between the parties. No particular part of these answers is set out in the motion as objectionable, nor are all the answers set out. It seems from an examination of the answers as set out in the brief of evidence that the answers certainly covered some matters a knowledge of which was not derived from correspondence.

Because the court erred in not sustaining the motion made by defendant to rule out the two letters written by J. J. Bull to plaintiffs, the motion being upon the ground that the letters showed that Bull was not representing defendant in this transaction, and Bull having also stated in open court that he was not employed to defend in this transaction. These letters are set out in the brief of evidence. One of them was dated May 21, 1889, and stated that in the spring of 1888 the writer's client, Mrs. McCrory, borrowed from plaintiffs $1,200, and loaned the same to Ellis & McCrory; that she was trying to make her money she borrowed from plaintiffs and loaned the firm, and the writer wrote to ask if plaintiffs could give him any information touching the matter,—whether or not they gave any bond to Ellis & McCrory, and could give him a statement as to the condition of Ellis & McCrory. The other letter was dated May 31, 1889, and stated that the information the writer's client, Mrs. McCrory, sought of plaintiffs could not be furnished by their attorneys unless they had plaintiffs' books or a transcript of them; that the statement made in regard to McDowell & Ellis was to show plaintiffs why the information was sought; that it would be a surprise to the writer's client to know that plaintiffs had employed attorneys to collect the money out of her when no payment had been demanded, and, if this was the stand they took in the matter, it was their lookout; that the writer desired to say he was not employed by Mrs. McCrory to defeat or defend, hinder or delay, the collection of the money she was due plaintiffs.

Error in permitting plaintiffs to read to the jury the two letters mentioned, defendant objecting to the introduction of the same, because the relation of attorney and client existed at the time; whereupon Mr. Bull stated, in reply to the question propounded by the court, "I will hear from you whether the relation of attorney and client existed between Bull and Mrs. McCrory," "It was written for the purpose of trying to get an affidavit from these parties to show that McDowell & Ellis had assumed the debt that Ellis & McCrory had made. This suit had not been brought, and I had nothing to do with it, and in fact I did not know that it would be." Because the court, after he had ruled out, over defendant's objection, this portion of letter written by Bull to plaintiffs, "On the contrary, I have heard her (and her husband) say they should pay it this fall, whether she made it out of McDowell & Ellis or not," erred in examining Bull, while on the stand and in the presence of the jury, as follows: "The Court: I do not understand your letters. In this letter you said you had not conferred with Mrs. Jane Y. McCrory? Answer. No, sir; I never had conferred with her. Question. This expression you say, 'I have heard her say they would pay it this fall, whether she made the money out of McDowell & Ellis or not?' A. Well, I will just explain that. I was trying to get them— Q. All I want to know,—you did not hear her say it? A. I did not hear her say it. Never saw her. It was a catch letter."

Error in refusing to give in charge the following written requests of defendant: "If Grandy & Son was on notice that this money to be borrowed was for the exclusive benefit of Ellis & McCrory, and the note and deed made by Mrs. J. Y. McCrory was to secure this money loaned to Ellis & McCrory, and she secured no benefit from said loan, then she is not bound by said contract, and they could not recover. If the correspondence in negotiating the loan was carried on by Ellis & McCrory with Grandy & Son, and Ellis & McCrory paid the lawyers their fees at Norfolk and in Talbotton, and Mrs. McCrory employed no lawyers and paid no fees for drawing the papers upon which the loan was obtained, then this is a strong circumstance to look to in determining whether Mrs. McCrory borrowed the money in her own right or for Ellis & McCrory, and was only security for Ellis & McCrory. If Ellis & McCrory induced Mrs. McCrory to borrow this money from Grandy & Sons for their use and benefit, and Grandy & Sons knew it was for the use and benefit of Ellis & McCrory, and, knowing this, loaned the money, and for that purpose, then they could not recover, and the taking of the deed and note in the individual name of Jane Y. McCrory would be only a device to evade the law. Should you find that Ellis & McCrory opened negotiations with the plaintiffs, for the loan of money for their use upon the security of Mrs. Jane Y. Mc-

Crory, and that she was a married woman, and that the plaintiffs knew that she was a married woman, then the plaintiffs could not change the operation by loaning them the money for the same purpose, receiving in lieu of Ellis & McCrory's note, with Mrs. McCrory as security, the individual note of Mrs. McCrory. Was the money actually loaned and intended as an accommodation to Ellis & McCrory, with full knowledge on the part of the plaintiffs and Mrs. McCrory that it was intended to be used for the benefit of Ellis & McCrory, and not for the benefit of Jane Y. McCrory, and that the change was made in manner before stated, as a substitute in lieu of the original note first offered? Then you should find for the defendant. The law will not countenance any artifice or contrivance to evade the provisions of the law to protect married women from incumbering their estates by being security for others. If Ellis & McCrory opened negotiations with Grandy & Sons to borrow money, and tendered Jane Y. McCrory as security, and she signed a mortgage on certain lands, and specified in said mortgage that it was to secure a debt of Ellis & McCrory, and signed a note jointly with J. C. Ellis and James T. McCrory, partners, composing the firm of Ellis & McCrory, and the plaintiffs declined to loan money on that paper, and so notified them, and sent the mortgage and the note to Willis & Persons, attorneys selected by Grandy & Sons, and they drew a deed and note, and Mrs. McCrory signed it individually, and the same identical lands were embraced in the deed that were embraced in the mortgage, then this is notice to Grandy & Sons that Mrs. McCrory was security, and they could not recover, and that it was a continuous contract between Grandy & Sons and Ellis & McCrory, the one to loan the money on Mrs. McCrory's security, and the other to borrow the same way."

Error in charging: "If a negotiation had been going on between the plaintiffs and Ellis & McCrory to borrow money, and the plaintiffs had declined to loan to them on the security offered, and afterwards the defendant, Mrs. McCrory, borrowed from plaintiffs the money sued for, and loaned it to Ellis & McCrory, the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover, although they may have known she was going to let Ellis & McCrory have the money. Now, furthermore, upon that, she would be authorized to do that through an agent. If, in fact, she intended to bind herself, she might not see the men or the bank from whom she desired to borrow. She could go to some relative or to some stranger, or to any person that she might select to go and negotiate the loan for her, or to buy goods for her. She might send word by some agent that the purchase was not for herself, nor to be of any benefit to her; that the money borrowed was to be for somebody else; but if the contract, whether made by herself or by the agent, was either to borrow the money or to buy the goods upon her own responsibility, she would be bound. It would also be true that, although she might arrange with the person who did furnish the goods or the money that they might pay the debt of another, that would not alter her liability, if her original contract was to create the debt, binding upon herself and for herself. Now, in this case the plaintiffs' theory of it is this: That they undertook to negotiate with Ellis & McCrory to loan them some money upon Mrs. McCrory becoming their security; that they found out, under the law of Georgia, that that could not be done,—she could not legally bind herself; that they abandoned that negotiation, and did find that she could bind herself on her own responsibility; that they made a new trade, letting Ellis & McCrory stand aside; and that they loaned her the money, knowing that it was to be used by Ellis & McCrory; and that they made with her an independent contract, by which they gave up the claim on Ellis & McCrory; didn't look to them, but looked to Mrs. McCrory, taking her note, and taking a deed to her land to secure that indebtedness; that the money was loaned to her. That is their theory of this case. Now, if you believe this transaction, that that is the truth of the case, she is bound; she ought to pay the money, and you ought to find against her, and in favor of Grandy & Sons, if you believe that this is the truth of this case under the evidence. As I said in stating the general principles in the case, it was entirely competent for Grandy & Son to make a trade with Mrs. McCrory through Ellis & McCrory as her agent. They were not obliged to have actual interviews with her or actual correspondence with her. If she knew what was going on, or if she acted through them, being moved by reason of her affection to contract this debt, why she would be bound just as though she had gone in person to Grandy & Son and made the loan."

Because of newly-discovered testimony. In support of this ground defendant produced the affidavit of Mrs. McCrory. She has examined the original order, of which the following is a copy: "Talbotton P. O., Talbot County, Ga. March 31st, 1888. Mess. Grandy & Sons: Will please let Ellis & McCrory have the money by draft as they order it, and this will be your receipt for the same. Jane Y. McCrory." She never saw this order until exhibited to her on March 31, 1892, (after the verdict.) She never signed it, nor authorized any one to sign it for her. Neither the signature nor the body of the paper is in her handwriting. She was never called on by plaintiffs or any one for them to give this order. She was not aware until the trial of the case that such a paper was in existence, or that plaintiffs claimed to hold an order of any kind signed by herself, and the fact that plaintiffs had the order and that her name appeared on it only came to her knowledge since the trial. She was not at the trial, as she testified by interrogatories. She used due diligence to discover evidence and prepare for trial, and it was impossible for her to anticipate that the order would be used, as it is a forgery, and she had no reason to believe that such paper would be used. Its use was a great damage to her. Also the affidavits of her attorneys as to their diligence in preparing for trial; and that they never saw the order until during the trial, when it was tendered in evidence, nor had they heard of it, but, when it was tendered, thought it was the act of their client, she not being present, until after the trial, when she informed them she had not signed it, nor had ever authorized any one to do so for her; and that the order was material.

J. J. Bull and J. H. Worrill, for plaintiff in error. Willis & Persons, for defendants in error.

SIMMONS, J. The firm of Ellis & McCrory, desiring to borrow money, wrote to Grandy & Son, of Norfolk, Va., for that purpose, and proposed to give as their security for the loan Mrs. James Y. McCrory, the mother of one of the firm. Grandy & Son agreed to make the loan on this security; but, upon advising with attorneys in this state, they were informed that Mrs. McCrory, being a married woman, could not bind herself as security; and it was then arranged that Mrs. McCrory should borrow the money from Grandy & Son in her own name, she giving her note for the amount borrowed, and making the lenders a deed to certain land, her separate estate, to secure the payment of the note. Grandy & Son knew that she intended to lend the money to Ellis & McCrory, she having given an order to Grandy & Son to let Ellis & McCrory have the money on their draft. Ellis & McCrory drew on the fund thus borrowed by Mrs. McCrory until it was exhausted. When the note fell due, Mrs. McCrory refused to pay it, and suit was brought thereon by Grandy & Son. To this suit she pleaded that the debt for which the note was given was not her own, but was the debt of Ellis & McCrory, and that she was simply a security, and, being a married woman, was not liable thereon. On this state of facts several requests to charge were made by her counsel, which are set out in the report prefixed to this opinion. She made a motion for a new trial, on the several grounds set out therein, which was overruled by the court, and she excepted.

1, 2. Under our Code (section 1783) there are three things which a married woman having a separate estate cannot lawfully do,—she cannot bind her separate estate by any contract of suretyship, nor can she assume the debts of her husband, nor sell her separate estate to a creditor of the husband to extinguish his debts. If she should do any of these things, the transaction would be absolutely void. These are the only restrictions put upon her in dealing with her separate estate, and, outside of them, she stands upon the same footing as a man or a feme sole. She can borrow money, and pledge her separate estate for the payment thereof, and can lend the same money to her son, or to a firm of which he is a member, and the knowledge of the lender that she is borrowing the money for this purpose will not affect the validity of the transaction. White v. Stocker, 85 Ga. 200, 11 S. E. Rep. 604. Of course, all this must be done in good faith. She must be the real debtor to the lender. If the relation of debtor and creditor exists between the lender and a third person, and a married woman is made the ostensible debtor, she would be nothing but a security, and the note would be void, although the writings executed by her to secure the debt are signed only by her. This would be a device to cover up a real cause of suretyship on her part. See the reasoning in the case of Scofield v. Jones, 85 Ga. 820, 11 S. E. Rep. 1032. If the original negotiations contemplated that a married woman should be security simply, and the lender, upon ascertaining that she could not lawfully bind herself as security, declines to lend the money, she could renew the negotiations, either by herself or her agent, and borrow the money in her own name, with the purpose of lending it to the original applicant for the loan; and if the money is lent to her, and she becomes the real debtor to the lender, she will be liable therefor just as if she had commenced the original negotiations for herself. Where she is the principal debtor, she is upon the same plane as a man with regard to her separate estate, and is equally bound upon her contracts. These views cover the requests to charge on this subject and the exceptions to the charge as given.

3. Pending the trial the plaintiffs introduced in evidence an order to them, purporting to be signed by Mrs. McCrory, authorizing them to let Ellis & McCrory have the money which she had borrowed upon their drafts. This paper was not objected to by the defendant's counsel, nor was proof required of its execution. After the trial, when the order was shown to the defendant, she denied its genuineness, and made an affidavit that she had not signed it or authorized any one to sign it for her, and this is made a ground of the motion for a new trial, upon the theory of newly-discovered evidence, it appearing from this ground and the affidavit in connection with it that Mrs. McCrory was not present at the trial. We think, where counsel is conducting the trial of a case, and a paper is offered in evidence by the other side, and counsel does not know whether it is genuine, due diligence requires that he shall demand proof of its execution. If he fails to do this, and allows the paper to go in evidence without objection, and after the trial it is discovered that the paper is a forgery, this discovery will not be cause for a new trial, unless it also appears that the opposite party or his counsel knew or had reason to believe that the paper was not genuine.

4. The other grounds of the motion are sufficiently covered by the fourth headnote. Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. LEWIS.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 17, 1893.)

ESCAPE—LIABILITY OF JAILER FOR ACTS OF ASSISTANT.

Code, § 1022, relating to the charge against an officer of allowing a prisoner to escape, provides that it shall be sufficient in support of the indictment to prove that the prisoner "was committed to his custody, and it shall be upon defendant to show that such escape was not by his consent or negligence, but that he had used all legal means to prevent the same and acted with proper care and diligence." Held that, where the prisoner was allowed to escape by an assistant employed during defendant's sickness, the only question under the indictment against defendant was whether he had exercised due care in the selection of his assistant.

Appeal from superior court, Vance county; Shuford, Judge.

William Lewis was convicted of negligently allowing a prisoner to escape from the jail of which he was keeper, and appeals. Affirmed.

This was an indictment tried by Shuford, J., and a jury at May term, 1893, of Vance superior court. The offense charged was against the defendant, as jailer of said county, for negligently permitting the escape of a prisoner from the county jail. It appeared from the evidence that the defendant was sick, and intrusted the keys, or some of the keys, of the jail to one Jim Green, a man whom he had hired to assist him in attending to the jail,—cleaning it, heating it, and in carrying the prisoners food and water; that before he hired him he had made inquiry as to the character of the said Green, and was informed that he was all right, and a reliable man, except that he was a big liar. There was conflicting evidence as to whether the defendant intrusted Green with all of the keys of the jail or only some of them, and there was evidence tending to prove that some of the inner keys were furnished by some one else, a former jailer, they being duplicates which had never come into the hands of defendant; and that said Green permitted the escape. His honor held, and recalled the jury twice to tell them, that it made no difference whether the jailer intrusted the keys of the cells to James Green or not, but the question for them was whether he had used due care in employing a trustworthy assistant. He had instructed them that the jailer had a right to employ an assistant, and to intrust him with all the keys, but that he must be careful to employ one who was trustworthy, and if he did not use such care he would be guilty; that defendant admitted being informed that said Green was a big liar, and that they had seen Green on the witness stand, and heard him admit that he had made contradictory statements about the escape.

A. A. Hicks, A. J. Harris, and T. T. Hicks, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

MacRAE, J. Section 1022 of the Code, in relation to the offense above referred to, provides that "In all such cases it shall be sufficient, in support of the indictment against such sheriff or other officer, to prove that such person so charged or sentenced was committed to his custody, and it shall lie upon the defendant to show that such escape was not by his consent or negligence, but that he had used all legal means to prevent the same, and acted with proper care and diligence." The defendant undertook the burden of showing that the escape was not by his consent or negligence. The rule is laid down in State v. Johnson, 94 N. C. 924: "It is not necessary to prove negligence in one who has the lawful custody of the prisoner, for it is implied, and is excusable only when occasioned by the act of God, or from irresistible adverse force." The defendant set up his sickness, which, if believed by the jury, was a sufficient excuse for his personal failure to prevent the escape, and the only question, as stated by his honor, was whether he had exercised due care in the employment of his assistant. It was properly left to the jury, accompanied with the repeated instructions of his honor. There is no error.

LE DUC v. MOORE et al.

STIPULATION OF COUNSEL—CASE ON APPEAL.

Where there is no case on appeal, and appellant moves for a certiorari, filing affidavits of counsel that there was an agreement to extend the time of serving the case, and the opposite party files affidavits denying such agreement, the motion will be denied, under supreme court rule 39, (12 S. E. Rep. ix., 104 N. C. 927,) providing that agreements of counsel shall be in writing.

Action by W. G. Le Duc, receiver, against E. F. Moore and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants apply for writ of certiorari. Denied.

N. Y. Gulley, for petitioners. Thos. H. Sutton, for defendant.

BURWELL, J. The petitioner bases his application for a writ of certiorari upon the allegation that in the court below plaintiff's counsel orally accepted notice of his appeal, and extended the time for stating the case. It is conceded that the record in that court does not show that an appeal was asked at the trial, or that any notice of an appeal was waived or accepted, or that the time for stating the case was extended. The plaintiff's counsel denies that he made any such agreement. His denial puts an end to the matter, for we cannot undertake to decide between them, but must adhere strictly to the rule of this court, (No. 39,) and follow the decisions heretofore made in like cases, the latest of which is Sondley v. City of Asheville, 112 N. C. 494, 17 S. E. Rep. 534. Motion denied.

PILAND v. TAYLOR et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

DEPUTY CLERKS OF COURT—PROBATE OF DEEDS—CERTIFICATE.

1. Under the provisions of Rev. Code, c. 37, § 2, allowing the deputy clerk to take the probate of a deed, such probate is valid, though the clerk be the grantee in the deed.

2. A certificate of a deputy clerk to the probate of a deed is sufficient prima facie evidence of his appointment and qualification.

Appeal from superior court, Gates county; Bynum, Judge.

L. L. Smith, for appellants. W. D. Pruden, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The question presented for our consideration is whether there was error on the part of the court in excluding the deed which was offered in evidence by the defendants. This deed purports to have been executed in August, 1852, by one Elisha Umphlett to Henry L. Eure, and was registered on the 18th of January, 1861. It appears from the certificate of probate that it was proved upon the oath of one of the subscribing witnesses, before R. B. G. Cowper, deputy clerk, and it is insisted that as the clerk, Henry L. Eure, was the grantee in the said deed, his deputy could not, by reason of the interest of his principal, take the probate thereof. A "deputy" is usually defined to be one who by appointment exercises an office in another's right. He is regarded as an agent or servant of his principal, and must as a general rule do all things "in his principal's name, and for whose misconduct the principal is responsible." Willis v. Melvin, 8 Jones, (N. C.) 62; Holding v. Holding, 2 Car. Law Repos. 440; Martin v. Mackonochie, 3 Q. B. Div. 741. "The authority given by law to a ministerial officer is given to the incumbent of the office. The authority is not given to the deputy, but to the principal, and is exercised by the principal, either by himself or his deputy." 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 624. Had Mr. Cowper been authorized, as is held in some of the states, to take the probate of deeds by virtue simply of his position as deputy, he would, it seems, have been acting only as an agent or servant of the clerk, and, his act being necessarily that of the clerk, and deriving its efficacy entirely through him, the probate would have been void. This result would follow, not because of any statutory inhibition at that time, similar to the provisions of the existing law, (Code, § 104,) which forbids the clerk to take the probate of any deed to which he is a party, but for the reason that in so acting he would be offending a fundamental rule in the administration of justice, which is embodied in the maxim "Nemo debet esse iudex in propria sua causa." Mr. Cowper, however, had no authority, merely as deputy, to take the probate of a deed, as such an act has been decided in this state to be judicial in its character, (Shepherd v. Lane, 2 Dev. 148; Suddereth v. Smyth, 13 Ired. 452; Tatom v. White, 95 N. C. 453;) and it is well settled that an officer, clothed with judicial functions, cannot delegate the discharge of those functions to another, (Broom, Leg. Max. 808.) The Act 1777, c. 115, (Rev. Code, c. 19, § 15,) providing for the qualification of deputy clerks, did not change in any respect the principle of the common law that the clerk could only delegate to another the performance of the ministerial functions of his office, (Jackson v. Buchanan, 89 N. C. 74,) and in respect to this very matter of the probate of deeds it was held in the Suddereth Case, supra, that, but for the express provisions of the act of 1829 the deputy could not exercise such a function. It is there explicitly held that such a power cannot be delegated by the clerk, but is conferred upon the deputy by force of the statute alone. This being so, the conclusion would seem to be irresistible that in taking the probate of a deed the deputy is not acting merely as an agent or servant of the clerk, but is performing an independent judicial function, which is vested in him by law so long as he occupies such an official position. We are therefore of the opinion that the authority of the deputy in this instance was in no way affected by reason of the interest of the clerk.

There is some conflict of authority in other jurisdictions as to whether the deputy should sign the certificate in his own name or in that of the clerk; but, as the decisions chiefly relate to cases in which the taking of a probate is held to be a ministerial act, they can have but little practical bearing upon the present question. According to the views we have indicated, the deputy, Cowper, had the authority, under the provisions of the Revised Code, to take this probate; and as it plainly appears from the certificate that he, and not the clerk, performed this duty, the insertion of the clerk's name before the words "Per R. B. G. Cowper, D. C.," cannot invalidate his act.

It is further contended that the signature of Cowper in the capacity of deputy clerk was not in itself sufficient evidence of his official character, and for this reason the deed was properly excluded. When the deed was proven and registered in 1859, the deputy of the clerk of the county court was, as we have seen, expressly authorized to take the acknowledgment and proof of deeds, etc., (Rev. Code, c. 37, § 2;) and the official character of such deputy was so far recognized that it was provided, as a prerequisite to the validity of his acts, that he should take an oath "to support the constitution of the United States and of the state, and an oath of office," (Id. c. 19, § 15; Shepherd v. Lane, supra.) It is also provided in the same section that the clerks of the superior and county courts "shall keep their offices at the courthouse in their respective county, where, by themselves or their lawful deputies, they shall give due attendance, * * * and that, in case of death of the clerk of any court in the vacation, his deputy shall hold the office of clerk until another shall be appointed," etc. The office of deputy clerk being thus recognized by the law, as well as the authority of such officer to take the probate of deeds, we are unable to see why he should be excluded from the presumption which generally obtains respecting the due appointment of persons purporting to discharge the duties of public official positions. Accordingly, it has been held that, "if the person taking an acknowledgment styles himself an officer before whom an acknowledgment may be taken, his certificate is prima facie evidence of the fact that he is such officer. 1 Devl. Deeds, § 500; Tuten v. Gazan, 18 Fla. 751. "The practice is to take a certificate which appears on its face to be in conformity with the statutes as proof of its own genuineness. * * * Accordingly, where the certificate describes the proper officer, acting in the proper place, it is taken as proof both of his character and local jurisdiction." 1 Devl. Deeds, supra, § 500. In Lawson's Presumptive Evidence (page 56) it is said: "To entitle deeds to be read in evidence, they are required to be acknowledged and recorded in a certain manner. A deed is produced purporting to have been acknowledged before a justice of the peace. The presumption is that the registrar of deeds who made the record had sufficient evidence of the official character of the magistrate to entitle the deed to be recorded." Forsalith v. Clark, 21 N. H. 409. To the same effect is the case of Livingston v. Kettelle, 41 Amer. Dec. 166, in a note to which Judge Freeman says that "proof of official character of the officer taking an acknowledgment is not necessary to give it validity, in the absence of any statute requiring such proof, if the certificate purports to have been made by an officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments, and is in due form; but the certificate itself is prima facie evidence of that fact. Carpenter v. Dexter, 8 Wall. 513; Willink v. Miles, 1 Pet. C. C. 429; Thompson v. Morgan, 6 Minn. 292, (Gil. 199); Harding v. Curtis, 45 Ill. 252; Thurman v. Cameron, 24 Wend. 87." These authorities, as well as considerations of public policy, abundantly sustain the position that the certificate of the deputy clerk was at least prima facie evidence of his appointment and qualification. We are of the opinion that the deed should have been admitted in evidence, and that there should be a new trial.

MIZELL et al. v. RUFFIN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

DEED—VALIDITY—INDEFINITENESS OF DESCRIPTION.

A deed conveying "a portion of the cypress timber on Ahoskie and Loosing swamps," and providing that the grantor "may retain from the timber enough for his farm and building purposes," is void for indefiniteness.

Appeal from superior court, Bertie county; Hoke, Judge.

Action by Josiah Mizell and John C. Britton against Joseph B. Ruffin to recover damages for breach of warranty. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

W. D. Pruden, for appellants. F. D. Winston, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The deed from Burden to Ruffin conveyed "a portion of his cypress timber on Ahoskie and Loosing swamps." This is void for uncertainty, for it does not appear what portion is conveyed. Harrison v. Hahn, 95 N. C. 28; Blakely v. Patrick, (the "Buggy Case,") 67 N. C. 40; Atkinson v. Graves, 91 N. C. 99; McDaniel v. Allen, 99 N. C. 135, 5 S. E. Rep. 737. Nor is this helped out or rendered more certain by the condition which immediately follows, that the grantor and his heirs "may retain from this timber enough for his farm and building purposes." The relative pronoun "this" refers to its antecedent, which is the "portion" which is attempted to be conveyed. But, if the reservation was out of the whole body of the timber, the "portion" conveyed would still remain indefinite. It may or may not be that the grantor intended to convey all his timber except that reserved, but it is clear that such is not the plain meaning of the words used, and the rules of legal construction will not admit of a surmise of the probable intent of the grantor contrary to the purport of his words. The subsequent deed given by Burden to Wyner is admitted to be sufficient in form. There has been a breach of the warranty given by Ruffin to the plaintiffs for which they can maintain their action. Whether the defendant is protected by the statute of limitations, or has other adequate matter of defense, is not now before us. Error.

OUTLAND et al. v. OUTLAND et al.

PLEADING—COMPLAINT—MISJOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION.

A testator devised certain land to two sons, charged with the support of another son, who was insane. A complaint in an action against one of the devisees, and the heirs and grantees of the other devisee, alleged that such insane son had lived and been supported by plaintiffs under an arrangement between them and such devisees that the latter should pay for his support and maintenance, and asked judgment for the amount due for such support, and that all the land be subjected to payment thereof. Held, that there was no misjoinder of causes of action.

Appeal from superior court, Northampton county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by Thomas P. Outland, by Aaron A. Parker, his next friend, and Aaron A. Parker and Judith A. Parker, husband and wife, against Elijah Outland, and C. W. Harrall and others, grantees of Cornelius Outland, deceased, and John Outland and others, children of deceased and executor of his estate, to recover for the support of plaintiff Outland, an insane person, and to subject certain land to the payment of the judgment. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

R. O. Burton, for appellants.

CLARK, J. This action was brought upon the allegation that Thomas Outland devised certain lands to his sons Elijah and Cornelius, charged with the support of another son, Thomas, who was non compos mentis; that "said Thomas has lived with and been supported by the plaintiffs, under an arrangement entered into between said Cornelius and Elijah and these plaintiffs that said Cornelius and Elijah should pay for his support and maintenance." Payment not having been made, the plaintiffs ask for judgment for the amount, and to subject the land of Elijah, and also of Cornelius, now partly in hands of heirs and partly in the hands of purchasers, (who are made defendants,) to the payment thereof. The only question presented by the appeal is whether this is a misjoinder of causes of action. We think not. Code, § 267, subd. 1; Hamlin v. Tucker, 72 N. C. 502; Glenn v. Bank, Id. 626; McMillan v. Edwards, 75 N. C. 81; Young v. Young, 81 N. C. 91; Bank v. Harris, 84 N. C. 206; King v. Farmer, 88 N. C. 22; Heggie v. Hill, 95 N. C. 303. Whether the devise is a charge upon the land, and, if so, whether the plaintiffs are subrogated to the right to enforce it, are interesting questions, but are not now before us. In ruling that there was a misjoinder of causes of action, there was error.

LENOIR et al. v. VALLEY RIVER MIN. CO.

EJECTMENT—TENANCY IN COMMON—CONSTRUCTION OF WRITTEN AGREEMENT—ADVERSE POSSESSION.

1. Where, in ejectment, defendant claims an undivided one-third of the land as tenant in common with plaintiffs, and plaintiffs show title to an undivided two-thirds only, they are only entitled to a judgment letting them into possession with defendant to the extent of the interest shown, since a recovery for the whole tract could only be warranted by a showing that the same evidence of title or possession that established their own title demonstrated the fact that others than defendant held the other one-third as cotenants with plaintiffs, and that such action would inure to the benefit of such cotenants. Allen v. Salinger, 8 S. E. Rep. 913, 103 N. C. 14, followed.

2. An agreement between tenants in common for a division of the proceeds of sales of their lands, thereafter to be made, and an authority to one of them to take entire control and management of certain sales of lands for the parties, is not a conveyance of land, nor contract to convey, nor lease of land, within Acts 1885, c. 147, § 1, providing that no conveyance of land, nor contract to convey, nor lease of land for more than three years shall pass any property, as against creditors or purchasers for a valuable consideration, from the donor, bargainor, or lessor, unless registered before January 1, 1886.

3. A tenant in common is not estopped by declarations of a cotenant against his interest without evidence of any authority of the cotenant to bind him.

4. Where plaintiffs claim an undivided two-thirds interest in certain lands under a deed, as tenants in common with others, and are in possession under such claim, they cannot claim the whole tract by adverse possession for seven years.

Appeal from superior court, Cherokee county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Ejectment by B. B. Lenoir and others against the Valley River Mining Company. From a judgment giving plaintiffs possession of two-thirds of the land sued for, they appeal. Affirmed.

W. W. Jones and T. F. Davidson, for appellants. Edward McCrady and J. W. Cooper, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. This case was here on appeal, and was held over for a reargument at September term, 1889, (104 N. C. 490, 10 S. E. Rep. 525,) and at February term, 1890, a new trial was granted, on the ground that his honor had improperly excluded evidence offered by defendant tending to show color of title to an undivided one-third of the land in controversy, and possession thereunder for seven years. It comes up now upon the plaintiffs' appeal from a judgment that the plaintiffs are owners of only an undivided two-thirds of said land, and that they be let into possession of the same with the defendant, and that plaintiffs pay the costs.

On account, we presume, of delay in making up the case on appeal, and the loss of the judge's notes, we regret to say that the interesting questions discussed on the argument are not very clearly presented in the case. According to the pleadings, the plaintiffs, about 40 in number, aver that they are the owners and entitled to the possession of the land described in the complaint, and that defendant Jordan is in the wrongful possession thereof, and withholds the same from plaintiffs. The defendant the mining company in answer admits that defendant Jordan is in possession of said land as tenant of said mining company, but avers that his possession is not adverse to the plaintiffs. It avers that plaintiffs are the owners of an undivided share or part of said land, and that it, the said mining company, is the owner of an undivided one-third of the same, and that it was in possession as owner of said undivided interest for years before the plaintiffs acquired title to the other part thereof, and that for 17 years there has been a joint possession of said land by plaintiffs and defendant as tenants in common, and that defendant's possession has been in no way exclusive of plaintiffs. It alleges further, in substance, that the plaintiffs, who had always admitted and recognized defendant's title to the undivided one-third of said land, have purchased a pretended title to the whole tract, and have taken a deed for the same to plaintiffs. The defendant demands judgment that it is entitled to sixteen forty-eighths, or one undivided third part, of the premises described in the complaint, and to the joint possession of the same as cotenant with plaintiffs, and to the benefit of any deed or deeds, quitclaims, release or releases of any outstanding claims against said property, which may have been made to the plaintiffs, or to any one or more of them since their cotenancy with this defendant. The issues submitted by his honor were: (1) Are the plaintiffs the owners of the land sued for? (2) Are the defendants in the wrongful possession of such land?

The plaintiffs offered in evidence (1) a grant from the state to S. W. Hyatt for the land in controversy, dated May 20, 1853. (2) A deed from R. H. Hyatt, the only heir at law, and Nancy A. Hyatt, the widow, of S. W. Hyatt, to B. Y. McAden, March 15, 1873, by which they "bargained, sold, transferred, and quitclaimed unto the said Bartlett Y. McAden all their interest, right, claim, and demand of and into" the land described in the complaint. (3) A deed of the same character from B. Y. McAden to J. T. Lenoir, William Lenoir, Dr. B. B. Lenoir, and Israel P. Lenoir, 14th April, 1873. "And the plaintiffs then introduced evidence to show that they had been in the actual occupation of the land in controversy, claiming the same adversely against the world, since the 14th day of April, 1873." The defendant offered in evidence two deeds, by which it was made to appear that long prior to the execution of the deed from the widow and heir of S. W. Hyatt the said S. W. Hyatt had conveyed to one A. J. Patton an undivided one-third of said land on June 6, 1855, and that in September, 1856, the coroner of Cherokee county had sold and conveyed under execution against said S. W. Hyatt, who was himself sheriff of Cherokee county, all of his interest in said land to A. J. Patton, and that in December, 1857, the sheriff of Cherokee, H. H. Davidson, had again sold and conveyed all the interest of said Hyatt in said land to Drury Weeks and John A. Robinson, thus showing that said heir at law and widow had no interest in said land at the time of the execution of their deed to McAden. The defendant then offered in evidence many deeds showing conveyances through different parties and in different moieties from said Patton, Weeks, and Robinson to the above-named Lenoirs. The connection of the other plaintiffs of record with the controversy is nowhere made to appear. We presume they are the heirs at law of the said Lenoirs. The defendant offered in support of its own title to an undivided third of said land a deed from W. N. Bilbo to the Valley River Mining Company, the defendant purporting to convey said interest, dated 6th January, 1867. The defendant then offered in evidence an agreement dated January 28, 1863, between W. N. Bilbo, A. O. Lyon, and Drury Weeks, which was objected to by plaintiffs "for the reason that the same had been registered after the time allowed by law," which objection was overruled by his honor, and plaintiffs excepted. The reason given by his honor for overruling the objection is: "The defendants, according to the evidence, being tenants in common, and no interfering interest having arisen."

We do not clearly apprehend the reasons above stated, but on examination of the act of 1885, chapter 147,¹ and of the "agreement" objected to, we hold that the instrument was neither a conveyance of land, nor contract to convey, nor lease of land, which, by the terms of the aforesaid act, was required to be registered before January 1, 1886. It is an agreement between the parties for a division of the proceeds of sales thereafter to be made, and an authority or power to said Bilbo to take entire control and management of certain sales of lands and minerals for the parties. It is long and very obscurely expressed, and not necessary to be set forth in this opinion. Two paper writings attached to the above agreement, and described as "receipts," were also offered in evidence by defendant, and objected to by plaintiffs upon the same ground as that of the objection to the said agreement; but we are of the opinion that they were not such instruments as were required by the act of 1885 to be registered. Besides, the said agreement, with the two indorsements thereon, was not offered as a deed of conveyance constituting a link in defendant's chain of title to one-third of said land, but as a declaration of said Patton, Weeks, and Robinson to the effect that they were cotenants of said land. Such declarations might have been competent for the purpose of working an estoppel upon the persons making said declarations while in possession, and upon their privies; and it was the contention of defendant that plaintiffs derived their title to two-thirds of said land through Patton, and were bound by the said declarations; but, in the view which we take of the case, as will be seen hereafter, we think they were immaterial, and had no effect upon the event of the controversy. The defendant offered certain letters, purporting to have been written by I. T. Lenoir in 1871, 1872, and 1873, for the purpose of showing the character of plaintiffs' possession. The other plaintiffs would not be estopped by declarations against interest of one of their cotenants without evidence of any power or authority in the person making such declarations to bind the others; but his honor, after admitting the same, in effect ruled them out, when he declared them "immaterial, because plaintiffs failed to show possession sufficiently extensive or continuous to show ouster of defendants." The reason is not clear to us, because it is stated in the case that "there was no evidence of any possession on the part of defendants until 1888, when Gus Jordan entered." But, as we shall show, it cannot affect the case to the prejudice of plaintiffs. "After the case was closed the court intimated and decided that the defendants had by their deeds, and the recitals in them, connected themselves with the common source of title, and that he would direct the jury on the evidence, if believed, to answer the first issue, 'Yes, two undivided thirds,' and to the second issue, 'No,' to which instruction the plaintiffs excepted." We think that the response of the jury to the issues was right, although we do not clearly see from the evidence reported in the statement of the case the foundation of the reason given by his honor for his instructions. Plaintiffs must recover upon the strength of their own title, and not upon the weakness of defendant's. Conceding for the time that the deed from McAden to the Lenoirs for the whole tract would constitute color of title, (though we are not unmindful of the able argument of defendant's counsel to the contrary,) the evidence offered by defendant clearly showed that at the time of the execution of the McAden deed the plaintiffs were claiming title to an undivided two-thirds of said land by other deeds, as tenants in common with other parties, and were in possession under such claim. Can they then recover the whole tract of defendant by seven years' adverse possession under the McAden deed? A claim of title by adverse possession under color negatives the idea of a rightful title. Plaintiffs, being in possession as tenants in common with others, could not acquire title as to the interest of the other tenants in common by seven years' adverse possession. It requires 20 years of such possession to amount to an ouster of the cotenant. It makes no difference whether the defendant was the rightful cotenant or not, for the plaintiffs are to show this title against the world, before they can recover the disputed one-third. Their title to the two-thirds is admitted.

The late Chief Justice Merrimon, in the opinion delivered by him in this case, 106 N. C. 473, 10 S. E. Rep. 525, says: "It was admitted by the defendant that the plaintiffs were part owners of the land. But this did not entitle them to be let into possession of the whole thereof as sole owners, or for themselves and others who might claim to be part owners as against the defendant. As to the undivided one-third part claimed by it, the burden was on the plaintiffs to show title thereto in themselves, and, failing in this, the defendant, having possession, had the right to remain so, as tenant in common with the plaintiffs as part owners only." In our opinion, that is the present status of the case. In discussing the rights of tenants in common among themselves, he further said: "The recovery of one such tenant is not generally a recovery of all of them, nor does such recovery entitle him to take possession for all." In the case of Foster v. Hackett, 112 N. C. 546, 17 S. E. Rep. 426, Mr. Justice Avery examined and discussed the question when one tenant in common can recover the whole tract for himself and his cotenants, and very clearly lays down the rule, citing many authorities: "It is obvious, therefore, that one of several cotenants, when he brings an action against a trespasser on the common property, and proves the title of the other tenants in establishing his own, may, under the common-law practice in ejectment applied to actions for the possession of land, recover the whole, though he claim sole seisin in his complaint in himself, just as he can do under the procedure prescribed in the Code, by alleging that the action is brought in behalf of himself and others having a common interest, though it has never been determined in this state how far, if at all, in the action under the provisions of the statute, the cotenants not actual parties would be concluded by the judgment." This is in accord with the opinion delivered by the same member of this court in Allen v. Salinger, 103 N. C. 14, 8 S. E. Rep. 913: "A plaintiff showing title only to an undivided interest may have judgment, without qualification, for the whole against one who has no title. * * * But the plaintiff who has proven title to one undivided seventh, must, if he would have judgment for the whole, have shown on trial that the same evidence of title or possession that established his own title demonstrated the fact that others than defendant held, as cotenants, the other interest, and this action would inure to their benefit. But the burden is always on the plaintiff in such actions, and he must establish his right clearly to the judgment demanded, just as he is required to show title good against the world." Overcash v. Kitchie, 89 N. C. 384; Yancey v. Greenlee, 90 N. C. 317. Applying these principles to the case as it is now before us, the verdict and judgment only establish that the plaintiffs are the owners and entitled to the possession of an undivided two-thirds of the land in controversy, and that the defendants do not wrongfully withhold possession thereof from plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have failed to establish that they are the owners of the whole tract. They have not shown who are the owners of the other one-third claimed by defendant, so as to entitle them to a judgment in behalf of their cotenant if he be some one other than defendant, and therefore they are only entitled to the judgment they had below, and which was not contested, but admitted, by defendant,—that plaintiffs were entitled to that which they already have, a two-third undivided interest in the land. In this view of the case, any errors, if such there were, as pointed out in the plaintiffs' exceptions, are harmless. The judgment is affirmed.

AVERY, J., did not sit on the hearing of this appeal.

MARKS et al. v. BALLANCE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

SPLITTING CAUSE OF ACTION—JURISDICTION OF JUSTICE'S COURT.

Where separate accounts have been consolidated, and a statement rendered showing a balance due on the whole, to which the debtor does not object, the accounts cannot afterwards be separated so as to bring each within the jurisdiction of the justice's court.

Appeal from superior court, Hyde county; Bynum, Judge.

Two actions by O. Marks & Son against D. B. Ballance for goods sold and delivered. From the judgment rendered, defendant appeals. Reversed.

In May, 1891, the defendant purchased of plaintiffs, on 60 days' time, a bill of goods to the amount of $95.98, and in October, 1891, he purchased on 60 days' time a second bill of goods to the amount of $210.67, on which was credited a payment of $68, leaving a balance of $142.67. After both bills became due, to wit, on January 3, 1893, the plaintiffs rendered a statement to defendant showing a balance of $288.65 to be due them, to which the defendant made no objection. Payment having been refused, the plaintiffs brought two actions, one on each of the above-mentioned bills. The defendant pleaded to the jurisdiction of the justice of the peace, and asked that the actions be dismissed. Upon the above statement of facts it was agreed, on appeal to the superior court, that if the judge should be of opinion that the justice of the peace had jurisdiction, then the judgments of the justice of the peace should be affirmed; otherwise, that the two actions be dismissed. The court, being of opinion that the plaintiffs had the right to sue on each separately, and that the justice of the peace had jurisdiction, rendered judgment accordingly, and the defendant appealed from the judgment rendered in each case.

Thos. G. Skinner, for appellant. J. E. Mann, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. We think that the matter involved in this appeal is determined by the case of Hawkins v. Long, 74 N. C. 781.

The plaintiffs having seen fit to consolidate the items of their account against the defendant and to deduct therefrom the items of credit, and having rendered to the defendant a statement in which they struck a balance, and claimed that round sum as a debt, are bound thereby unless the defendant has objected to such statement; and this he has not done. On the contrary, he has assented to the rendered account, impliedly by his failure to object thereto, and expressly by his pleas in the two actions brought against him, thus making himself bound with the plaintiffs by this account stated. Upon the facts agreed, the two actions should have been dismissed, and it is so ordered. Error. Reversed.

WOOL v. TOWN OF EDENTON.

NAVIGABLE WATERS — RIPARIAN RIGHTS — DEEP-WATER LINE—LOCATION BY TOWN.

Under Code, § 2751, authorizing owners of land on navigable waters, for the purpose of erecting wharves, to make entries of land covered by water, adjacent to their own, as far as deep water, and providing that, on the making of such an entry in front of an incorporated town, the town shall regulate the line "on deep water," to which entries may be made, where the town attempts to regulate the line, but locates a line which does not extend to deep water, an action will lie to compel the town to properly regulate the line.

Appeal from superior court, Chowan county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by Jacob Wool against the town of Edenton to compel the regulation of deep-water line. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. M. Bond and W. D. Pruden, for appellant. F. H. Busbee and Grandy & Aydlott, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. It is provided by the Code (section 2751) that persons owning lands on any navigable sound, river, etc., for the purpose of erecting wharves on the side of the deep waters thereof next to their lands, may make entries of the lands covered by water, adjacent to their own, as far as the deep water of such sound, river, etc., and obtain title as in other cases; and, when any such entry shall be made in front of the lands in any incorporated town, the town corporation shall regulate the line on deep water, to which entries may be made. The performance of the duty thus imposed upon the town corporation may be compelled by the courts, (Wool v. Saunders, 108 N. C. 729, 13 S. E. Rep. 294;) and it is for this purpose that the present action is brought. The complaint alleges that the defendant did "undertake to locate the said line of deep water in front of the property of the plaintiff, * * * but that in fact the line so located does not extend to the deep water of Edenton bay, nor does it regulate the deep-water line, as required by law." It is further alleged that the plaintiff has demanded that the defendant "extend and regulate the said line to the deep water of the said bay," and that the defendant has refused to take any further action. It is insisted, upon demurrer, that it appears from the complaint that the defendant has fully performed its duties in the premises, and that the action should be dismissed. We cannot assent to such a conclusion, and are of the opinion that his honor was correct in overruling the demurrer. The law requires that the town shall "regulate the line on deep water;" and it is explicitly alleged that this duty has not been performed, and that in fact the line does not extend to the deep water. We are aware of no principle which authorizes us to presume that the defendant has performed a plain statutory duty in the face of such admissions as are contained in these pleadings. As to the joinder of unnecessary parties, it has frequently been decided that it is not a ground of demurrer. Burns v. Ashworth, 72 N. C. 496. Affirmed.

CHERRY v. LILLY.

JUSTICE'S SUMMONS—RETURN TO ANOTHER JUSTICE.

Though a summons issued by one justice of the peace cannot be made returnable before another justice, except as is specially provided by statute in certain cases, where the defendant answers to such summons, and proceeds to trial without objection, the justice before whom it is made returnable acquires jurisdiction. Williams v. Bowling, 16 S. E. Rep. 176, 111 N. C. 295, distinguished.

Appeal from superior court, Beaufort county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by R. C. Cherry against Mack Lilly. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

This was a civil action, tried at the May term, 1893, before his honor, John Gray Bynum, judge presiding, upon an appeal by the plaintiff from a justice of the peace. As appears, both the plaintiff and the defendant appeared in person and by attorney before the justice of the peace. In the superior court the defendant, for the first time, moved to dismiss the action because the summons was issued by A. Mayo, a justice of the peace, and made returnable before O. H. P. Tankard, another justice of the peace of the same township. The latter justice tried the action below, and the defendant did not there move to dismiss. The court granted the motion to dismiss. Exception by plaintiff. The court signed the judgment herewith sent, to which the plaintiff also excepted. The plaintiff gave notice of appeal to the supreme court, in open court, and assigned the following ground of error: "(1) The granting of the motion of defendant to dismiss the action."

W. B. Rodman, for appellant. C. F. Warren, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. There is this distinction between the present case and that of Williams v. Bowling, 111 N. C. 295, 16 S. E. Rep. 176, wherein it was held that a summons issued by one justice of the peace cannot be made returnable before another, except in cases provided by statute to that effect. In the former, the defendant appeared and answered, submitting to the jurisdiction of the justice before whom the summons was returned; in the latter, the defendant appeared and moved to dismiss, and the justice properly dismissed the action. Here, both justices had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, but the defendant was brought into court by irregular process. He could have moved to dismiss, but he chose to submit to the jurisdiction of the justice, entered his pleas, and went into the trial, and made no objection to the jurisdiction of the justice until after the case had been brought by appeal into the superior court. It is somewhat like the case of West v. Kittrell, 1 Hawks, 493, where a suit was carried from the county to the superior court by consent of parties, and not by appeal, and it appeared that it was a case in which the superior court had concurrent jurisdiction with the county court of the subject-matter of the proceeding; and, the petition and plea being entered in the superior court, that court had jurisdiction, as if the suit had never been in the county court. In the case before us, the action was entered upon the docket, the defendant appeared, the pleadings were noted, and, without objection, the trial proceeded. The justice who tried the action acquired jurisdiction, not by the irregular process issued by another justice, but by the appearance and plea of the defendant. As in the case of McMinn v. Hamilton, 77 N. C. 300, where the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, but the venue was wrong, it was held that the objection must be taken in apt time; if the defendant pleads to the merits of the action, he will be taken to have waived the objection. See, also, Morgan v. Bank, 93 N. C. 352. An entirely analogous case is Moore v. Railroad Co., 67 N. C. 209, where it was held that the clerk of the superior court of one county has no right to issue a summons returnable to the superior court of another county, but irregularity of service is waived by an appearance and answer in bar. Error. Judgment reversed.

BOND v. WOOL.

ACTION — TERMINATION — AFFIRMANCE OF JUDGMENT ON APPEAL — NECESSITY FOR SUBSEQUENT JUDGMENT.

1. Where the trial court, after affirmance of its judgment on appeal, enters on the docket, "Judgment as per transcript filed from the supreme court," it is sufficient to terminate the action, though there is no written judgment signed by the judge, if any entry is necessary after such affirmance.

2. Since, under Acts 1887, c. 192, a judgment is not vacated by appeal, but merely suspended, and the suspension is ended by affirmance, a judgment by the trial court after affirmance can add no validity to the prior judgment or to the judgment of the supreme court.

Appeal from superior court, Chowan county; Bynum, Judge.

Action by H. A. Bond, Jr., against Jacob Wool for an injunction, in which a judgment dissolving the injunction was affirmed on appeal. 12 S. E. Rep. 281. From a judgment dismissing defendant's motion to assess damages on the injunction bond, he appeals. Affirmed.

The following are the facts in the case: At spring term, 1890, of the superior court of Chowan county there was a judgment dissolving the injunction. From this judgment there was an appeal by the plaintiff to the supreme court. Judgment was affirmed in the supreme court. The certificate of the supreme court was sent down to the superior court to spring term, 1891, and at that term there was entered on the minute docket the following: "Judgment as per transcript filed from the supreme court." There was no judgment written and signed by the presiding judge at said spring term, 1891. The case was dropped from the docket, and never placed upon the docket again until spring term, 1892, when, in consequence of the notice of March 14, 1892, the clerk placed it on the civil issue docket for said spring term, 1892. The motion was continued until the spring term, 1893, when it was heard, as above stated. The plaintiff moved to dismiss upon the ground that there was no cause pending in which the motion of the defendant could be made.

F. H. Busbee and Grandy & Aydlett, for appellant. W. D. Pruden, for appellee.

CLARK, J. While it is more regular, and for many reasons the better course, that judgments should always be signed by the judge, it has been repeatedly held that this is not mandatory. Matthews v. Joyce, 85 N. C. 258; Rollins v. Henry, 78 N. C. 342; Keener v. Goodson, 89 N. C. 273; Spencer v. Credle, 102 N. C. 68, 8 S. E. Rep. 901. The entry on the docket, "Judgment as per transcript filed from the supreme court," was sufficient, and a termination of the action. Besides, under the provisions of chapter 192, Acts 1887, the former judgment of the superior court was not vacated by the appeal,—merely suspended; and the suspension was ended by the affirmation of the judgment by the supreme court. The subsequent judgment in the superior court added no validity to the former judgment of that court, nor to the judgment in the supreme court. Its office was simply formal,—to direct the execution to proceed, and to carry the costs subsequently accrued. No error.

DAVENPORT v. GRISSOM.

APPEAL FROM JUSTICE — DOCKETING JUDGMENT — NONSUIT.

1. Under Code, §§ 565, 876, 877, 880, requiring that where a judgment is rendered in a justice's court 10 days before the next ensuing term of the superior court an appeal therefrom shall be docketed at that term, a docketing at a subsequent term is a nullity, and does not entitle the plaintiff appellant to take a nonsuit.

2. The court has no discretion to allow the appeal to be docketed at a later term.

Appeal from superior court, Beaufort county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by Mollie Davenport against W. L. Grissom, executor of the estate of Elizabeth Hyatt, deceased. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. H. Small and W. B. Rodman, for appellant. Chas. F. Warren, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The judgment by the justice having been rendered more than 10 days before the next ensuing term of the superior court, the appeal should have been docketed at that term. Code, §§ 876, 877, 880, 565; Ballard v. Gay, 108 N. C. 544, 13 S. E. Rep. 207. The attempted docketing at a subsequent term was a nullity, and the judge properly held that the case was not in the superior court, and that the plaintiff appellant could not take a nonsuit. To permit such course would have been to allow the appellant to avoid the effect of her delay in bringing up the appeal in proper time, and to institute a new action. The policy of the law, as said by Avery, J., in Ballard v. Gay, 108 N. C. 544, 13 S. E. Rep. 207, is to "require litigants to be diligent in prosecuting appeals from justices of the peace, and to prevent parties from using such as a means of causing useless delay." This is cited and approved in State v. Johnson, 109 N. C. 852, 13 S. E. Rep. 843. Nor did the judge err in holding that he had no discretion to permit the appeal to be docketed at a subsequent term to the one to which it should have been returned. The appellant had her remedy (if in no default) by an application for a recordari at the first ensuing term of the superior court after appeal taken. Boling v. Railroad Co., 88 N. C. 62. It is true that when proper notice of appeal is not given in a case tried before a justice of the peace, if the appeal is regularly docketed in due time in the superior court, the judge may permit notice of appeal to be then given, though the exercise of the discretion is not encouraged. State v. Johnson, 109 N. C. 852, 13 S. E. Rep. 843; Sondley v. City of Asheville, 112 N. C. 694, 17 S. E. Rep. 534. But that is where the case is on docket, and the appellee has not been delayed. It does not recognize the right to revive an appeal lost by delay, and to permit the same to be docketed at a subsequent term of the superior court. The act of 1889, (chapter 443,) permitting the appellee to docket the case at the first term of the superior court if the appellant does not, and have the judgment below affirmed, merely extends to that court the provisions of rule 17 in the supreme court. (12 S. E. Rep. vi.) It is a privilege to the appellee, and the appellant can draw no argument against appellee from his failure to use it. Ballard v. Gay, supra; Wilson v. Seagle, 84 N. C. 110. No error.

MURRAY et al. v. BERRY et al.

CONTEMPT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In proceedings for the alleged contempt of respondents in instituting an action to recover land in violation of an order restraining their ancestor and all persons holding under him from claiming any interest in such land, the exercise of discretion in discharging the rule on the ground that the effect of the restraining order, and the rights of the parties thereunder, can best be determined in the action by respondents, will not be disturbed on appeal.

Appeal from superior court, Hyde county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Proceedings by Samuel Windley against William Swindell and others for an order declaring respondents guilty of contempt of court in violating a restraining order entered in the suit of Daniel Murray against Hosea Berry and others. At the hearing the preliminary rule was discharged, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. B. Rodman and Chas. F. Warren, for appellant. W. W. Clark, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The law of contempt is regulated in this state by statute. Code, c. 14. Among the acts for which persons may be punished in this summary manner is "the willful disobedience of any process or order lawfully issued by any court." His honor, upon consideration of the affidavit filed by the complainants, and the answer of the respondents, adjudged that they had "purged themselves of and from any contempt" of that court, and discharged the rule, and taxed the complainants with costs. The errors assigned are that the judge erred (1) "in holding that the defendants had purged themselves from the contempt in the disobedience of the restraining order made in the original cause," and (2) "in not holding that the restraining order was disobeyed, and in not finding the facts relative to the same." In Rapalje on Contempt (section 9) it is said: "The right of a party aggrieved by the act of the contemnor to have process issue against him is not absolute. On the contrary, whenever the law affords any other adequate remedy by which such party can enforce his rights, the proceeding by attachment for a contempt is always within the discretion of the court, and a refusal to exercise it cannot be reviewed on appeal or writ of error." In Wyatt v. Magee, 3 Ala. 94, the court dismissed an appeal from an order discharging a rule for an alleged contempt in disobeying an injunction, and pointed out the distinction between those cases where, as in decrees for specific performance, the surrender of title deeds, etc., the party has no method to enforce his rights, ascertained by the decree, except by the summary process of attachment in contempt, (in which class of cases it is hardly to be supposed that any court would ever refuse to enforce obedience to its decree,) and those cases where, the party having another means of redress, the principal object is the maintenance of proper respect for the tribunal. In this latter class of cases it is there said that it is certainly to be "permitted to the chancellor to hesitate whether he ought not to refuse to commit for a contempt, and leave the parties to their remedies at law." It was charged against the respondents that they had disobeyed an imperative order of the court of equity of Hyde county, made in 1830, in a cause to which their ancestor, Hosea Berry, then an infant, was respondent, by which order it was alleged the said Berry, and all persons claiming under him, "were enjoined from setting up any claim" to certain land which the complainant there averred had been conveyed to him by the mother of Hosea Berry by proper deed, which deed, as well as the book in which it had been registered, had been destroyed; and the act of disobedience specially charged was that the heirs of Hosea Berry, respondents here, had, in 1889, instituted an action to recover a portion of said land, and in 1890 had begun proceedings to have partition made of another portion, they asserting title only as heirs of Hosea Berry both in the action and the proceeding for partition. The respondents insist in their answer that they have done nothing that in any way violates any order of court that is binding on them, and that there is no decree or order of the court of equity that prevents them from asserting by proper action their title to the land in question. They disavow any intention to defy the authority of the court, and set out with fullness and particularity the reasons that induce them to believe that there is no injunction order that has the force claimed for it by complainants. Now, it seems very clear that, if there is any record that is so binding on the respondents that it enjoins them, under pain of being liable for contempt, from bringing suit to recover the land, that same order or decree will be effective, if pleaded, to prevent them from recovering the land, and will surely protect the complainants in their rights. His honor, in the exercise of his discretion, refused to attach the respondents for contempt. His refusal to exercise that power cannot be reviewed here. He has only determined that the very complicated controversy, the particulars of which are set out in the affidavit of complainants and the reply of the respondents, should not be determined in this summary manner, and that the issue between the parties can be more properly tried in the action brought by respondents than in a proceeding such as this. Let the appeal be dismissed.

SAWYER v. GRANDY et al.

WITNESS—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT—DECEASED'S HANDWRITING—EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS OF DECEDENT.

1. Code, § 590, declares that on the trial of an action a party interested shall not be examined as a witness in his own behalf against the administrator of a deceased person, concerning a personal transaction with deceased. Held, that plaintiff in an action against an administrator may testify that a contract on which plaintiff relies, and the signature of deceased thereto, are in deceased's handwriting, but not that he saw deceased sign the contract.

2. Where the contract is claimed to be one of partnership, the declarations of deceased made after its date, tending to show either that plaintiff was or was not his partner, are not admissible in evidence.

Appeal from superior court, Camden county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by Alfred Sawyer against C. W. Grandy and A. H. Grandy, partners as Grandy & Son, and O. G. Pritchard, as administrator of the estate of T. S. Berry, deceased, to recover certain money due from such firm to T. S. Berry at the time of his death, on the ground that plaintiff was the surviving partner of deceased, and that the money was owing to the firm. Defendants Grandy paid the money into court, and the case proceeded against defendant Pritchard. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Pritchard appeals. Reversed.

This was a civil action, tried before Bynum, J., and a jury, at spring term, 1893, of Camden superior court. The plaintiff brought his action as surviving partner, alleging that at the time named the plaintiff and T. S. Berry were copartners doing business under the firm name of T. S. Berry: that said firm had large dealings with the defendants Grandy & Son, commission merchants, and that said Grandy & Son now have in their possession the sum of \$1,025 which is due and owing to the plaintiff as surviving partner of the said firm; that T. S. Berry is dead, and plaintiff is winding up the business of the firm, and has made demand upon said defendants for the payment of the said sum, and that said defendants have refused to pay the same to plaintiff. The defendants Grandy & Son answer, denying all knowledge of the alleged copartnership, admitting the dealings between them and T. S. Berry, and that they have for the credit of T. S. Berry the sum of \$1,100.63, and averring their readiness to pay over the same to the persons entitled thereto. They allege further that the fund in their hands is claimed by one O. G. Pritchard as administrator of T. S. Berry, deceased, and that they are advised that said Pritchard should be made a party to this action. They admit demand and refusal. Said Pritchard was permitted to make himself a party defendant, and the defendants Grandy & Son were allowed to pay into court the fund in their hands to the credit of T. S. Berry. Pritchard filed his answer, alleging that he is the administrator upon the estate of T. S. Berry, deceased, denying the alleged partnership, and claiming the fund. So it appears that the contention is now between the plaintiff and O. G. Pritchard, administrator of T. S. Berry, deceased, and the question is whether plaintiff is the surviving partner of the alleged partnership; in other words, whether plaintiff and Berry were partners, as alleged in the complaint. The plaintiff offered in evidence the following paper writing: "North Carolina, Camden county. Agreement is this entered into between T. S. Berry, of the one part, and Alfred Sawyer, Jr., of the other part, both of the county of Camden, and state of North Carolina, as follows, to wit: The said T. S. Berry is now selling goods at Belcross, and has employed the said Alfred Sawyer, Jr., as a clerk to superintend the said store as long as the said Berry chooses to employ him, and the said Sawyer is to have for his services one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) of all the profits the said store makes after paying all expenses of the said store; and, further, the said Sawyer is to-day one-half ($\frac{1}{2}$) owner of all the goods, moneys, accounts, notes, etc., that belong to the store; and, further, the said Berry is not to make any charges as rent for said store, warehouse, or dwelling house where the said Sawyer now lives, for this and his daily service is his compensation is equal division of profits with the said Berry. Witness our hands and seals this May 30, 1891. [Signed] T. S. Berry. [Seal.] [Signed] A. Sawyer. [Seal.]" The plaintiff, being then offered as a witness in his own behalf, was permitted to testify that he was acquainted with the handwriting of T. S. Berry, and that both the body of the paper and the signature referred to were in the handwriting of T. S. Berry, and to this the defendant objected and excepted. Witness was then asked who signed the name of A. Sawyer to the paper, and answered that he himself signed it. This question and answer was objected to by the defendant. The plaintiff offered several witnesses who testified without objection to the declarations made by T. S. Berry, tending to show that he and plaintiff were partners. The defendant Pritchard introduced as a witness one Wright, and offered to show by him declarations made by T. S. Berry after the date of the paper, denying the partnership, and tending to show his individual ownership, and that the plaintiff was only his clerk. The plaintiff objected, the objection was sustained, and defendant excepted.

J. Heywood Sawyer, for appellant. Grandy & Aydlett, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. The Code, § 590, declares that upon the trial of an action a party interested in the event shall not be examined as a witness in his own behalf against the administrator of a deceased person, concerning a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased person. The paper offered as evidence of the contract of partnership purported to be the memorial of a transaction, or the transaction itself, between the plaintiff and the deceased person against whose administrator this action is now being pressed. It has often been held that, while under this section the plaintiff is incompetent to testify to the actual execution of the paper by the deceased, he may testify to the handwriting of deceased if he can. In Rush v. Steed, 91 N. C. 226, the court, while adhering to this construction of the statute, calls the distinction a very fine-spun one, but the reason of the act, as stated by Mr. Justice Reade in Halyburton v. Dobson, 65 N. C. 88, seems to justify it: "There could never be a recovery against an unscrupulous party if he were permitted to testify, where it would be impossible to contradict him; the statute ought to be construed in view of this mischief." If plaintiff had been permitted to testify that he saw Berry sign this paper, it might have been impossible to contradict him; but he simply swears to the handwriting of deceased, and the matter is entirely open to contradiction, if defendant can do so, by others who are acquainted with the handwriting of deceased. We are unable to make the distinction between the testimony of the plaintiff as witness to the actual signing of the instrument by deceased and by himself, for the deceased might be the only person who could have testified to the contrary if plaintiff had been permitted to testify to the fact of the signing; and we think, upon the authorities cited, that his honor erred in admitting this testimony. The plaintiff relying upon the paper writing as the contract of partnership, evidence of declarations of deceased seems to have been incompetent and immaterial on either side, as tending to contradict or to explain a written instrument the construction of which is a question of law for the court. Error. New trial.

KELLY v. FLEMING et al.

HUSBAND AND WIFE—CONVEYANCE OF HOUSEHOLD FURNITURE BY HUSBAND — BILL OF SALE — DESCRIPTION—CONVEYANCE BY PARENT TO CHILD—PRESUMPTION—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Act 1891, c. 91, § 1, providing that, whenever household or kitchen furniture is conveyed by chattel mortgage or otherwise as allowed by law in North Carolina, the privy examination of married women shall be as prescribed in conveyances of land, does not apply to an absolute sale by the husband of such property.

2. A bill of sale describing the property conveyed as all the household and kitchen furniture, and all other property of every description, belonging to the grantor at a certain house, sufficiently describes the property conveyed.

3. A conveyance from a parent to a child 21 years old is not, in law, presumptively fraudulent, unless it be shown to be a voluntary conveyance, or one upon insufficient consideration, while the parent is in embarrassed circumstances.

4. Instructions, though correct as propositions of law, are properly refused, in the absence of evidence on which such instructions could be based.

Appeal from superior court, Vance county: George A. Shuford, Judge.

Action in attachment by J. A. Kelly against E. L. Fleming, Sr. E. L. Fleming, Jr., interpleaded, setting up the title to the property attached by plaintiff as the property of E. L. Fleming, Sr. There was judgment for E. L. Fleming, Jr., and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

In support of his claim to the property attached, E. L. Fleming, Jr., offered in evidence a paper writing purporting to be a bill of sale, as follows: "In consideration of $500 in cash to me paid by E. L. Fleming, Jr., I hereby bargain, sell, convey, and deliver to E. L. Fleming, Jr., all the household and kitchen furniture, and all other property of every description, belonging to me, and at the house and lot in Henderson, N. C., owned by W. D. Horner, and occupied by my family. Witness my hand and seal this 13th July, 1892. E. L. Fleming. [Seal.]"

A. C. Zollicoffer and Pittman & Shaw, for appellant. T. T. Hicks, for appellees.

MacRAE, J. His honor instructed the jury to respond to the first and second issues, "No;" and to this instruction, and the finding of the jury in response thereto, there was no exception. This eliminates from the case any question which might have arisen if a part of the property conveyed by the husband had been found to belong to the wife. The first exception brings before us for construction the act of 1891, c. 91, entitled "An act regarding chattel mortgages:" "Section 1. That whenever household or kitchen furniture is conveyed by chattel mortgage or otherwise as allowed by law in this state, the privy examination of married women shall be taken as is now prescribed by law in conveyance of real estate; provided that all such conveyances of household and kitchen furniture, except as herein provided, shall be ineffectual to convey a title to the same." The question presented is whether, upon a true construction of the statute above cited, it is necessary for the wife to join the husband in a conveyance and sale of his household and kitchen furniture, and be privily examined touching her free execution of said conveyance, in order to make the same effectual in law. The act is not drawn with that precision and clearness which will enable us to reach without difficulty a conception of the will of the legislature. The words "household and kitchen furniture" may comprise, not only that species of property which is in actual use, but also that which is on sale in shops. Yet no one will contend that this statute should be construed so literally as to embrace articles of this kind of the latter class. The word "convey," in its broadest significance, might embrace any transmission of possession; but we are restrained to its legal meaning which, ordinarily speaking, is the transfer of property from one person to another by means of a written instrument and other formalities. Rap. & L. Law Dict. "Convey, Conveyance." According to Webster, a conveyance is "an instrument in writing by which property, or the title to property, is conveyed or transmitted from one person to another." The meaning of this word being well understood at common law, it must be understood in the same sense when used in a statute. Smith-deal v. Wilkerson, 100 N. C. 52, 6 S. E. Rep.

71. The statute refers to the manner of conveyance, i. e. by chattel mortgage, and proceeds, "or otherwise as allowed by law." It is a very familiar principle in the construction of statutes that, when there are general words following particular and specific words, the former must be confined to things of the same kind. Suth. St. Const. § 268. To aid us in reaching the meaning of the words of a statute, we may, when necessary, now resort to the preamble, or even the caption or title of the act. Suth. St. Const. § 210; Randall v. Railroad Co., 107 N. C. 748, 12 S. E. Rep. 605; Blue v. McDuffie, Busb. 131. And this we find to be "An act regarding chattel mortgages." The law as it was before the passage of this act permitted the wife to convey her real and personal property with the written assent of her husband, (Const. art. 10, § 6), but as to her personal property no privy examination was necessary. The evident mischief sought to be overcome by this act is the facility with which these necessary articles for the comfort and convenience of every household, however humble,—the household and kitchen furniture,—may be conveyed away, notwithstanding the protection which the law throws around them by the personal property exemption, at least during the life of the husband, by the chattel mortgage, or other lien now almost the only basis of credit for the poor man. The remedy proposed was to protect the wife, as in case of lands which were hers, or in which she had an inchoate interest such as dower, from force or compulsion, by requiring her privy examination to be taken before the law would recognize the validity of such conveyance. The act could not apply to those methods of conveyance of personal property by sale and delivery where no writing was used, for then the privy examination of the wife would have been impracticable, nor to the sale by the husband of the personal property of which he was the sole owner, because in this instance it was not necessary that the wife should join. But it was intended to prevent the conveyance by chattel mortgage, or in any other way by which a lien could be fixed thereon, of the property named, as by deed of trust or conditional sale, without a writing signed by husband and wife, and the privy examination of the wife, as in sales of real estate; and this may be applicable to such property, whether it belong to the husband or to the wife. We do not think it was made to appear by the evidence—though the defendant so contends—that the property in controversy had belonged to the husband before the passage of this act. Indeed, it will not affect our conclusion, as we have held the act not to apply to an absolute sale by the husband, such as is evidenced by the bill of sale offered in evidence.

In case of a chattel mortgage or other like conveyance of his own household and kitchen furniture by the husband, the serious question would arise as to whether the provisions of the act could be made to apply; how far the legislature may restrain the jus disponendi of private property, where no rights of others are to be preserved, or whether it may do so at all, (Bruce v. Strickland, 81 N. C. 267; Hughes v. Hodges, 102 N. C. 236, 9 S. E. Rep. 437;) or, at any rate, whether it might be made to apply to such property as was owned by the husband before the passage of the act in question, (Sutton v. Askew, 66 N. C. 172.)

We see no force in the exception that the description of the property in the instrument is not sufficient. It was intended to, and did, cover all of the personal property of the grantor which was then in the house or upon the lot described. There was no difficulty as to the identification thereof, which might be done by parol. Goff v. Pope, 83 N. C. 123.

The plaintiff excepted to the refusal of his honor to instruct the jury that "conveyances from a parent to a child are in law presumptively fraudulent, although the child is 21 years of age; and the transaction must be shown by E. L. Fleming, Jr., to have been in good faith, and without any fraudulent purpose." We think that this prayer was too broad and sweeping in its terms, and that the instruction could not have been given. It was said in Jenkins v. Peace, 1 Jones, (N. C.) 413: "Nor is a parent forbidden to sell to his child. The only difference would be that the latter would be held to fuller and stricter proof of the fairness of the transaction." In case of a voluntary conveyance, or one upon insufficient consideration, by parent to child,—the parent being in embarrassed circumstances,—such presumption would arise. The evidence in this case would not have warranted the instruction. McCanless v. Flinchum, 89 N. C. 373.

The second prayer for instruction was a correct proposition of law, but there was no evidence to support it. The evidence, if believed, was all to the contrary.

We have already disposed of the third prayer and exception, and we agree with his honor in his refusal to instruct the jury. If the bill of sale was made, as alleged, on the 13th of July, 1892, but there was no delivery of the property until after the levy of the attachment, then the same would be invalid as to creditors. 1 Benj. Sales, § 330.

We think that the response to the third issue was properly understood by his honor. If the jury had found the interpleader to be the owner of part, only, of the property, it would have been necessary to qualify the answer, but its only meaning must be that he was the owner of it all. There is no error.

WILLIAMS et al. v. HODGES et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

SALE—CONSTRUCTIVE DELIVERY—STOPPAGE IN TRANSITU.

Where goods are held in storage by the carrier under an agreement between it and the vendee's assignee, there is a constructive delivery, and the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu is lost.

Appeal from superior court, Beaufort county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by H. G. Williams and W. P. Ives, trading as H. G. Williams & Co., against John S. Hodges and J. G. Chauncey, Hodges' assignee, to recover possession or the value of certain goods sold and shipped by plaintiffs to defendant Hodges, on the ground that the vendee was insolvent at the time of the sale, that such fact was unknown to plaintiffs, and that the goods had not been delivered. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. B. Rodman, for appellees.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The principles governing this case are fully discussed in Farell v. Railroad Co., 102 N. C. 390, 9 S. E. Rep. 302, and it is well established that, if there be an actual or constructive delivery of the goods to the purchaser before the demand of the vendor, the right of stoppage in transitu is at an end. In this case there was no actual delivery, but, according to the statement of facts agreed, there was an express agreement between the carrier and the assignee of the vendee that the former should hold the goods on storage as the agent of the latter. The goods were no longer in transitu, and the rights of the plaintiffs were therefore defeated. "The doctrine that the goods must come to the 'corporal touch' of the vendee, as was once said by Lord Kenyon, has long been exploded. Wright v. Lawes, 4 Esp. 82. * * * If the carrier, by reason of an arrangement with the consignee, or for any cause, remains in possession, but holds the goods only as the agent of the consignee, and subject to his order, this is the possession of the consignee." 1 Pars. Cont. 603; 2 Benj. Sales, § 1117; 2 Add. Cont. § 600; Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 Mees. & W. 518. The judgment must be affirmed.

BONNER v. STYRON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

APPLICATION OF PAYMENTS—ESTOPPEL.

Defendant and his two sons gave plaintiff a chattel mortgage to secure a debt. Defendant afterwards delivered enough of the joint property of the mortgagors to plaintiff to satisfy the debt, but agreed that the plaintiff could apply it to another debt owing him.

Held, that defendant was estopped to question the validity of the application, and as to him and his property the appropriation to other debts was valid.

Appeal from superior court, Beaufort county; Bynum, Judge.

Action by John B. Bonner against D. C. Styron to obtain possession of certain personal property secured under chattel mortgages. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. B. Rodman, for appellant. Chas. F. Warren, for appellee.

BURWELL, J. The personal property in controversy in this action belonged, it seems, to the defendant, D. C. Styron, and was assigned to the plaintiff by two separate mortgages,—one given in 1889, to secure a debt of about $116; and one given in 1890, to secure a debt of $75. The first mortgage or lien was signed by the defendant and his two sons, and gave to the plaintiff, to secure the debt therein mentioned, a lien not only on the defendant's property here in dispute, but also on certain cotton which was the joint property of the three mortgagors or lienors. The second mortgage executed by the defendant alone, as stated above, assigned to plaintiff his crop of cotton, as well as the property described in the complaint. The defendant, in his answer, averred that both of the debts had been paid, and upon the trial introduced evidence that tended to show that there had been delivered to plaintiff, on account of these secured debts, cotton of sufficient value to extinguish them if the proceeds had been applied to their satisfaction, and that the cotton so delivered was the cotton covered by the mortgage or lien. The plaintiff, admitting that he had received some cotton from the defendant, testified that with the consent of the defendant, and, indeed, at his request, he had applied a portion of the proceeds of the cotton delivered to him as aforesaid on debts due to him from the defendant other than those secured by the two mortgages above mentioned, but there was no evidence that the sons of the defendant, who were jointly liable with him for the debt of $116, had in any way assented to or ratified such application of the proceeds of the cotton. The plaintiff, among other instructions, asked his honor to charge the jury "that, though the plaintiff received enough of the joint property of the obligor to extinguish the debt, yet he could, by the request or consent of defendant, apply the proceeds of this joint property to other purposes than the payment of this bond; and, while it might extinguish the security and debt as to S. W. and H. S. Styron and their property, it would leave it operative as to D. C. Styron and his separate property." This instruction was refused, and the jury was told that if they found the fact to be that defendant and his two sons raised the cotton of 1889, and the cotton was carried to plaintiff by any one of them, and plaintiff knew it was the cotton of the three, and that it was the cotton covered by his mortgage, then, although defendant assented to the application to another debt of a part of the proceeds thereof, unless they found the fact to be further that the two sons assented to the application of the proceeds to another debt, they should find that the first debt was paid. We think that there was error in refusing the instruction for which the plaintiff asked. While it is true that a mortgagee who receives the proceeds of any part of the mortgaged property must apply such proceeds on the mortgage debt if the mortgagor instructs him so to do, or if no instructions are given him, and he is not at liberty of his own accord to apply such proceeds on another debt, yet if the mortgagor consents or directs that such application shall be made, and it is so made, he will not be allowed to say that an application of his money, made at his request or on his demand, was a misapplication. This being conceded, it seems to us to follow that, if the defendant agreed that the proceeds of a part of the mortgaged cotton, the property of himself and his sons, should be diverted from the mortgage debt, and used to extinguish other liabilities of his, he will not be permitted thereafter to deny his authority to do what he has seen fit to do, nor to question the validity of an act done by another at his instance. As to him and his property, this appropriation to other debts must be sustained. Error. New trial.

YOUNG v. ALFORD.

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—PARTIAL PAYMENTS.

Plaintiff, some years after certain bonds in suit, to the amount of $1,000, were barred by the statute of limitations, got a quart of brandy of defendant. On offering payment for the same defendant refused to accept it, saying he now owed more than he could pay. Held, that plaintiff could not estimate the brandy as worth 75 cents, and apply 25 cents on each of the bonds to toll the statute.

Appeal from superior court, Franklin county; Shuford, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Winnie Young against John R. Alford on certain bonds made by defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. S. Spruill, for appellant. E. W. Timberlake, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The evidence adduced by plaintiff to prove a payment was not sufficient to go to the jury, and it was error to refuse the defendant's ninth prayer for instruction to that effect. According to that evidence,—putting out of view the defendant's testimony,—the plaintiff, some years after the bonds were barred by the lapse of time, got a quart of brandy of the defendant's intestate, and offered to pay him for it, but he said: "No; he owed her. Let that go on, as he already owed her more than he could ever pay." There was no price named for the brandy, no request to apply its value to any indebtedness, and no specific indebtedness mentioned. This was either a refusal to accept any payment for the brandy under the circumstances, or at most a sale on credit. There was nothing to indicate that the brandy was to be credited as a payment on the three bonds, nor to authorize the plaintiff to estimate the value of the brandy herself, and, dividing it into three parts, to credit the bonds with 25 cents each, with the view of bringing them back into date. This was solely the act of the plaintiff, while payment, if made at all, could only have been made by the debtor. There is no evidence of any kind that he directed or assented to this crediting the three several bonds, aggregating over $1,000, or any one of them. Nor was there any evidence allunde the credits themselves that they were put on the bonds the day they purported to have been, nor was there any evidence as to the handwriting of such entries. "It is not the mere indorsement of a credit upon the note, even when supported by a counterclaim by the holder, which will have the effect of reviving the liability, but an actual payment, made and received as such." Bank v. Harris, 96 N. C. 118, 1 S. E. Rep. 459, citing Woodhouse v. Simmons, 73 N. C. 30; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 444. A case exactly in point is Locke v. Andres, 29 N. C. 159, in which it is held by Ruffin, C. J., that to make specific articles a payment they must be received as payments, or by subsequent agreement applied as payments; and that the court below properly refused to submit to the jury the question of payment when the evidence was simply that the debtor had at several times let the creditor have small quantities of bacon. The plaintiff cited several authorities to the effect that if the debtor make no application of a payment, the creditor can make it. But that is when there is a payment. A set-off or counterclaim is not a payment. White v. Beaman, 96 N. C. 122, 1 S. E. Rep. 789, relied on by plaintiff, differs from this case. There the creditor asked for a payment. The debtor offered to make a payment in whisky, which was accepted. The creditor thereupon stated that he would enter it as a credit on the note, and did so enter it. Error.

MOORE v. BOARD OF COMRS OF PITT COUNTY.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—SPECIAL MEETING—WHEN VALID.

Under Code, § 717, which provides that the justices of the peace shall meet annually with the board of commissioners on the first Monday of June, "unless they shall be oftener convened by the board of commissioners, which is empowered to call together the justices of the peace not oftener than once in three months," a special meeting of such justices, not called by such board, is unauthorized and void.

Appeal from superior court, Pitt county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Petition by D. C. Moore for writ of mandamus directed to the board of commissioners of Pitt county to compel them to consider and accept his bond as clerk of the inferior court of such county, to which office he was elected by the justices of the peace of the county at a special meeting thereof, called by the chairman of the board of justices, and to otherwise recognize the acts of such justices at such special meeting. From a judgment denying the writ, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Gilliam & Son, for appellant. T. J. Jarvis, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. Whatever may have been the provision of law in regard to the meetings of the justices of a county before the adoption of the Code, it seems very clear that since it was enacted they can lawfully meet, organize, and act only at the time of their regular annual meeting, which is fixed by statute on the first Monday in June, and on such days as the board of commissioners may appoint for special meetings, such meetings not, however, being allowed to take place more than once in three months. Code, § 717.¹ If the justices come together at any other time than the first Monday of June, except at the call of the commissioners, it is not a lawful meeting, and the proceedings of such an assembly can have no force. The legislature has committed to the justices of the several counties most important functions, but it has seen fit to allow them to meet in special session only when called together by the commissioners. What is said above disposes of the matter of this appeal, and renders it unnecessary that we should determine what number of justices would have made a quorum if the meeting had been called according to law. Affirmed.

SHEPHERD, C. J., did not participate in the decision of this case.

BROUGHTON et al. v. LANE et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 10, 1893.)

MARRIED WOMEN—SETTLEMENT—CONVEYANCE OF SETTLED PROPERTY.

Under the provisions of a deed that the grantee shall hold the land conveyed in trust for a married woman during coverture, and will, if requested by her in writing during coverture, convey the same as she shall direct, and shall on the death of the married woman or her husband convey it to the survivor, the property can during coverture be conveyed only as provided by the deed, and a deed of the property executed by the married woman and her husband alone is of no effect.

Appeal from superior court, Pamlico county; Bynum, Judge.

Action by Thomas A. Broughton and others against S. B. Lane and others for the possession of land. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The case agreed was as follows: "(1) In consideration of the money received from the sale of land to Sarah Williams, mentioned in the deed, James Norcom, on the 1st day of November, 1856, conveyed to J. S. Jones, trustee, the lands described in the complaint, a copy of which deed is hereto attached, marked 'Schedule A,' and made a part hereof, and the recitals of which are to be taken as further facts agreed in this case. That afterwards, to wit, on the 25th day of October, 1859, the said Levi D. Broughton and wife, Eliza Broughton, executed a deed for a valuable consideration for said land to one Luther Babbitt, a copy of which said deed is hereto annexed, marked 'B.' That the said Joseph S. Jones, trustee, named in the said deed marked 'A,' did not execute or join in the execution of any deed for said land to any person. That, on the — day of —, the said Luther Babbitt did execute a deed in fee simple for said land to — Venters. That, on the — day —, the said — Venters executed a deed in fee simple for a part of said land to Stephen B. and George H. Lane, and that there after the said George H. Lane conveyed his interest in said land to Stephen B. Lane, one of the defendants in this action. That the residue of said land which was not conveyed by said Venters as above descended to the defendant Martha J. McCotter. That Levi D. Broughton survived his wife, Eliza Broughton, who died in 1861, and died June 18, 1888. That the plaintiffs Thomas A. Broughton, Josephine Linton, and E. A. Broughton are the children of Levi D. and Eliza Broughton. That the plaintiffs, Doras, Hattie, and Bailey Edwards are the grandchildren of the said Levi D. and Eliza Broughton, their mother, Sarah E. Edwards, a daughter of the said Levi D. and Eliza Broughton, having died since the death of both the said Levi D. and Eliza Broughton. (2) That this action was instituted on the 27th day of February, 1891. (3) That Eliza Broughton purchased from John Godett the tract of land on Trent and Thomas creek, (see deed, marked 'Exhibit C,' dated October 27, 1857,) and went into possession thereof, and plaintiffs are now in possession of the same as heirs at law of Eliza Broughton, aforesaid. (4) The defendants were in possession of the said lands at the beginning of this action, and are still in possession of the same."

The material portions of the deed of Norcom to J. S. Jones, trustee for Eliza Broughton, were as follows:

"The conditions of the foregoing deed are such that whereas, Mrs. Eliza Broughton, wife of Levi D. Broughton, has conveyed a tract of land to which she was entitled as feme sole in fee simple to Sarah Williams, upon condition that the purchase money received for her land should be invested in other lands to be held to the same trusts and purposes as the lands heretofore held by her as aforesaid; and whereas, the said Levi D. Broughton, husband of said Eliza, has consented thereto, and has requested James Norcom, the grantor of the before-described tract of land, so to convey, and, for the purposes of carrying the said agreement into execution, the said tract has been granted to the said Joseph S. Jones, as trustee for the purposes aforesaid: Now, it is covenanted and agreed by and between the parties to this indenture that the said Joseph S. Jones should hold the same to the separate use of the said Eliza, wife of said Levi D., Broughton, as if she were a feme sole, and will permit her to have the use of the same and the profits deriving therefrom to her sole and separate use during her coverture with the said Levi D. Broughton, and will, if requested by her in writing during the coverture, convey the same, and invest the purchase money in such other property as she may designate, to be held to the same purposes and trusts as set forth in this indenture; and, if the coverture should be dissolved by the death of said Levi, that then the said Joseph S. Jones, trustee herein, will convey said tract of land to the said Eliza Broughton, now the wife of said Levi, in fee simple; and if the coverture should be determined by the death of the said Eliza, wife of said Levi D. Broughton, that then the said Joseph S. Jones, trustee as aforesaid, will convey the same to the said Levi Broughton, her now husband, for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage, if there be any children, in fee simple; and if there be no children living at the time of the death of said Eliza Broughton, wife of said Levi, then the said trustee shall convey to said Levi D. Broughton in fee simple. In testimony whereof, the said James Norcom, trustee, etc., aforesaid, and the said Levi D. Broughton, have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written. Jas. Norcom. [Seal.] L. D. Broughton. [Seal.] Joseph S. Jones. [Seal.] Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of: A. H. Britte."

"Schedule B.

"This indenture, made and executed this 25th day of October, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, between Levi D. Broughton and wife, Elizabeth Broughton, of the county of Craven and state of North Carolina, of the first part, and Luther Babbitt, of the county of Lenoir and state aforesaid, of the second part, witnesseth, that for and in consideration of the sum of twelve hundred dollars, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged before the signing and sealing of these presents, have granted, bargained, sold, and by these presents do grant, bargain, and sell, all of a certain tract or parcel of land situated in the county of Craven and state aforesaid, lying on the north side of Neuse river, and at the head of Orchard creek, and bounded as follows: Beginning at Orchard Creek bridge on the main road, running S., 18 W., 21 poles, to a stake; thence, with the division line between L. D. Broughton and wife and the Bemberry heirs, to the back line; thence N., 29 W., with the Delamar patent line, to a division between L. D. Broughton and wife and Thomas T. Gooding; thence, with the said division line, to the Thomas Clayton back line; thence, with said Thomas Clayton back line, to a division ditch between L. D. Broughton and wife and Thomas T. Gooding; then, with a division line, to the main road; thence, with the various courses of a marked line, to Nurcy branch; then, with the branch, to Orchard creek; thence, with the various courses of said creek, to the beginning,—containing four hundred acres, more or less. To have and to hold the above-mentioned tract or parcel of land, with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging, to the said Luther Babbitt, his heirs and assigns, forever. And we, Levi D. Broughton and wife, Elizabeth Broughton, do covenant to warrant and defend the above-described land and premises against the right, title, or claims of any and all persons whatsoever unto the said Luther Babbitt, his heirs and assigns, forever. In witness, we hereunto set our hands and seals, on the day and year above written. L. D. Broughton. [Seal.] Eliza Broughton. [Seal.]

"On this, the 25th day of October, A. D. 1859, personally appeared before me, R. W. Saunders, one of the judges of the superior court of law and equity for the state aforesaid, Levi D. Broughton, and wife, Elizabeth, and acknowledged the due execution by them of the foregoing deed; and thereupon, the said Elizabeth being by me privately examined, separately and apart from her husband, touching her free consent in the execution of the said deed of conveyance, she, on such her examination, declares that she had executed the same freely, of her own will and accord, and without any force, fear, or undue influence of her said husband or any other person, and did still voluntarily assent thereto. Therefore let the said deed and this certificate be registered. R. W. Saunders, J. S. C."

"Exhibit C.

"This indenture, made this the 27th day of October, A. D. 1857, between John Godett, of the county of Craven and state of North Carolina, of the first part, and Eliza Broughton, the wife of Levi D. Broughton, of the second part, witnesseth, that the said John Godett, for and in consideration of the sum of eight hundred and fifty dollars in hand paid by the said Eliza Broughton, the wife of Levi D. Broughton, the receipt whereof he doth hereby acknowledge, hath bargained and sold and conveyed, and by these presents do bargain, sell, and convey, unto the said Eliza Broughton, the wife of Levi D. Broughton, and her heirs, a certain piece of land lying in the county aforesaid, on or near Trent creek, to wit: Beginning at a pline, his own corner, on the north side, near the mouth of Thomas creek; then along his own line south, 50 east, 100 poles; then north, 75 east, 160 poles, to a bay tree, Wharton corner; then along his line south, 38 east, 68 poles; thence north, 55 east, 20 poles; thence 545 east, 62 poles; then south, 64 west, 155 poles, to Humes' corner, along his line north, 8 west, 195 poles, to Trent creek; thence down the same, and up Thomas creek, to the beginning,—containing 200 acres, more or less. To have and to hold the said land and premises to her, the said Eliza Broughton, her heirs and assigns, forever, against all person or persons; and the said John Godett do warrant and defend the right and title to the said to Eliza Broughton, the wife of Levi D. Broughton, in fee simple. And I, the said John Godett, do hereunto set his hand and seal, the date above written. John Godett. [Seal.]”

There were no other grantors in the deed to Luther Babbitt except L. D. Broughton and wife, Eliza. The defendants appealed from the judgment rendered.

W. T. Caho and W. D. McIver, for appellants. O. H. Gulon and W. W. Clark, for appellees.

AVERY, J. The question presented by this appeal is whether the land conveyed to Jones, as trustee for the sole and separate use of Eliza Broughton, passed by the deed executed by her husband and herself, in which the trustee, Jones, did not join. That the power of a married woman to dispose of land held by her under a deed of settlement is “not absolute, but limited to the mode and manner pointed out in the instrument,” seems to be the settled law of this state, whatever may be the rulings of other courts. Hardy v. Holly, 84 N. C. 661; Kemp v. Kemp, 85 N. C. 491; Mayo v. Farrar, 112 N. C. 66, 16 S. E. Rep. 910; Munroe v. Trenholm, 112 N. C. 634, 17 S. E. Rep. 439. In Hardy v. Holly the feme covert was clothed with express authority to compel the trustee to sell and reinvest, and to remove the trustee when she deemed fit, and the fund was to be held subject to her control, or as if she were a feme sole. But her power, as to the disposition of the property in which the trust fund should be invested, was in writing to direct the trustee to sell, etc. In the case at bar it was agreed that the trustee should hold the land to the separate use of Eliza Broughton during coverture, and would, “if requested by her in writing during the coverture, convey the same,” etc. The feme covert, Eliza Broughton, was “not only subject to the express restrictions” of the settlement “as to the manner of exercising such power as was granted to her, but she was dependent upon a strict construction of its terms for authority to make any disposition whatever of the property embraced in it.” Mayo v. Farrar and Hardy v. Holly, supra. As the trustee did not join in the deed to Babbitt, and there is no evidence that he executed any separate conveyance by the request of the cestui que trust, we simply adhere to the repeated rulings of this court in holding that the interest conveyed to Jones in trust for the separate use of Eliza Broughton did not pass by the deed of conveyance, in which her husband joined, to Luther Babbitt, and was not transmitted by the subsequent conveyances to the defendants. Judgment affirmed.

GRIMES v. BROWN et al.

ARBITRATION—NOTICE OF HEARING.

Where by consent of parties a case is ordered by the court to be referred to a person named, whose award is to be binding, all parties are entitled to notice of the time and place of the hearing by such person; and if it is contended that such notice was given, it is the duty of the judge below to decide such question with the aid, if he so desire, of a jury.

Appeal from superior court, Martin county; George A. Shuford, Judge.

Action by W. T. Grimes against G. E. Brown and H. Brown, trustee. Said H. Brown was appointed referee to state an account of the partnership dealings between plaintiff and defendant G. E. Brown. From an order setting aside the report and account, said G. E. Brown appeals. Reversed.

It will only be necessary to set out the consent decree in the cause made at chambers to reach a proper understanding of the questions involved. There was an account stated by the referee, and a report. “This cause coming on to be heard on motion of plaintiff for the appointment of a receiver of the property described in the complaint, and for an order restraining the defendant H. Brown from selling the property embraced in the mortgage made to him by the plaintiff and wife, all parties consenting hereto, it is adjudged and considered that H. Brown be, and he is hereby, appointed receiver herein to take charge and possession of all the property, real and personal, belonging to the late firm of Brown & Grimes, including all money or local accounts due the said copartnership, and assets of every description, and hold the same according to the terms of this order. It is further ordered that the said receiver proceed at once to collect all the notes and accounts due said firm, and that on the 6th of March, 1893, at the courthouse door in Williamston, Martin county, the said receiver will sell all the property, both real and personal, belonging to said copartnership, upon the following terms, to wit, the purchase price to be paid in cash, less an amount equal to the sum due on the mortgage of Ward and Grimes to the Company of Baltimore, Md., which sum shall be secured by note to be approved by the receiver, and payable according to the terms of said mortgage. The said receiver is authorized to operate said mill if in his opinion the best interests of said firm will be promoted thereby. It is further ordered that H. Brown be appointed referee to state the account and determine all matters between said G. E. Brown and the plaintiff growing out of their copartnership dealings, and to pay out the proceeds of said property and collections according to the rights of the parties as determined by the said referee. The receiver shall execute deeds to the purchasers for the property sold by him upon the payment of the purchase money. The receiver and referee shall report his action in the premises to the next term of the superior court of Martin county, to be entered as the judgment of the court in the action. The receiver is required to file bond in the sum of two thousand dollars to be approved by the clerk of the superior court of Martin county. The receiver shall advertise said sale at the courthouse door and three other public places in Martin county. Geo. A. Shuford, Judge Superior Court."

Don. Gilliam, for appellant. Jas. E. Moore, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. It will be noted that the order appointing a receiver and referee has all of the elements of a submission to arbitration under order of court. The referee is to determine all matters between said G. E. Brown and the plaintiff growing out of their copartnership dealings. In the same order he is required, as receiver, to sell the property, collect the assets, and pay out the proceeds according to the rights of the parties, as determined by himself as referee. He is to report his action to the next term of the court, to be entered as the judgment of the court. The order is by consent of parties, and provides for a final determination and judgment accordingly. It is not unlike the reference in Gudger v. Baird, 68 N. C. 438, in which the order is in these words: "This case is referred to W. M. Cocke, who shall summon the parties before him, and hear the case, and his award shall be a rule of court." This was held to be a reference to arbitration, instead of a reference under the Code, the essential difference between which proceedings is pointed out in Keener

v. Goodson, 89 N. C. 273, citing several other authorities. Whether it were a reference by consent under the Code or a reference to arbitration, the findings of fact would be final under the terms of this order. But in either case all parties are entitled to notice of the time and place of the hearing. Morse, Arb. 116 et seq. It is contended on the one side that notice was duly given, and that both parties appeared and were present at the hearing, and this is strenuously denied on the other, and many affidavits are filed pro and con. This is a matter for the decision of the judge below, in which he may, if he choose, have the aid of a jury. There is no finding of fact by his honor upon this question. He treats the reference as under the Code, and sets aside the report and account, refusing to remove the referee. We think that in this there was error. The case must be remanded, in order that the judge below may find the facts whether the parties were duly notified of the time and place of hearing, or whether they appeared and the case was duly heard before the report of the arbitrator was filed, for upon this question it depends whether the award shall stand or be set aside. Remanded.

CARRIERS—DAMAGE TO LIVE STOCK—CONTRACT—VALIDITY—NEGLIGENCE—STRENGTH OF CARS.

1. A shipper of live stock agreed with the railroad company that in consideration of the reduced rates granted, as a condition precedent to his right to recover any damage for loss or injury to the stock, he would give written notice of his claim to some officer of the company or its nearest station agent before such stock was removed from the place of destination, or from the place of delivery to him, and before it was mingled with other stock. Held, that such stipulation is not unreasonable or contrary to sound legal policy, and is valid.

2. A railroad company is not bound to provide cars strong enough to safely transport animals that are "vicious" and unruly, but only such as are ordinarily unruly.

Appeal from superior court, Wilson county; George A. Shuford, Judge.

Action by John Selby against the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company to recover damages to live stock while being transported over defendant's railroad. From a judgment entered on the verdict of a jury in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Aycock & Daniels, for appellant. S. A. Woodard, for appellee.

BURWELL, J. The relation between the parties to this action is not that of a common carrier towards a shipper of freight who had chosen to pay the usual tariff charges, and stand upon his rights, and hold the carrier to the performance of its duty under all the strict requirements of the common law. It was his privilege to demand of the carrier the shipment of his stock under those somewhat stringent, but not unjust, conditions. He has chosen not to avail himself of this privilege, and thus put his animals under the safeguard established by the law for the protection of those whose property comes to the possession of a common carrier for transportation, but rather, for a valuable consideration, to waive this right or privilege, and to allow the defendant to assume simply the relation of a carrier of stock under a special contract which, no fraud or imposition being alleged, must be interpreted according to the ordinary rules of construction, and its provisions enforced unless they are unreasonable and unjust, "if they are not in conflict with sound legal policy." Express Co. v. Caldwell, 21 Wall. 264. Among other stipulations contained in the contract was one by which the plaintiff agreed, in consideration of the reduced rates granted, "as a condition precedent to his right to recover any damage for loss or injury to said stock," that he would "give notice in writing of his claim thereof to some officer of said company or its nearest station agent before said stock is removed from the place of destination above mentioned, or from the place of delivery of the same to said party of the second part, and before such stock is mingled with other stock." It seems to us that this condition, imposed upon the plaintiff by a contract of his own making, founded upon a valuable consideration moving to him, contravenes no sound legal policy, and is not unreasonable. It is not in any sense a stipulation that the defendant carrier shall be exempted from the effects of its negligence or the negligence of its servants in the performance of those duties towards the plaintiff assumed in the contract; nor is it a requirement that any injury that has been done to plaintiff's stock while in defendant's care under the terms of the bill of lading shall be adjusted in the presence of an officer of the defendant company before the property is removed from the station; and hence the case of Capehart v. Railroad Co., 81 N. C. 438, has no application here. We have no stipulation at all as to the fixing of the amount of damage done to plaintiff's property, but simply an agreement that he will, when about to take his animals from the cars or yard of the defendant, notify the company in writing if, upon a reasonable examination, he is able to detect any damage done them. Owing to the nature of the property intrusted to the carrier, the difficulty of identifying each animal, and the terms of the contract as regards such damage as might be inflicted by the animals on one another, or might come to them without any fault on the part of the defendant, it seems to us indeed very reasonable that the defendant's agents should have an opportunity then and there to examine the stock and ascertain, if they can, the cause and the extent of the damage. We have been cited to no authority which upon examination seems to hold that such a requirement, under the circumstances, is unreasonable. Rice v. Railroad Co., 63 Mo. 314. Goggin v. Railroad Co., 12 Kan. 416, and other cases seem fully to sustain the view we take of the matter, and to show that there was error in the charge that the stipulation was not reasonable and was void.

It is stated in the case that his honor gave the jury the following instruction, which was excepted to: "It is the duty of the defendant company to provide suitable cars for transporting live stock. The car must be sufficiently strong to resist the struggles of the stock, and the company is liable for loss occasioned by its neglect in this regard, in spite of the fact that the animals are vicious and unruly, upon the principle that it is within its power to provide those which are actually and absolutely sufficient." There was error here also, we think; for, while it may be the duty of a carrier that undertakes to ship live stock to provide cars strong enough to safely transport animals that are ordinarily unruly, the law does not impose upon it so hard a task as to detect that some of them are vicious, and act accordingly. The vehicle must be suitable for the safe conveyance of ordinary animals of the class. It is not required that it shall be strong enough to withstand the struggles of some of that class that may be not only unruly, but vicious. As there must be a new trial for the error mentioned, we omit consideration of other exceptions taken by defendant. New trial.

ZELL GUANO CO. v. EMRY et ux.

COMPOSITION WITH CREDITORS—VALIDITY.

An agreement to compromise a debt for 50 cents on the dollar, to be paid at a certain time, provided other creditors accept the same terms, is not binding when some of the other creditors are allowed to retain their original claims until the notes given in the settlement are actually paid, to be surrendered only on payment of such notes, or have a secret understanding by which they are to be paid before the time agreed on with the balance of the creditors.

Appeal from superior court, Halifax county; George A. Shuford, Judge.

Action by the Zell Guano Company against Thomas L. Emry and wife. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Battle & Mordecai, for appellant. W. H. Day and J. M. Mullen, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The answer of the feme defendant sets up as a defense a composition agreement entered into by the plaintiff and certain of her other creditors to whom she was indebted for fertilizers. The plaintiff denied that it had made any such compromise. The jury, responding to the first issue, have found that the plaintiff did "agree to compromise the debt sued on with the defendant Emma J. Emry for fifty cents on the dollar, to be secured as alleged in the answer, provided other creditors accepted same terms of settlement." Turning to the answer to ascertain how the "fifty cents on the dollar" was to be secured, we find it was to be done "by mortgage or deed of trust on real estate, each creditor to pass upon the sufficiency offered for his respective debt, and if, upon investigation, the same proved not satisfactory, she (defendant) pledged herself to make it so." And from the same source we ascertain that the terms of settlement, so far as they related to the time of settlement, were that the payment should be made in the fall of 1890. It therefore became necessary, in order that the plaintiff might be defended in the recovery of its entire original debt, that it should be established that the other creditors did accept the same terms of settlement. There was no composition agreement, as far as plaintiff was concerned, unless this condition, which, according to the verdict, was annexed to its acceptance of the proposition of settlement made to it, was fulfilled. Instead of proving its fulfillment, we think the defendants have admitted its nonfulfillment. Among the creditors to whom this proposition was made by defendants, and who were to be parties to the composition agreement, were the Goldsboro Oil Company, Lister's Agricultural Works, and H. S. Miller & Co., the last named being the creditor through whose agent the proposition was submitted to the plaintiff. We find in the record that on the trial it was admitted "that the defendants settled with Lister's Agricultural Chemical Works on the terms testified to by W. E. Daniel; that they settled with H. S. Miller & Co. on the terms set out in their deed of trust, (Exhibit B,) and with the Goldsboro Oil Company, after judgment was taken for the debt in full, on the terms testified to by the defendant T. L. Emry on his cross-examination." The "terms testified to by W. E. Daniel" were that if the fifty per cent. was not paid at the time agreed upon, to wit, in November, 1890, "the whole debt was to remain due." The terms of the settlement with H. S. Miller & Co., which were incorporated in the deed of trust made to secure the note given to represent the sum due according to the compromise, were that those creditors (Miller & Co.) should continue to hold their original notes, and should not surrender or cancel them until the new note for one-half the debt was actually paid; and, if the latter note was not paid at maturity, (November 15, 1890,) then the original debt was to be in full force against the defendant, "without any offset except what may be paid thereon." Concerning the settlement made with the Goldsboro Oil Company, the defendant T. L. Emry testified that when notified by the agent of Miller & Co., to whom the negotiations with that company and with the plaintiff had been intrusted, that the Goldsboro Company would not accept the proposition made to it, he opened negotiations with them himself; and, stating what took place as the consequence of these latter negotiations, on his cross-examination he said: "They sued and took judgment at May term, 1890, of Goldsboro court, with the understanding, which was inserted in the judgment, that they would accept fifty per cent. within a certain time." We must assume that the terms upon which these three several settlements were made were agreed upon by the parties concerned in each, and that these settlements carried into effect the only agreements made with these particular creditors.

The terms of these settlements differed very materially, we think, from the terms of that settlement which was offered to the plaintiff, and which it conditionally accepted. It is true that in each the ratio of proposed payment to the entire debt is the same, to wit, 50 per cent. But to two of these creditors it was allowed to make only a conditional compromise. They were not required to surrender or cancel the original indebtedness, and accept in lieu thereof absolutely a new promise to pay one-half of the surrendered debt in the fall, but were allowed to retain their original claims against the defendant, they promising to surrender them if the payment of one-half the sum was promptly made as agreed; otherwise, the original claim was to be in full force. This was not the proposition made to the plaintiff by the agent of the defendants, as testified to by him in their behalf, nor is it the composition agreement set out in the answer. The retention of the old debt under such condition was an advantage not offered to plaintiff. We think it even more evident that the Goldsboro Oil Company did not accept the same terms of settlement which were tendered to the plaintiff; that it demanded and received a settlement by cash before the fall of 1890. If it had accepted in good faith the terms offered to the plaintiff, and afterwards—but not because of any secret understanding—payment had been anticipated merely for the accommodation of the debtor, no complaint could reasonably be made. But such are not the facts of this case. Here we have a proposition on the part of a debtor to enter into a certain composition agreement with a certain class of her creditors, and an agreement on the part of one creditor that he will enter into that composition, provided the other creditors will also do so. Nothing less than the strictest compliance with the terms of the proposed composition on the part of the debtor and on the part of the other creditors, also, can bind him. The most perfect good faith is required of all. Any preference of one creditor over another, whether that preference relates to the amount to be paid him, to the time when it is to be paid, or to the manner of securing its prompt payment, taints the whole contract, and renders it void. From what has been said, it seems to follow that the facts admitted by defendants on the trial, coupled with the finding of the jury on the first issue, establish the essential fact that there is no contract binding the plaintiff to accept one-half of its debt against the feme defendant in full satisfaction of it, and the other issues and the findings of the jury thereon become of no importance in determining the rights of the parties. The very foundation of the defense was destroyed by the verdict and the admissions, and plaintiff was entitled to a judgment for the whole debt according to the prayer of the complaint. The cause is remanded, to the end that judgment may be so entered. Error.

MITCHELL et al. v. BRIDGER et al.

TRESPASS—CONSTRUCTIVE AND ACTUAL POSSESSION OF LAND—INSTRUCTIONS NOT WARRANTED BY EVIDENCE—ERRORS IN CERTIFICATE OF REGISTRATION—MODIFICATION OF JUDGMENT.

1. In an action for trespass to land "almost entirely" covered by water, but held under "deeds by metes and bounds," the court properly refused to instruct that if the land on which the trespass was committed was covered by water the doctrine of "constructive possession" would not apply, and that plaintiffs must show that they "were in possession" of the same.

2. Where such trespass was committed by cutting timber on a pond appurtenant to plaintiffs' mill, which had been used by them, and those under whom they claimed, for 50 years, under deeds embracing within their boundaries the land covered by the water as well as that on which the mill was situated, plaintiffs must be deemed to have actual possession of the whole, except such part as might be in the actual possession of another.

3. Instructions based on facts unsupported by the evidence are properly refused.

4. A deed from Jesse Eason to "Noah and William Hinton" was witnessed by Thomas Ruffin and H. W. King. The certificate of probate was as follows: "State of North Carolina, Bertie county court, May term, 1820. This deed from Jesse Eason to Noah and William King was proved in open court by the oath of Thomas Ruffin, one of the subscribing witnesses thereto. Let it be registered. Teste: E. A. Rhodes, Clerk." Held, to show that the name of King, instead of Hinton, was inserted by clerical error on the part of the clerk, and that such error did not make the certificate insufficient to warrant the registration of such deed.

5. Under Rev. Code, c. 37, § 26, providing that a contract for the sale of land shall be registered, and section 16, providing that "the registry or duly-certified copy of the record of any deed, power of attorney, or other instrument required or allowed to be recorded, may be given in evidence," the registry of such contract may be received in evidence.

6. Where there was judgment for plaintiffs, and some of the defendants were shown not to have committed any trespass on, or to have asserted any claim to, the land trespassed on, the judgment will be modified by striking the names of such defendants from the judgment.

Appeal from superior court, Bertie county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Action by Thomas L. Mitchell and others against R. M. Bridger and others to recover for trespass to plaintiffs' land. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Modified.

F. D. Winston, for appellants.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The exceptions addressed to the sufficiency of the descriptions contained in the will of Joseph Eason and the deed of Leonora Burden and others to T. L. Mitchell, as well as to the charge of the court respecting the identification and location of the land upon which the trespass was committed, are plainly untenable. The principles sustaining the action of his honor in these particulars are deemed to be too well settled to require an extended discussion, or the citation of authorities.

Equally without merit is the exception to the refusal of the court to instruct the jury that, if they believed that the land on which the timber was cut was covered by water, "the doctrine of constructive possession" would not apply, and that it would be necessary to show that the plaintiffs "were in possession" of the same. Constructive possession, says Ruffin, C. J., in Graham v. Houston, 4 Dev. 237, is "such a possession as the law carries to the owner by virtue of his title, only, there being no actual occupation of any part of the land by anybody;" and we know of no reason or authority that excludes from the operation of this principle lands which are held, as in this case, under "deeds by metes and bounds," simply because they are "almost entirely" covered by the waters of a mill pond. The case, however, discloses that the trespass was committed by going on the pond, and cutting and carrying off certain timber trees near the run of the swamp; that this pond was appurtenant to the mill, which had been used by the plaintiffs, and those under whom they claimed, for 50 years or more, under the deeds in evidence. It is very plain that if these deeds embrace within their boundaries the land covered by the water, as well as that upon which the mill is situated, the plaintiffs would have actual possession of the whole, except such part as might be in the actual occupation of another. Graham v. Houston, supra. The exception, therefore, is overruled.

The exception respecting the inclosed land in the actual occupation of the defendants is without force. There was no evidence of a trespass, except upon the waters of the pond, and in assessing the damages the jury were necessarily confined to the same. The refusal to charge as requested could not have prejudiced the defendants, and especially is this so, inasmuch as his honor—it seems, by consent of all parties—excluded from the judgment all the lands in the actual occupation of the defendants.

There was no evidence that the defendants were in the actual possession, as distinguished from acts of trespass, of the waters of the pond where the timber was cut, and the instructions based upon such an hypothesis were properly refused.

The defendants objected to the introduction of the deed from Jesse Eason to "Noah and William Hinton." The attesting witnesses to the deed were Thomas Ruffin and H. W. King. The certificate of probate is as follows: "State of North Carolina, Bertie county court. May term, 1820. This deed from Jesse Eason to Noah and William King was proved in open court by the oath of Thomas Ruffin, one of the subscribing witnesses thereto. Let it be registered. Teste: E. A. Rhodes, Clerk." It is quite manifest that the name of King, instead of Hinton, was inserted by reason of a clerical error on the part of the clerk; and, where it appears that the requirements of the law have been substantially complied with, we should be reluctant to hold, upon so slight a ground, that the certificate was insufficient to warrant the registration of the deed. "Acknowledgments are frequently taken before persons of limited skill and knowledge, and, while all the requirements of the law have been carefully and scrupulously complied with, yet errors will creep into the certificate, which manifestly are clerical. To scrutinize these certificates with severity, and declare them insufficient for slight variations or evident errors, where they substantially comply with the statute, would subserve no desirable end." 1 Devl. Deeds, 514. In the absence of testimony to the contrary, we must assume that the certificate, having been registered with the deed, was either written on the deed, or annexed thereto. Such being the case, the identification of the certificate with the deed of Eason to Noah and William Hinton is complete, for it is "this deed" which the clerk declares was proved in open court by Thomas Ruffin. The fact that Jesse Eason executed that particular paper was the essential thing to be proved, and this plainly appears from the certificate. There was no error in permitting the deed to be read in evidence.

In making out their title, the plaintiffs introduced a contract executed in 1855 for the sale of the land by one Freeman to James Burden. The defendants objected "because it was not under seal, and was not such a paper as required registration, and the original should be produced." No seal is necessary to the validity of a contract for the sale of land, and we have been referred to no authority in support of the position that the registry or certified copy of the record of any such contract may not be received in evidence. The Revised Code, (chapter 37, § 26,) which was in force when this contract was executed, required that it should be registered, and in section 16 of said chapter it is provided that the "registry or duly certified copy of the record of any deed, power of attorney, or other instrument required or allowed to be registered or recorded, may be given in evidence," etc. The case of Edwards v. Thompson, 71 N. C. 177, decided that these provisions did not put a contract for the sale of land on the same footing as an unregistered mortgage, but it was by no means held that such a contract was not allowed to be registered, and therefore its registry inadmissible in evidence. The objection to the admission of the registry was properly overruled.

In looking over the entire record, we have been able to discover but one error on the part of the court. The defendants Junius and Thomas Bridger asked the court to instruct the jury that there was no evidence that they had ever cut any timber or otherwise trespassed upon the land. This instruction was refused, and, as we can find no such evidence in the record, we must hold that there was error in the refusal. As these defendants do not claim the land, and are only concerned about the judgment against them for the damages assessed by the jury, the erroneous ruling will not necessitate a new trial, but may be corrected by striking the names of these parties from the judgment. Modified and affirmed.

CHEATHAM v. YOUNG et al.

PROCEEDINGS OF TOWN COMMISSIONERS—ADMISSIBILITY IN EVIDENCE—LOCATION OF STREETS—LIMITATIONS—PLEADING.

1. The minutes of proceedings of the town commissioners whereby the relative positions of two streets were fixed are, if properly identified, competent, though not conclusive, evidence to fix their point of intersection in a controversy subsequently arising as to the location of such call in a deed.

2. In an action to recover land, defendant may prove possession by himself for seven years, in support of a general denial in the answer that plaintiff is the owner, without specially pleading the statute.

Appeal from superior court, Vance county; Henry R. Bryan, Judge.

Action by E. L. Cheatham against J. R. Young and others to recover land. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Pittman & Shaw, for appellant. A. C. Zollicoffer, for appellees.

AVERY, J. The statement of the case on appeal is not so full or so clear as it might have been made. But it seems to have become material to the location of the plaintiff's boundary to determine where Montgomery street intersected with Garnett street and with Wyche alley; and one of the questions involved in this inquiry was, what was the width of Garnett street, and what the distance from it to said alley? Neither the map used upon the trial nor any one of the deeds is sent up as an exhibit, and it does not appear in express terms from the testimony what was the description of the land claimed by the plaintiff.

Assuming that the inquiry of the jury was directed to the point mentioned, the first exception is to the competency of the minutes of the proceedings of the mayor and board of commissioners of the town of Henderson at two meetings held, respectively, on the 22d and the 26th of May, 1866, (ante litem motam), at one of which the entry was: "On motion, the street 180 feet northwest of Garnett, and running parallel with Garnett, shall be called, as formerly, 'Wyche Alley,'" and at the other it appeared that a committee was appointed to assist the surveyor in widening Garnett street from John H. Young's corner to Breckenridge street, so as to make it 83 instead of 75 feet, as it then was, "by taking eight feet on the south side and twelve feet on the north side." Where it becomes material to prove the contents of such a record, the party relying upon it may identify and offer the original, or introduce a copy properly certified. State v. Voight, 90 N. C. 741; Code, § 1342; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 485. In this case, the original having been identified by the testimony of Dr. Young, only the question whether such a record as that put in evidence is competent is worthy of serious consideration or discussion. The principle upon which records such as those in question are usually admitted as evidence when duly certified or satisfactorily identified has been very clearly stated by an eminent text writer: "Documents of a public nature and of public authority are generally admissible in evidence, although their authenticity be not confirmed by the usual and ordinary tests of truth,—the obligation of an oath, and the power of cross-examining the parties on whose authority the truth of the document depends. The extraordinary degree of confidence thus reposed in such documents is founded principally upon the circumstances that they have been made by authorized and accredited agents appointed for the purpose, and also partly on the publicity of the subject-matter to which they relate. * * * Those who are empowered to act in making such investigations and memorials are in fact the agents of all the individuals who compose the public." Such public writings are "only receivable, however, in proof of those matters, the remembrances of which they were called into existence to perpetuate." 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 483, 484; Best, Ev. § 219; Clarke v. Diggs, 6 Ired. 159; Brundred v. Del Hoyo, 20 N. J. Law, 328; Swinerton v. Insurance Co., 9 Bosw. 361. The records offered were made by the governing officials of a town, which was a public agency, established with defined powers, one of which was to locate, open, or widen the public streets. They were made long before the present controversy arose, and bear intrinsic testimony to the fact that the object in passing them was to fix the relative positions and bounds of Garnett street and Wyche alley, and incidentally the points of their intersection with Montgomery and other streets running diagonally across both. Such records, being publicly made by public agents, and presumably for the public benefit, may be more safely admitted to show where the streets of a city or town are located than the declarations of even disinterested deceased persons as to the situation of the lines and corners of land. It has been said that the admission of hearsay evidence as to questions of boundary had its origin partly in the obsolete rule which made it competent to prove prescription by general reputation, and partly in the fact that "in many sections of this country a single surveyed boundary line is common to a number of estates, becoming in this manner a quasi matter of general interest." Boardman v. Reed, 6 Pet. 328; Shook v. Pate, 50 Ala. 91. In Davidson v. Arledge, 97 N. C. 179, 2 S. E. Rep. 378, it was held that a map of the city of Charlotte, shown to have been recognized by the authorities of the city for 15 years, was competent as testimony tending to show the location of the streets laid down thereon and the distance from one to the other. This ruling seems to have been founded upon the fact that the map was made under the direction of, and was approved as correct by, the public agents whose duty it was to fix the limits of streets, and who were presumed to have acted properly, and to have caused an accurate delineation of their true location to be made for their own guidance. The presumption of accuracy of the map was doubtless a rebuttable one, in the same way the official declaration as to the proper location of Wyche alley and its distance from Garnett street, and as to the increased width of Garnett street, is competent, though not conclusive, evidence to locate a boundary line when the streets named, or their points of intersection, were called for in the deed. 2 Whart. Ev. § 1310. It is well settled that it is competent for a defendant to prove possession by himself and those under whom he may claim for seven years, in support of a general denial in the answer that the plaintiff is the owner, without specially pleading the statute. Farrior v. Houston, 93 N. C. 578; Manufacturing Co. v. Brooks, 106 N. C. 107, 11 S. E. Rep. 456. There was no error, therefore, either in admitting the testimony objected to, or in the refusal of the charge as asked by the plaintiff. No error.

MARRINER et al. v. JOHN L. ROPER LUMBER CO.

ACTION ON ORDER—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—REVIEW ON APPEAL—ERROR NOT RAISED BELOW.

1. Certain contractors who were sawing lumber for defendant company were in the habit of paying their men in part by orders on a certain store, which orders contained the request to "charge to account" of defendant; and there was some evidence that the storekeeper was an agent of defendant. Held, in an action on such an order, assigned to plaintiff, but not accepted by the storekeeper, that it was error to charge that defendant was liable if plaintiff had been moved to take an assignment of the order because of his knowledge that such orders had always been paid by the storekeeper, acting for defendant, and that defendant had also furnished a book of these printed blank orders to the contractors to be filled up and signed by them.

2. Under Code, § 412, subd. 3, providing that if there be error in instructions they shall be deemed excepted to without the filing of any formal exceptions, it is sufficient if exceptions to the charge be set out in the case on appeal.

Appeal from superior court, Washington county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by W. C. Marriner and another against the John L. Roper Lumber Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. D. Pruden, for appellant. A. O. Gaylord, for appellees.

CLARK, J. This is an action by the assignee of an unaccepted order against the alleged principal of the drawee. The drawee was one Blount, designated in the order as "Company Store." His habit was to pay in goods all orders drawn on him by Jewett & Wilson which contained the request, in the body thereof, "Charge to account of John L. Roper Co." At the end of each month these orders would be added up, and Jewett & Wilson would give Blount a draft for the sum thereof upon the defendant, who would be allowed by Blount a discount of 12½ per cent. for paying the same. These orders were given by Jewett & Wilson to such of their hands as they did not pay in cash. The orders did not purport to be signed by them as agents of the Roper Lumber Company. The only evidence from which such agency could be inferred was the request in the order to charge to said company, and the agency was expressly negatived by the evidence of both plaintiff and defendant, which was that the relation of the drawers, Jewett & Wilson, to the defendant, was that of contractors sawing and shipping lumber to the said Roper Lumber Company, which was under no obligation to pay such orders except when indebted to the drawers. It may be that Blount was agent for the defendant. But that is immaterial, as is also the inquiry whether the defendant was indebted to the drawers when the order was refused payment by Blount. The order not having been accepted, no liability in favor of payee or his assignee could attach to the drawee, nor, of course, to his principal. The remedy was by an action against the drawers either on the dishonored order, or upon the original count for work and labor done. The court told the jury that no contract had been shown between the assignee (or payee) of the order and the defendant; but it charged that the defendant was liable if the plaintiff had been moved to take an assignment of the orders because of his knowledge that such orders had always theretofore been paid by Blount, acting for the defendant, and that the defendant had also furnished a book of these printed blank orders which were filled in and signed by the drawers, Jewett & Wilson. This could give neither the payee nor his assignee any greater claim upon the drawee, Blount, than the holder of a protested check would have upon a bank because it had always theretofore paid the checks of the drawer, which the holder had therefore taken, believing it good. Nor would it make any difference that the check was filled in upon a printed blank taken from a check book furnished the drawer by said bank. Whether the Roper Lumber Company was, or was not, the principal of the drawee, it cannot be made liable, since the drawee was not. As to the objection that exceptions to the charge were not taken at the trial, it has been held sufficient, under the statute, (Code, § 412, subd. 3,) and under rule 27 of this court, (12 S. E. Rep. vii.,) if they are set out by appellant in preparing his case on appeal. Lowe v. Elliott, 107 N. C. 718, 12 S. E. Rep. 383; Clark's Code, (2d Ed.) p. 383, and cases there cited. Error.

TALIAFERRO et al. v. SATER et al.

CHATTEL MORTGAGE—EXTENT OF LIEN—AFTER-ACQUIRED PROPERTY.

The lien of a mortgage for an individual debt, made by defendant on all the lumber at his mill, "and all such lumber as [defendant] may hereafter purchase and saw at said mill between" certain dates, does not extend to timber contracted for by defendant, but which was paid for and manufactured at such mill by a firm of which defendant was a member.

Appeal from superior court, Halifax county; George A. Shuford, Judge.

Action in claim and delivery by H. B. Taliaferro & Co. against W. A. Sater and S. T. Rawls, partners as W. A. Sater & Co. T. H. Hale and M. C. Hale, as Hale Bros., interpleaded, claiming the property in suit under a chattel mortgage made by defendant Rawls. Interpleaders had judgment, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

R. O. Burton and E. L. Travis, for appellants. T. N. Hill and W. H. Day, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The appellees, who are interpleaders in this action, claim the property in dispute under a mortgage made to them on March 16, 1890, by the defendant S. J. Rawls to secure a debt due from him, individually, to them. In that mortgage the property assigned is described as "all the lumber owned by said Rawls at his mill now on the land of Mrs. Virginia Grizzard, in Halifax county, N. C., near the town of Halifax, both sawed and unsawed, and also all the lumber owned by him at his siding at the junction of the Wilmington & Weldon and the Scotland Neck railroads, said siding being on the main line, both sawed and unsawed, and all such lumber as the said Rawls may hereafter purchase and saw at said mill between the date hereof and the first day of August, 1891." On April 15, 1891, defendant Rawls made with one Jackson a contract, by the terms of which Jackson agreed to sell him certain pine timber trees then standing on designated tracts of land, at the price of 75 cents per thousand feet for all trees cut by him, payment to be made "at the expiration of every four weeks while engaged in cutting timber on said premises;" and this contract provided that Rawls should execute a bond in the sum of $3,000 to secure his faithful performance of its stipulations, and it was further provided that without this bond the contract should be of no effect. This bond was not made till the 20th day of April, 1891, but we think that it related back to the date of the agreement, and perfected the contract as of its date.

On April 20, 1891, the defendants Rawls and Sater formed the copartnership of W. A. Sater & Co., and this firm, being indebted to plaintiffs, executed and delivered the following instrument: "Whereas, W. A. Sater and S. T. Rawls, partners as W. A. Sater & Co., are indebted to H. B. Taliaferro & Co. in the sum of $576.85, less amount of freight not charged on bill of said Taliaferro & Co., and they desire to secure the same: Now, therefore, the said W. A. Sater & Co. do hereby convey to said H. B. Taliaferro & Co. all the lumber now owned by them, either sawed or unsawed, at their mill on the land of Mrs. V. S. Grizzard, or at their railroad siding, and all lumber they now own which is uncut. And the said W. A. Sater & Co. hereby do agree and bind themselves to ship to said H. B. Taliaferro & Co. all the lumber that they may hereafter saw at their said mill, to be sold by them, and applied to the payment of said debt until the same is fully paid off, and until all indebtedness hereafter incurred to said Taliaferro & Co. by reason of any advance and supplies they may hereafter furnish said mill are paid in full. And the said W. A. Sater & Co. do hereby give to said H. B. Taliaferro & Co. a lien on all the lumber they may hereafter saw at said mill, to secure them for any advances the said Taliaferro & Co.

may hereafter make said W. A. Sater & Co. for the running of said mill. S. T. Rawls. [Seal.] W. A. Sater. [Seal.] Witness: S. M. Gary. This 30th May, 1891." In the argument before us, no question was made as to the validity of the mortgages described in the pleadings, nor is it necessary for us to pass upon them, as the case is now presented to us. The mill spoken of in this latter instrument was the mill of Rawls mentioned in his mortgage to the interpleaders heretofore set out, and it was operated by the firm of Sater & Co. during the existence of the copartnership. The mortgage made by Rawls to Hale Bros. did not at all affect the right that he acquired by his contract with Jackson to cut timber on the latter's land. It put no lien on that timber, or on his right to cut it. If he had himself caused any of that timber to be cut, and had himself caused the logs to be carried to the mill and to be sawed into lumber, that lumber and any unsawed logs, being his individual property, and answering to the description contained in the mortgage, would be liable for his individual debt to the interpleaders, Hale Bros. But the evidence on the trial tended to show that what timber was cut on the Jackson land was cut, not by Rawls, but by the firm, who paid Jackson for the trees, hauled them to the mill, which the firm, not Rawls, was operating, and there the logs were sawed into lumber, not by Rawls, but by the firm, who paid all the expenses of converting the standing timber—upon which the interpleaders, as we have said, had no lien—into lumber at the mill. If these facts are true, it seems that the property in dispute—the lumber at this mill—was never subject to the mortgage given by Rawls to the interpleaders, because it was not purchased and sawed by him, and that it is subject to plaintiffs' mortgage, because it is both legally and equitably the property of the firm of Sater & Co. We therefore hold that his honor erred when he charged the jury "that if they found from the evidence that the lumber in controversy was sawed from lumber purchased by Rawls in his own name for himself before the formation of his copartnership with W. A. Sater, and was sawed by the mill owned and operated by said Rawls at the time of the execution of the mortgage by him to Hale Bros. after the date of said mortgage, and before August 1, 1891, whether the same was sawed by Rawls alone, or by him and Sater as partners, the same would be covered by the description of property contained in the mortgage from Rawls to Hale Bros. and the title passed from him unto Hale Bros., under that clause in their mortgage conveying all such lumber as said Rawls may hereafter purchase and saw at said mill between the date hereof and the first day of August, 1891; and this would be true although the timber from which the lumber was sawed may have been paid for with the copartnership funds of W. A. Sater & Co." If it were true, as the interpleaders seem to insist, that their lien covered the Jackson timber, or rather Rawls' right to take timber from that land, then it would follow, as plaintiffs insist, that whatever clear profit they made out of sawing this timber must be applied on their mortgage debt, for a mortgagee who acquires possession of the mortgaged property must in all cases account for it, and he will not be allowed to say, when called upon to settle, that his possession was not under the mortgage, but will, upon the accounting, be credited by such sums as he may have properly paid out to perfect his title, to protect his possession, or to render the property available for the payment of the mortgage debt. But, since we hold that the interpleaders had no mortgage or lien on the Jackson timber, it is of no avail to consider questions concerning the application of profits made by a mortgagee in possession, which are raised by plaintiffs' second exception. For the error pointed out above, there must be a new trial.

COGGINS et al. v. FLYTHE et al.

ACTION ON GUARDIAN'S BOND — COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES — LIABILITY OF GUARDIAN — NEGLIGENCE.

1. Code, § 580, provides that no party to an action on a bond executed prior to August 1, 1868, shall be a competent witness in such action. Acts 1886, c. 361, allows defendants who are administrators or executors to testify in actions on such bonds where there is a reference to state an account. Held, that in an action on a guardian's bond given before August 1, 1868, where there is a reference for an accounting, the guardians are competent witnesses.

2. In an action on a guardian's bond, where plaintiffs claim that the guardians are liable for failure to compel an accounting by an administrator of an estate in which the wards were interested, where the administrator, now deceased, had filed his inventory and account in 1866, the burden is on plaintiffs to show that the administrator did not apply the assets of the estate for its benefit.

3. In an action on a guardian's bond the sworn returns of the guardians are admissible in evidence.

4. Where an administrator reduced the personal property of his intestate to money in 1862, 1863, and 1864, and paid the debts of the estate during that time, the balance on hand was properly sealed at three dollars for one dollar, the scale value of January, 1863, being an average, instead of by an application of the scale to each item of the account.

5. Where there is no evidence of an appropriation by an administrator of the assets of the estate, he is not chargeable with interest on the receipts.

6. Where the accounts of guardians were closed every year, and the receipts and expenditures were in Confederate money, the scale was properly applied to the balance at the end of the war.

7. Where, during the war, an administrator paid with Confederate money certain simple contract debts, instead of applying the proceeds to debts of higher dignity, being charges on the land of decedent, and by emancipation the estate of decedent became insolvent, in view of the general financial disturbances of the period, and the doubt as to whether the holders of the securities would have received payment of the indebtedness in Confederate currency, the guardians of the children of decedent are not liable on the bond because they failed to bring an action against the administrator as for a devastavit.

8. It was not negligence in a guardian in 1865 to rent the land and hire out the slaves for cash in Confederate currency.

9. A guardian is not personally liable for the necessary expenses of resisting a motion to remove him.

10. Where a testator devises certain property to certain named children of his brother by one clause of his will, and by another clause gives certain land to his brother for life, at his death the land to descend "to his children," a child of his brother born after the making of the will, but before testator's death, has an interest in the land.

11. Where a guardian allows the administrator of an estate in which his wards have an interest to take charge of the real estate, he is liable to his wards for the rents up to the time the land was sold to pay decedent's debts.

12. Where a guardian fails to sue a note due his ward's estate until the parties thereto are insolvent, he is liable for his negligence.

Appeal from superior court, Northampton county; George H. Brown, Judge.

Action by K. R. Coggins and others against Jesse Flythe and others. From the judgment, both parties appeal. Modified.

R. B. Peebles, for plaintiffs. T. W. Mason and Willis Bagley, for defendants.

MACRAE, J. This was an action upon the bond of Flythe, guardian of the relators, heard upon exceptions to the referee's report at April term, 1892, of Northampton superior court. It is proper to say that while the case comes up upon appeals of both plaintiffs and defendants from the judgment of his honor, Judge Brown, the exceptions to be considered are from the rulings of MacRae, judge at a previous term of said court.

We will first consider the plaintiffs' appeal. Exceptions 1, 5, 6, and 7 involve the admissibility of the testimony of Jesse Flythe and William Grant, two of the defendants, being exceptions to certain findings of fact based wholly or in part upon the testimony of the said defendants. It is contended by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs that the defendants are incompetent to testify by reason of the provision of section 580 of the Code, that "no person who is or shall be a party to an action founded upon a judgment rendered before the first day of August, 1868, or on any bond executed prior to said date, * * * shall be a competent witness on the trial of such action." It will appear, however, by an examination of the record, that this action was brought upon two bonds of defendant Flythe as guardian, one executed before, and the other after, August 1, 1868, and that there was an amendment of the complaint allowed by the referee, striking out all reference to the bond executed since that date; but all of the testimony of defendant Grant, and nearly all of that of defendant Flythe, was admitted before this amendment, and while the action was upon the two bonds. But we are not prepared to hold that the testimony was incompetent under section 580, even when the action is upon the bond executed prior to August 1, 1868, alone. There has been much legislation upon the subject of evidence of late years in North Carolina. Before 1866, generally speaking, no party in interest was a competent witness on the trial of an action. In that year, by chapter 43 of the Acts of Assembly, called "An act to improve the law of evidence," the door was opened to all, and now, by section 589 of the Code, "no person offered as a witness shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action." It will not be necessary to advert to section 590, which provides certain exceptions to this general rule. In the Code of Civil Procedure of 1868, under the head, "A Party may Examine his Adversary as Witness," section 333 provided: "A party to an action may be examined as a witness at the instance of the adverse party, or of any one of several adverse parties, and for that purpose may be compelled in the same manner, and subject to the same rules of examination as any other witness, to testify either at the trial or conditionally or on commission." This section is the basis of section 580 of the present Code, and is the first paragraph thereof. The act of 1879, c. 183, added a proviso "that no person who is a party to a suit now existing or which may hereafter be commenced * * * that is founded on any * * * bond under seal for the payment of money or conditioned to pay money, executed prior to the first day of August, 1868, shall be a competent witness" etc. This act was construed not to apply to official bonds. Morgan v. Bunting, 86 N. C. 66. There was a material change in this proviso by the Acts of 1883, c. 310, in which the words "any bond" are used, and the words "for the payment of money, or conditioned to pay money," are omitted; and the plaintiff contends that the effect of the last-mentioned amendment was to make incompetent any party to an action upon any bond, official or otherwise, executed prior to August 1, 1868. Section 580 of the Code is composed of section 333, Code Civil Proc., with the proviso introduced by the act of 1879 as amended by the act of 1883. A subsequent act (chapter 361 of 1885) enables defendants who are administrators or executors to testify in actions upon bonds executed before August 1, 1868, where there is a reference to state an account. This act, it seems to us, was passed out of abundant caution, and to exclude such a conclusion in regard to executors and administrators as is sought by the plaintiff in the case of a guardian, for it is impossible that section 580 could be made to apply to the examination of a defendant upon a reference to state an account. The present action is in the nature of a bill in equity for an account. The very nature of the action makes it a bill of discovery, the object of which is to have the defendant guardian to answer upon oath, and to make discovery of his dealings as guardian. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 447; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 689. While the act of 1879 was amended by the act of 1883 so as to strike out the words "for the payment of money," etc., and make it read "upon any bond," to give it the construction called for by the plaintiff, and to hold that the defendant guardian could not testify, nor be compelled to testify, upon the taking of the account, would take away the equitable jurisdiction of the court to require a discovery and accounting by a fiduciary, the essence of which is the examination of the defendant and the discovery of him under oath. It is to be noted that this action is not the old action for discovery in aid of the prosecution or defense of another action, which was abolished by section 579 of the Code, having been rendered useless by the changes in the law of evidence. The proceeding in which the testimony of these defendants was given was upon the taking of the account demanded by the plaintiff before the referee, and not upon the trial of the action.

Exception 2 is to finding No. 8, that "there is no evidence that the administrator used any of the money received by him on account of said estate for any other purpose than for the payment of the debts and expenses of administration of said estate, or that he did not pay out, in satisfaction of such debts and expenses, the same money which he received on account of said estate." The administrator and estate referred to above are S. J. Calvert, administrator upon the estate of Newitt Harris, deceased. The contention of plaintiffs is that the defendant guardian and the sureties on his bond are liable for the failure of the guardian to hold the said administrator to account for a devastavit alleged to have been committed by him in the said administration, to the damage of the wards of said guardian, the present relators. The said Calvert, administrator, died before the commencement of the present action. There has been no final settlement of the estate of his intestate, and no administrator de bonis non has ever been appointed for that purpose. The administrator filed his inventory and account of sales at March term, 1862, of Northampton county court, and an account of his administration was stated by the clerk of the superior court of said county in some action pending in said court, and the vouchers are now on file in said clerk's office. From these data the referee has made up the account of said administration. Plaintiffs contend that from this account there is evidence that the said administrator did use the money which came into his hands as administrator; that by June, 1862, he had received $5,219.21, and up to January, 1863, he had paid out only $2,271.24; and, further, that it appears by said account that he paid a part ($407) of one of the bonds which he ought to have paid in full before paying any simple contract debt. As to the contention that this account furnishes in itself some evidence that the administrator used the funds of his intestate for his own benefit, we think that it requires more than an admission that the administrator had the money in his possession to prove that he appropriated it to his own use. It was not always easy to pay the debts of an estate considered fully solvent in Confederate money, and this is a matter of general information. It would seem that the burden in this case should be upon the plaintiffs, for the account filed or taken before the clerk, with the vouchers, was presumably under the oath of the administrator, and therefore prima facie correct. Grant v. Hughes, 94 N. C. 231. It would be hard measure to put upon the defendants in this action the burden of disproving the allegations of plaintiffs as to the mismanagement of the estate, the administrator of which is now deceased. The finding we think is in accordance with the evidence. It is true that in an action against an executor or administrator, when the plaintiff shows by the inventory and account of sales that assets came into the hands of the personal representative, the burden is upon him to show that they have been duly administered; but when, in addition to the inventory and account showing assets, there is the further statement under oath of his disbursements, this is prima facie evidence, subject to attack, but it stands if no evidence is offered to dispute it. In Villines v. Norfleet, 2 Dev. Eq. 167, where it was sought to surcharge a settlement of an executor's accounts by commissioners appointed by the court, it was held that said settlement, while not a bar to a future action, did rebut a presumption of fraud.

Exceptions 3 and 9. These exceptions involve the correctness of the referee's finding 9, and the ruling of the judge below on the fourth, fifth, and sixth exceptions, relating to the finding of the referee that Newitt Harris was indebted to S. J. Calvert on open account $1,200. The point is whether the account filed by the administrator is prima facie evidence of its truth, or is it necessary, when it is denied in the complaint, that the guardian should offer proof to sustain it? This is the same question which we have just discussed. Section 16 of the complaint alleges that the administrator rendered the account in December, 1866. This action, as we have said, is not for an accounting by the administrator, but it is an action against the guardian and the sureties upon his bond, alleging that the guardian negligently permitted an estate in which his wards were interested to be squandered. It was alleged that S. J. Calvert, administrator of Newitt Harris, had rendered an account in 1866, in which he retained $1,200 to pay an alleged debt to himself, which debt was, in fact, not owing to him. There was no question about the account having been rendered; it was as to the correctness of the $1,200 alleged debt. It appeared in the account; the plaintiffs had the right to attack it. It may be that, as was said in Finch v. Ragland, 2 Dev. Eq. 137, the court presumes against an administrator dealing with the estate for his own benefit; but in the same case it was said by the elder Ruffin: "It may be said that the defendant ought to discharge himself by proof. In such case the answer is proof. If an administrator inventory a debt as desperate, he cannot be charged with it but by proof on the other side that it was collected, or might have been. Here the plaintiffs have sought to charge the defendants upon their oath. They must take their answer, subject, indeed, to be disproved." That action was brought directly against the administrator for an account, etc. How much more strongly does his honor's reasoning apply to the present case, where it is sought, in a suit against a guardian, to falsify an account rendered by the administrator of an estate in which his wards were interested, the administrator having rendered an account and died long ago. This will apply to the $1,200 retainer, where no voucher was filed, as well as to the $556.13 item alleged to have been paid to Samuel Calvert, administrator.

Exception 4 relates to finding 11 of the referee, which is the same as finding 13 of the judge, and it is as follows: "The estate of said Drewry Harris was amply able to pay all the debts owing by said Drewry Harris as principal, and, but for the two surety debts aforesaid, it would not have been necessary to sell the lands devised by said Drewry to Thomas, Mary, Martha, and Addie Harris." The contention is that Drewry Harris' estate was amply able to pay all his debts without recourse to his lands, had the executor properly applied the proceeds of the personality, and this contention is correct; but the sale of the land became necessary by reason of the two surety debts which remained unpaid after the payment of legacies in Confederate money by the executor, and as it appeared that the executor was insolvent, and nothing could have been made out of him by an action by the guardian, the result has not been affected by this finding.

Exception 8 relates to the overruling of plaintiffs' third exception, which was in these words: "For that he admitted the guardian returns offered by defendants." These returns were referred to in the testimony of defendant Flythe, and were testified by him to be correct. They were admissible as part of testimony, and as a sworn statement in corroboration of his testimony, which we have held to be competent.

Exception 10 is—First, to the application of the scale in the administration account; and, second, to the application of the scale in the guardian account by the referee,—that it was error to have applied the scale of Confederate currency to the balance found to be in the hands of the administrator at the end of the war. The administrator appears by the account to have reduced the personal property of his intestate to money in 1862, 1863, and 1864,—a large proportion thereof in January, 1862,—and to have paid the debts of his intestate during the years 1862, 1863, and 1865. The balance on hand at the end of the war was $2,084.08. This sum was scaled at $3 for $1; the scale value of January, 1863, being an average, instead of an application of the scale to each item of debt and credit in the account. This seems to have been in accordance with the practice in North Carolina, and to be sustained by the decisions of this court. Freeman v. Wilson, 74 N. C. 363; Drake v. Drake, 82 N. C. 443; McNeill v. Hodges, 83 N. C. 504. The exception is further to a failure on the part of the referee to charge the administrator with interest on his receipts. Having sustained the finding that there was no evidence of the appropriation by the administrator to his own use of the funds on his intestate, we see no good reason for charging him with interest. The same exception alleges error in the application of the scale in the guardian account. This account appears to have been closed and a balance struck at the end of every year, and interest computed according to the rule in guardian accounts, and, the receipts and disbursements being both in Confederate currency, the scale was applied at the end of the war upon the balance as then found. In the account with the ward Addie Harris the balance was against the guardian, and in that with the ward Mary it was in his favor. We hold that the scale was properly applied, upon the authorities already cited, and upon reason.

Exception 11 alleges error in overruling plaintiffs' thirteenth exception to the report of the referee, for his finding that S. J. Calvert, administrator of Newitt Harris, did not use (as his own) the money belonging to the estate of his intestate. The account and vouchers showed disbursements from time to time during the period of the administration, which would indicate, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the money was paid out as it was received, and the plaintiff has offered no evidence to the contrary.

Exception 12 alleges error in overruling the fifteenth and sixteenth exceptions to the referee's report that the defendants ought to be held liable for what the guardian might have collected by suit upon the bond of the administrator, including the proceeds of sale by him, for assets, of the Powell and Tisdale lands. Undoubtedly, the general principle is that it is the guardian's duty to protect the interests of his wards, and that, if they suffer by reason of his negligence, he and his sureties should be liable therefor. It appears that the administrator paid and retained on simple contract debts a sum which should have been applied to the payment of debts of higher dignity, and so have relieved the land devised to the wards of defendant Flythe. These two debts of higher dignity were bonds on which the intestate, Newitt Harris, was principal, and Drewry Harris was surety; and by the failure of the administrator of Newitt Harris to pay them before he retained and paid the simple contract debts, and by the subsequent insolvency of the estate of his intestate by reason of the emancipation of the slaves, a sale of the land devised by Drewry Harris to the relators became necessary, and was decreed in order to pay these bonds. At the time of the payment and retainer of the debts of lower degree by the administrator, the estate of Newitt Harris was solvent, and it became insolvent by reason of the forced emancipation of the slaves. The general rule, both at law and in equity, is that it would be a devastavit if an executor or administrator should give preference to a debt of lower class over those duly presented of a higher dignity, (Moye v. Albritton, 7 Ired. Eq. 62; Schouler, Ex'rs, § 435,) just as the general rule with regard to the acceptance and management of Confederate money is that trustees should be held to that degree of care and circumspection which prudent men exercise under similar circumstances in the conduct of their own business affairs, (Patton v. Farmer, 87 N. C. 337.) But it is common knowledge that there was a hesitation on the part of holders of solvent securities to receive payment of the same in Confederate money, and that after January, 1863, or, at the furthest, July 4, 1863, it was not the act of a prudent fiduciary to accept such payments. In the little light we have upon this administration, there is nothing to show us any willingness on the part of the holders of these bonds to accept payment of the same in Confederate currency, except as to the payment of $407 on one of them in 1862. It may be that, if the administrator were alive to testify, the reason for the payment of the simple contract debts first would be made to appear to be the refusal of the holders to accept payment of bonds, then entirely solvent, in a depreciated currency. We are also affected with the knowledge, common to all, that soon after the close of the war there was such uncertainty as to the solvency of persons and estates, and such embarrassment in the collection of debts, as well might have deterred a prudent man in the management of his own affairs from incurring the expense of litigation in doubtful cases; and, while there was no statute to that effect before the act of 1869, (section 1496 of the Code,) we cannot say, fitting the principles of law and equity, which never change, to the circumstances of this case, where the estate was amply solvent at the date of the retainer and payment, and became insolvent afterwards, without fault of the administrator, but by the overpowering effect of the war and its incidents, that in the spirit of liberality which the law exercises towards executors and administrators (Schouler, Ex'rs, 385, note 1) the courts would not then have held that there was no devastavit, and that the administrator and his sureties were not liable. Under these circumstances, we are of the opinion that the guardian, in view of all the evidence, was not negligent in failing to bring an action against the administrator of Newitt Harris.

The conclusion arrived at in the consideration of the last exception will dispose of all other exceptions based upon the theory that the guardian and his sureties ought to be held liable for such failure. It was clear the guardian could have made nothing for his wards by a suit against Isaac Peele, executor of Drewry Harris, as he was insolvent immediately after the war, and has remained so ever since. The other exceptions above referred to as virtually disposed of are 15, 18, 19, and 20, involving the question whether the defendant guardian, by due diligence, could have prevented the sale of the Potecasi land, and the exceptions to the supplemental report as to alleged errors in the statement of the account of S. J. Calvert, administrator.

Exception 13 is—First, to a failure to credit Addie Harris with the balance due her on January 1, 1866, with compound interest, etc., and that such balance should have been $30.90, instead of $10.01, as found. This balance was not charged against the guardian because it appeared that he had the funds on hand at the close of the war, and they became of no value. Second, the failure to credit Mary Harris with her share of the rents of land and hire of slaves for 1865 on the ground that it was negligence to have hired for cash. It appears that the guardian rented the land and hired the slaves for 1865 for cash in Confederate currency, and that the same remained in his hands at the close of the war. Was it negligence to have taken cash in the currency of the country under the circumstances? Would a prudent man have preferred to take notes just at that juncture? As was held below, ordinary rules ought not to be applied to transactions of that date when every thing was in such confusion and uncertainty in the section where these transactions occurred that all prudent men in the management of their own affairs, and fiduciaries in those of others, were at a loss to know what to do. The sequel showed that many solvent securities were soon to lose all value.

Exception 14 is for error in overruling, in part, exception 25: "For that in stating said account he erred in allowing the guardian the following items, to wit, $3.38, paid sheriff bill of costs Mar. 1, 1873; no charge against wards. Motion was made to remove him as guardian, and dismissed at his costs. Voucher 58, Apr. 2, 1874, $10.00 fee paid Attorney W. Bagley to resist motion to remove him." We have been pointed to no judgment against the guardian for the costs. If a motion was made to remove the guardian which was dismissed or denied, it would seem that he ought not to be held personally liable for the necessary expenses of resisting the motion. This exception is also to the allowance of the items $325, March 1, 1864, and $1,200, March 1, 1865, upon the ground that there was no evidence to support them. They appeared in the account of the guardian which he swears to be true. They were open to attack, and in our opinion were not successfully repelled. While apparently large items, the scale applied to the balance as of January 1, 1865, reduced them to very small sums.

Exception 16 was withdrawn, and 17 is admitted to be well taken. It is to an evident error of Judge MacRae in writing the word "sustained," instead of "overruled," to the defendants' tenth exception, and was so treated throughout the subsequent proceedings, and therefore did not affect the result to the prejudice of the plaintiff. There is no error.

Defendants' Appeal.

MACRAE, J. The first and fourth exceptions of defendants involve a construction of the will of Drewry Harris. The clauses of the will bearing upon the point are as follows: "Item 2. I give and bequeath unto Thomas C., Mary, and Martha, children of my brother Newitt Harris, sixteen negroes, [naming them,] to be equally divided between the said children of my brother, to them and their heirs, forever." "Item 6. I lend unto my brother Newitt Harris during his natural life my negro man 'Big John,' also, all my land, and improvements thereon, on the south or west side of Potecasi creek, and at the death of my said brother I give the said land and negro to his children, to them and their heirs, forever." The children of Newitt Harris were the present relators, Thomas, Martha, Mary, and Addie. It is contended by the defendants that the said Addie Harris is not entitled to a share with the other children of Newitt Harris in the land devised in the above-recited item 6 of Drewry Harris' will because, although said Addie was living at the death of the testator, she was not in being at the time of the making of his will, having been born afterwards, and that the true construction of said will would include only those children who were living at the time of the execution of the will, and because the intention of the testator can be collected from item 2, taken in connection with item 6, to have been in favor only of the children who were then living. The principle, as stated in Williams on Executors, § 981, is: "Generally speaking, every one who, at the time of the testator's death, falls within the described class of children, will be entitled; but where it appears from express declaration or clear inference upon the will that the testator intended to confine his bequests to those, only, who answered the description at the date of the instrument, such intention must be carried into effect. A court of equity, however, is always anxious to include all the children in existence at the time of the death of the testator." Defendants rely upon Lockhart v. Lockhart, 3 Jones, Eq. 205, where it is said that "where a testator in one part of a will uses words descriptive of a class, and in another part uses the same words of the same persons, the presumption is that in both cases the words are used in the same sense." The application of the above-stated principle was to a very different state of facts than is presented to us. The question was whether certain children took, under the will of Sarah Lockhart, per stirpes or per capita. By item 2 there was a specific bequest "unto the children of my son John." Item 5, being the residuary clause, gives all other property undisposed of in former items of the will "to the children of my deceased son John" and my sons Benjamin and Joseph. The court found no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that the children of John, being named as a class in the second item, and the same words of description being used in the fifth item, took there also as a class. In the present case there can be no room for construction. Item 2 gives 16 slaves to certain persons, naming them, and describing them as "children of my brother Newitt," the enjoyment to be immediate on the death of the testator. By the subsequent item he gives the land to his brother for life; "and at the death of my said brother I give the said land * * * to his children." It would be a very strained construction which would limit this devise to the children living at the execution of the will. By all rules it would take in children born after the death of the testator, and living at the death of their father, Newitt. In this case, however, Addie was living at the death of the testator, and was entitled to share in the devise. "In a bequest to a class of persons, as to children, courts will effectuate the intention of the testator by including as many persons answering the description as possible." Meares v. Meares, 4 Ired. 192.

Second exception. It appears from the referee's report that on November 25, 1861, Newitt Harris died intestate, leaving a considerable personal property, and two tracts of land known as the "Tisdale" and "Powell" places; that S. J. Calvert qualified as administrator on his estate in 1861, and gave bond, which bond remained solvent up to January, 1874. Until the emancipation of the slaves the estate of Newitt Harris remained solvent, but the said administrator took charge of the real estate of his intestate, and declined to surrender it to the guardian, on the ground that Confederate money was depreciating so rapidly he could not tell what would be the condition of the estate. The guardian made no demand for possession until two years after the qualification of the administrator, under an apprehension that the administrator was entitled to hold the land for two years. The guardian was requested by the administrator, however, to rent out the land for 1865, and he rented the Tisdale tract for that year, and the rent appears in his account. He could not rent the Powell tract. After the emancipation said estate became insolvent, and on the — day of —, 18—, said administrator began proceedings to sell said lands for assets for the payment of debts, and said Flythe and Mary, Martha, and Thomas were duly made parties defendant. Said lands were sold on the — day of —, 18—, and the prices obtained for them appear in the account. Upon the foregoing facts the referee declined to charge the guardian with the reasonable rents of said lands, but stated an account of what said reasonable rents would be. The plaintiff excepted to the refusal of the referee to charge the guardian with said rents. This exception was sustained by the judge, and defendants excepted, and this constitutes the matter now involved in exception 2. The defendant does not except to the finding of the referee as to the value of the rents if the guardian is chargeable with them at all. The administrator has no concern with the real estate of his intestate until it becomes necessary to sell the same for assets, when the statute provides the proceeding by which he may subject the same to sale for the purpose indicated. Code, § 1436 et seq.; Schouler, Ex'rs. §§ 212, 213, 509. The guardian was invested with full power and authority over the estate of his wards. They were the heirs and the owners of the land of their ancestor, subject to the payment of his debts. Before the act of 1846-47 the procedure to subject the lands to the payment of debts was at the instance of the creditor and against the heirs. After this act the personal representative was required to take proper proceeding for that purpose, but until this proceeding was had it was the duty of the guardian to take charge of the land, and rent it out or use it for the benefit of the heirs. If the administrator had collected the rents and paid debts with it, there being a deficiency of personal assets, a court of equity would not hold the guardian accountable. Hinton v. Whitehurst, 71 N. C. 66; Moore v. Shields, 68 N. C. 330. The order of sale for assets ascertains that it was necessary to sell the land, but not that the rents, which ought to have been collected by the guardian, had been appropriated to the payment of debts. There is no evidence that the administrator collected any rents. The guardian is already charged with the rent for 1865 of one tract, and, if he has shown that the other tract could not be rented for that year, he is not chargeable therefor. He should be held liable for the rents which he ought to have collected for the heirs.

Third exception. Newitt Harris, the father of the relators of plaintiff, died intestate in November, 1861, leaving considerable personal property and two tracts of land. His estate was solvent up to the emancipation of the slaves. Drewry Harris died in 1860, leaving a will by which he devised a tract of land to Newitt for life, and after his death to his children, the relators. Newitt Harris as principal, and Drewry Harris as surety, owed two bonds, one to Summerill and the other to Phillips. S. J. Calvert was administrator on the estate of Newitt Harris, and retained $1,200 on a simple contract debt to himself, and paid Samuel Calvert $556.13 on a simple contract debt, leaving unpaid the two bonds above described. The estate of Newitt Harris was amply able to have paid these specialty debts. The executor of Drewry Harris filed a petition to sell the lands of his testator, and sold the land to pay the two bonds aforesaid, on which Newitt Harris was principal and Drewry was surety. Plaintiff charges that the administrator of Newitt Harris was guilty of a devastavit in paying the simple contract debts of his intestate before the specialty debts, thus exhausting the personality, as it turned out, by reason of the subsequent emancipation of the slaves, and making it necessary for the executor of Drewry to sell the land which had been devised to the relators, the wards of defendant Flythe, and that said defendant should have sued the bond of the administrator of Newitt. The referee found that an action by the guardian against the administrator would have availed the wards nothing except that it would have revealed the devastavit in paying simple contract debts in preference to specialties, by reason whereof he failed to pay the bonds upon which Newitt was principal, and made it necessary to subject to the payment of the same the lands of Drewry which had been devised to the wards. Plaintiff excepted to this finding by the referee, and insisted that an account of the estate of Newitt would show that plaintiffs (relators) were greatly damaged by a failure on the part of their guardian to bring this action. Defendants excepted to all of this finding except that such suit would have availed nothing. MacRae, Judge, sustained defendants' exceptions upon the ground that the estate of Newitt was solvent at the time of the payment of the simple contract debts, and was rendered insolvent afterwards without fault of the administrator. Upon plaintiffs' exception the same judge held that upon a recasting of the account it will appear whether this exception is well taken. Defendants except to this ruling upon the ground that it was hypothetical, and inconsistent with his rulings upon defendants' exception. Upon such recasting it is made to appear that the said estate was solvent at the time when the payments were made; and as we have held, upon consideration of the plaintiffs' appeal, that the defendants ought not to be held liable as for a devastavit, on account of the circumstances of this case, it follows that the recasting of the account worked no harm to the defendants.

Exception 5 is to the ruling of MacRae, Judge, whereby the guardian was charged with the bond of T. W. Jordan, A. J. Jordan, and F. S. Faison for the rent of the Potecasi land for 1873, due January 1, 1874. Flythe, the guardian, rented the Potecasi land for 1873 to T. W. Jordan, and took his note, with A. J. Jordan and F. S. Faison as sureties, for $200, due January 1, 1874. At the time of the execution of the note the sureties were reputed to be solvent, but in 1872 and 1873 large judgments had been taken and docketed against said Faison. The guardian found it necessary to sue these same parties in 1872 and 1875 in order to collect other rent notes out of them, but he failed to sue upon the note in question until 1876, when all the parties thereto were insolvent. A guardian is not an insurer, but he is required to use reasonable diligence. He had notice in this instance, for he had found it necessary to sue the same parties in 1872, and again in 1875; but he waited two years before taking legal steps to collect this note, and then the parties were insolvent. If he had acted with reasonable promptness, he could have made the money. He should be held liable for its loss for the want of the exercise of ordinary care.

Exceptions 6 and 7. The referee filed the post bellum accounts of the guardian showing a balance due Addie Harris, January 1, 1881, of $551.07, and a balance due Mary I. Coggins of $63 on June 1, 1877. The defendants excepted to this finding for that in fact Mary L. received one-third instead of one-fourth of the rents of the Potecasi land. In this account the guardian was charged with one-fourth of said rents as that which should have been paid to Mary, but by some inadvertence the counsel for the guardian excepted upon the ground that he should have been charged with one-third of said rents, and the exception, by the same inadvertence, was sustained. The defendants' counsel, after the supplemental report, proposed to withdraw this exception, and let the account stand as originally made by the referee. As it evidently was a mistake, this ought to have been allowed. There is no analogy between this and paying money under a mistake of law. These exceptions should be sustained.

The eighth exception is to errors in the account, stated by the referee, of S. J. Calvert, administrator of Newitt Harris. As we have held on the plaintiffs' as well as defendants' appeal that the defendant ought not to be held liable for a failure to sue the administration bond on account of the alleged devastavit, this exception should be sustained upon the fifth ground.

All of the exceptions having been disposed of, it follows that the defendants are not liable for the sum of $186.86 each, and interest, the sum found to be in the hands of S. J. Calvert, administrator; that the plaintiffs' relator Mary is not entitled to recover of defendants the sum of $151.39, but that the defendant Jesse Flythe ought to have judgment against Mary L. Coggins for $17.21, with interest from the 1st of January, 1877; and that the relator Addie should have judgment against the defendants for the amount of their bond, to be discharged on the payment of $643.10, with interest thereon from January 1, 1881. Modified.

LOCHEIMER et al. v. WEIL et al.

ASSIGNMENT FOR THE BENEFIT OF CREDITORS — COMPROMISE OF SUITS — GOOD FAITH OF ASSIGNEE—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

An assignee for the benefit of creditors, who compromises suits affecting the assigned estate under the advice of his own counsel, and after consultation with and by the consent of counsel employed by a creditor, cannot be charged by such creditor with lack of good faith and proper diligence in making such compromises.

Appeal from superior court, Wayne county; Brown, Judge.

Action by Mayer H. Mann, J. Mann, and H. Mann, as partners under the firm name of Lochelmer, Mann & Co., against Joseph Stern, Isadore Saks, and Henry Well, and Solomon Well, as trustee for the benefit of creditors of Stern & Saks, to require a settlement of the trusteeship. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Exceptions to report by plaintiffs: "The plaintiffs except to the report of the referee, filed at January term, 1891, and for grounds of exception specify and say that said report is erroneous, for that: (1) In paragraph 13 thereof the referee finds as a fact that H. F. Grainger was the attorney of the creditors secured in the second class of said deed of assignment, whereas the evidence shows that he was employed to represent the trustee in the actions brought against him by the attaching creditors, and his services in that behalf were paid by said trustee, ($75,) as shown in his account filed, marked 'B.B.' (2) In paragraph 14 thereof the referee finds as a fact that plaintiff Mann told Mr. Grainger that he (Mann) would leave the matter entirely in his (Grainger's) hands, and to do the best he could with it, whereas the evidence shows that Grainger was employed to defend the suits brought by the attaching creditors against the said trustee, and no authority given him, or any one else, to compromise said suits. (3) In paragraph 19 thereof the referee finds as facts that in said compromise the said H. F. Grainger represented the second-class creditors, among whom were the plaintiffs in this action, whereas the evidence shows that said Grainger was employed to defend the actions brought against said trustee by the attaching creditors; and the action of Sol. Well, trustee, to plaintiffs, shows that the compromise was recommended by the trustee's lawyers, and only by them, and the said Grainger had no authority to advise or consent to any compromise or judgment so far as these plaintiffs were concerned. (4) In paragraph 22 thereof the referee finds as facts that said Sol. Well acted in good faith in assenting to said compromise and judgment, and for the best interests of his trust, whereas the evidence shows that the said compromise was only made that he (Well) might get payment in full of a debt due H. Well Bros., of which he was a member, in utter disregard of the right of the other creditors secured in said deed of trust, and without their knowledge or consent, or without the approval of a court of justice; that in this connection the referee should have found as a fact that, before the attaching creditors sued, the plaintiff Jacob Mann offered to take goods at cost prices in payment of plaintiffs' claim, they being in the second preferred class, and the defendant trustee refused, requiring the said Mann to pay for the same in cash, when the said Well, trustee, well knew that the goods assigned to him inventoried at cost $6,437.39, and the debts in the first class only aggregated $2,836.22; that said action on the part of the trustee was a scheme to save his own debt at the expense of the other creditors, and was not in good faith, and the referee should have so found."

Exceptions to conclusions of law: "(1) For that the referee, in his first conclusion of law, omitted to charge the defendant trustee with the full amount of goods seized by the attaching creditors,—that is, 75 per cent. of their inventoried price,—in making up his account, so far as the plaintiffs are concerned. (2) For that the referee, in his second conclusion of law credits the account of the defendant trustee with disbursements as shown in his twenty-sixth finding of facts, whereas no disbursement subsequent to the time plaintiff Jacob Mann offered to take goods at cost price in payment of plaintiff's claim should be allowed. (3) For that the referee, in his third conclusion of law, finds that H. F. Grainger was attorney of the plaintiffs in this action, and leaves the inference that he legally represented them in said compromise, which said finding, accompanied by the qualification that he was only employed to assist the defendant trustee in defending suits of attaching creditors, and for no other purpose, is misleading, and not pred-located upon the facts. (4) For that the referee, in his sixth conclusion of law, finds that the defendants are entitled to judgment against the plaintiffs and their surety upon this prosecution bond for cost, whereas judgment should have been rendered in favor of the plaintiffs for the full amount of their claim, with interest and cost, as demanded in the complaint filed in said action."

The following is the opinion of G. H. Brown, Jr., Judge: "This cause came on to be heard before me upon exceptions of plaintiffs to the report of referee. The principal exception argued before me was as to the alleged want of authority by Grainger to Mann to compromise the suits of Claflin et al. vs. S. Well, Trustee, etc. It appears that Grainger represented Mann's firm of Lochelmer, Mann & Co. in that suit, although they were not parties to the record. It appears that he was associated with Well's counsel, and the two agreed to a certain judgment. Inasmuch as Lochelmer, Mann & Co.'s counsel consented to the judgment, it is binding, whether Grainger had authority to agree to that judgment or not. Grainger's estate is admitted or found to be solvent, and the plaintiffs' remedy is against that, if they have any. It seems that Grainger had general authority to represent interest of plaintiffs in the suit. After considering the testimony, I see no reason to overrule any of the referee's findings of fact, and I see no error in any of his legal conclusions. The report is therefore confirmed, and the several exceptions overruled. The judgment is affirmed."

Fuller & Fuller, for appellants. S. A. Woodard, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The plaintiffs are creditors of a firm—Stern & Saks—which in 1870 made an assignment to the defendant Well to secure the distribution of their assets among their creditors, with certain preferences therein provided for, and in this action they require of him a settlement of his trusteeship. The facts found by the referee have been confirmed by his honor, and are thus conclusively determined. We find no error in the conclusions of law which were drawn from those facts. As is stated in the judgment, the contention of the plaintiffs is that the defendant trustee should be held liable to them for the value of a portion of the property assigned to him, which had been attached by two of the creditors of Stern & Saks, to wit, H. B. Claflin & Co. and Armstrong, Cator & Co. It is found that the suits brought by these two creditors, in which warrants of attachment were issued and a portion of the assigned property was seized and sold, were compromised by the trustee; and, by the terms of the compromise so made, the attaching creditors were allowed to have about two-thirds of the proceeds of the attached goods, while only one-third was paid over to the trustee. The plaintiffs had a right to demand that the defendant trustee should be diligent and faithful in the management of the estate committed to his charge in part for their benefit. But his compromising the suits mentioned above was not at all incompatible with either good faith or due diligence. A trustee may compromise suits brought against him affecting the assets in his hands, and he will not be liable to the cestuis que trustent, provided he has acted with due care, and in good faith has done what, under the circumstances that surrounded him at the time, seemed best for the interest of those whom it was his duty to honestly serve. It may be conceded that an attorney has no authority to compromise his client's cause that has been committed to his charge without special authority so to do. That is well settled. A general employment as attorney does not include such authority. But that recognized principle does not fit the case before us. Here is a question of diligence and fidelity on the part of the defendant trustee. The charge against him is that he sacrificed the assets committed to him by the compromise of these suits,—that he allowed $1,000 of the assets to be, by that compromise, diverted from the creditor to whom it belonged to the plaintiffs in those suits; and his reply to this charge is that he acted in this matter in good faith and with due diligence, and to prove this he asserts that this compromise was made by counsel whom he had employed to represent the interest of the creditors, and after consultation with an attorney in whose hands the appellants had placed their claim against Stern & Saks for collection. We repeat that the question here is not whether an attorney, under a general authority to conduct a suit, has authority to compromise his client's cause, (which of course must be answered in the negative,) but whether a trustee who, under advice of his own counsel, and after consultation with and by the consent of counsel employed by the creditor, compromises suits affecting the trust estate, is chargeable by that creditor with lack of good faith and proper diligence because he made that compromise. We think that this query must also be answered in the negative, and that there is no error in the judgment. Affirmed.

LILES et al. v. ROGERS et al.

SUBROGATION—SURETIES ON SEVERAL BONDS.

When a sheriff has given two bonds to the state, conditioned for the collection and payment of state and county taxes, respectively, and has paid the state with part of the money collected for county taxes, without notice to the state officials, or the sureties on the bond for state taxes, these sureties are not liable to the sureties on the county-tax bond for the sum misapplied, under the doctrine of subrogation, since the state-tax bond was extinguished by performance, and the state could not have been compelled to refund the money, nor had it refunded, could it have revived the sureties' liability.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; George H. Brown, Jr., Judge.

Action by B. Liles and others against J. Rowan Rogers and others on a bond. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Armistead Jones and Battle & Mordecai, for appellants. Busbee & Busbee, Batchelor & Devereux, and J. C. L. Harris, for appellees.

SHEPHERD, C. J. This case comes before us on demurrer to the complaint, from which it appears that the defendant Rogers, as sheriff of the county of Wake, executed three bonds to the state,—one conditioned upon the payment and collection of county taxes, one conditioned upon the payment and collection of state taxes, and the other conditioned upon the due execution of process, etc. It further appears that the sheriff, being engaged in the collection of said taxes, used a part of the money collected by him as county taxes in his settlement of the state taxes with the state treasurer; but it is not alleged that the state treasurer, or the defendant sureties to the state-tax bond, had any knowledge whatever of the misapplication of the said money. This action is brought by the sureties on the county-tax bond against the sureties on the state-tax bond, and the prayer is that the defendants be required to "refund" to the plaintiffs the sum of $2,700, the amount misapplied by the said sheriff.

Conceding, for the purposes of the argument, that the sheriff held the money in the character of a trustee, it is very plain that it cannot be followed into the hands of the defendant sureties, as it does not appear that any part of the said money ever came into their possession. In the absence, therefore, of any averment connecting them with the alleged breach of trust, their liability, if any, must result from their contractual relations with the state. It is only through this medium that the plaintiffs can look for relief, and hence it is insisted that they are entitled to recover upon the principle of subrogation. Subrogation is the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor, so that the person in whose favor it is exercised succeeds to the rights of the creditor in relation to the debt. Sheld. Subr. § 1. The doctrine is distinctly a creature of equity, and the ground of relief does not stand entirely upon the notion of mutual contract, either expressed or implied. Brinson v. Thomas, 2 Jones, Eq. 414; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 472; Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. 797. The principle is applied where the person claiming its benefit has been compelled to pay the debt of a third person in order to protect his own rights, or to save his own property. Accordingly, it has been held that the sureties on the official bond of an insolvent sheriff, who have been compelled to pay money collected by a defaulting deputy, may recover of the sureties on a bond given to the sheriff by the deputy, conditioned upon the faithful performance of his duties. Brinson's Case, supra. The doctrine applies, also, for the benefit of a purchaser who has extinguished an incumbrance upon the estate which he has purchased; of a co-obligor or surety who has paid the debt which ought to have been met by another; and in other cases of a similar character to be found in the Reports and text-books. While it is true that privity is not, in all cases, necessary, still, to entitle one to relief, he "must have paid the money upon request, or as surety, or under some compulsion made necessary by the adequate protection of his own right." Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. 801. It has therefore been held that if several or successive obligations of suretyship be not, in substance and nature, for the same thing, and have no relation to nor operation upon each other, the doctrine of subrogation cannot be invoked. Langford v. Perrin, 5 Leigh, 552. Tested by these general principles, it would seem that the plaintiffs are not entitled to the relief prayed for, since it is not pretended that they, or any one pursuant to their directions, have actually paid any money for the benefit of the defendant sureties, or that by reason of their contractual obligations, or otherwise, they were in any manner compelled to do so. Extending to them, however, the doctrine insisted upon, let us consider whether it can aid them in the present action. As soon as a surety has paid the debt, an equity arises in his favor to have all of the securities which the creditor holds against the principal debtor transferred to him, and to avail himself of them as fully as the creditor could have done. The securities referred to do not include those which are extinguished by the payment of the debt, such as the bond securing such principal debt; and, unless the surety procures it to be assigned for his benefit to a third person, it is utterly extinguished, both at law and in equity, and he becomes a simple contract creditor, (Briley v. Sugg, 1 Dev. & B. Eq. 366; Sherwood v. Collier, 3 Dev. 380; Hodges v. Armstrong, Id. 253; Tiddy v. Harris, 101 N. C. 589, 8 S. E. Rep. 227,) and entitled to be subrogated only in respect to the collateral securities taken and held by the creditor, (McCoy v. Wood, 70 N. C. 125.) Indeed, the whole doctrine of subrogation is predicated entirely upon the discharge of the original obligation. Sheld. Subr. § 1, and Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. 798. This principle is well established in this state, and is fully sustained by the English decisions prior to the enactment of the mercantile law amendment act, (19 & 20 Vict.) Thus, in Coplis v. Middleton, 1 Turn. & R. 231, Lord Eldon said: "The general rule, therefore, must be qualified by considering it to apply to such securities as continue to exist, and do not get back upon payment to the person of the principal debtor.

In the case, for instance, where, in addition to the bond, there is a mortgage, with a covenant on the part of the principal debtor to pay the money, the surety paying the money would be entitled to say, 'I have lost the benefit of the bond, but the creditor has a mortgage, and I have a right to the benefit of the mortgaged estate which has not got back to the debtor.'" So, also, Lord Brougham, in Hodgson v. Shaw, 3 Mylne & K. 190, observes: "Thus, the surety paying is entitled to every remedy which the creditor has. But can the creditor be said to have any specialty, or any remedy on any specialty, after the bond is gone by payment." So it is said by Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. 811: "It was formerly [prior to the act above mentioned] the rule in England that a surety could have no right of subrogation to such securities as were extinguished by the payment of the debt, such as the bond securing the principal debt." While many of the American courts have conformed their rulings upon this subject to the principle declared by the act of Victoria supra, this court and the courts of Alabama, Vermont, and perhaps other states, continue to follow the original doctrine, as declared by the courts of England, the only modification of the rule in North Carolina being in favor of a surety who has paid the debt of a deceased principal. Rev. Code, c. 110; Code, § 2096. According to these principles, the bond to which the defendants were sureties was discharged by the payment and settlement made with the state treasurer, and cannot be revived in favor of the plaintiffs.

It is further to be observed that the party for whose benefit the doctrine of subrogation is invoked and exercised can acquire no greater rights than those of the party for whom he is substituted, and if the latter had not a right of recovery the former can acquire none. Sheld. Subr. § 3; Clark v. Williams, 70 N. C. 679. Could the state, after the settlement with the sheriff of the state taxes, have revived the liability of the defendants by refunding the money? The answer to this question depends upon whether the money could have been recovered of the state, and it is settled by abundant authority that, in the absence of notice of the misapplication, no such recovery could have been had. Where a trustee illegally transfers trust funds, it is essential to their recovery that the person receiving them should have taken them with actual notice, or under such circumstances as would put him upon inquiry. Bunting v. Ricks, 2 Dev. & B. Eq. 130; Lockhart v. Phillips, 1 Ired. Eq. 342; Gray v. Armistead, 6 Ired. Eq. 74; Folk v. Robinson, 7 Ired. Eq. 235. In the present case, there was no notice, either actual or constructive, and a settlement was made in consideration of the payment. This settlement had the effect of discharging the defendant sureties, and the state, having, on the faith of the payment, parted with its security, could have resisted a recovery. If this be so, it could not voluntarily refund the money, and recover of the defendants. The state, therefore, having no right to recover of the defendants, there is nothing to which the plaintiffs can be subrogated. Suppose the defendant Rogers had borrowed money from a bank, and given these defendants as sureties on the note, and when the note matured he had paid it with county funds in his hands, without the knowledge of the bank or of the defendants. Could the sureties on the county-tax bond of Rogers have recovered of sureties to the note which had thus been discharged? Very clearly not, and such a case differs in nothing, we think, from the case before us. This may appear to be very hard on the plaintiffs, but it is, we hear, a common practice for sheriffs to settle with the state out of the county tax funds; and it is better that sureties who assume such risks should suffer by reason of the unfaithfulness of their principals, than that the court, in the effort to extricate them, should disregard well-settled principles, and introduce uncertainty and confusion into the administration of the laws. After a careful consideration of the case, we are unable to see how this action can be maintained. The judgment of his honor, therefore, must be affirmed.

WELLS v. BOURNE, Sheriff, et al.

SHERIFFS — LIABILITY ON FORTHCOMING BONDS — SECONDARY EVIDENCE.

1. Under Code, § 327, providing that a sheriff who delivers property in controversy in claim and delivery to defendant, without taking a proper bond and requiring it to be justified, becomes "responsible for the defendant's sureties," the sheriff is not liable on a judgment for plaintiff until execution has been issued and returned nulla bona.

2. Such execution and return must be produced in evidence against him, and cannot be proved orally, unless their absence be explained.

Appeal from superior court, Edgecombe county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Action by R. S. Wells against H. C. Bourne and others, sureties on his bond as sheriff, for damages from the failure of the sheriff to take a delivery bond on restoring property seized on claim and delivery. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John L. Bridgers & Son, for appellant.
Gilliam & Son, for appellees.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The defendant sheriff, in delivering the property to the defendant without taking a proper undertaking and requiring the same to be justified, became "responsible for the defendant's sureties," (Code, § 327,) or, in other words, became liable himself as a surety to such undertaking. The measure of liability upon such an undertaking is the delivery of the property to the plaintiff, (if such delivery be adjudged,) with damages for its deterioration, or, if such delivery cannot be had, then for the value of the property. Id. § 326. It was necessary, in order to subject the sheriff as surety, to show that execution had been returned unsatisfied. The execution issued to the sheriff of Wilson county, and his return of nulla bona was not introduced, nor its nonproduction accounted for, and his honor properly excluded oral evidence thereof. The law requires such returns, etc., to be in writing, and public policy requires that such evidence shall not be dispensed unless it has been lost or destroyed. The return in this instance is not within the principle of Pollock v. Wilcox, 68 N. C. 46, and other cases cited, in reference to the exception where the fact sought to be proved is collateral to the writing. The evidence being properly excluded, there was nothing to show any actual damage sustained by the plaintiff, and the judgment below must therefore be affirmed.

RUSS v. BROWN.

COSTS—ADMISSION OF INDEBTEDNESS—EFFECT.

Where a verdict is rendered against defendant for a sum which in his answer he admitted to be due, he is liable only for costs accrued previous to the filing of the answer and for those of judgment.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; Henry R. Bryan, Judge.

Action by W. M. Russ against J. B. Brown. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following issues were submitted to the jury: (1) Did the plaintiff contract with defendant, as alleged in the complaint? Answer. No. (2) Were the plaintiff's services for the first three months satisfactory to the defendant? A. They were, at $75 per month. (3) What sum does the defendant owe the plaintiff? A. $61.50, with interest from January 14, 1892, till paid.

Armistead Jones, for appellant. Battle & Mordecai and J. W. Hinsdale, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. The jury having found, in response to the first issue, and there was no such special contract as was alleged in the complaint,—in other words, that the defendant did not agree to pay the plaintiff $125 per month for the last nine months in the year, provided defendant was satisfied with plaintiff's services for the first three months,—the second issue became immaterial, and the practical question was as to the value of the plaintiff's services, for it was admitted that plaintiff had served defendant for a year. Upon the third issue, the first and second having been put out of the way, the question and answer were relevant and material. The second exception was not relied upon, and is not set out. The defendant having admitted in his answer that he was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $61.50, and offered to permit judgment to be entered against him for said sum, his honor properly adjudged that defendant was liable only for the costs of the action up to the filing of the answer and of judgment. Affirmed.

HILL et al. v. PIONEER LUMBER CO. et al.

CORPORATIONS—INSOLVENCY—SECURING DEBTS TO DIRECTORS—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS.

The capital of an insolvent corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts, and a director of such a corporation, who is also a creditor, cannot take advantage of his superior means of information to obtain a judgment by confession from the corporation, and so secure his debt as against other creditors.

Appeal from superior court, Wayne county; Brown, Judge.

Action by I. F. Hill and others against the Pioneer Lumber Company, G. A. Griswold, and others, to set aside for fraud a judgment confessed by defendant company in favor of defendant Griswold. Defendants demur. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Busbee & Busbee, for appellants. Aycock & Daniels, for appellees.

MacRAE, J. This case is presented to us as upon a demurrer, all the facts alleged in the complaint being admitted in the answer, and the conclusion of law contended for by the plaintiff being denied, thus raising the issue of law whether the facts stated in the complaint constitute a cause of action. It is admitted in the pleadings that, at the time of the confession of judgment in favor of G. A. Griswold against the Pioneer Lumber Co., the defendant corporation was insolvent; that said Griswold and one Hall were the only stockholders, and constituted the board of directors; that said Hall was president, and said Griswold was secretary and treasurer, of said corporation; and that Griswold was present at and participated in the meeting at which resolutions were adopted directing Hall, as president, to confess judgment against the company in favor of Griswold. On this state of facts, the plaintiff I. S. Hill contends that the directors became trustees of the corporate property for the benefit of the creditors, and could not take advantage of their knowledge and position to gain an advantage over the other creditors. We advert to the fact that there appear to be but two members of the defendant corporation. But for the admission in the answer, we might inquire whether there has been such an incorporation as is permitted by section 677 of the Code, as this privilege is extended to any number of persons not less than three. However, as the answer admits that the said defendant is a corporation duly created by the laws of North Carolina, we will proceed at once to the consideration of the only question presented,—whether an insolvent corporation may confess judgment under the statute to a director in the same, who is also a creditor.

There may have been a discussion at an earlier day as to the precise relation in which a director stands to the corporation of which he is an officer,—whether an actual or a quasi trustee for the shareholders, and, in case of the insolvency of the corporation, for the creditors, also. But there can be no doubt that he occupies a fiduciary relation to the company, which, by virtue of his office, he represents in the management of its principal functions; neither can there be any doubt that the capital stock and property of the corporation, in case of its insolvency, constitute a fund, first, for the satisfaction of its creditors, and next for the shareholders. As is said by Mr. Justice Miller in Sawyer v. Hoag, 17 Wall. 610: "Though it be a doctrine of modern date, we think it now well established that the capital stock of a corporation, especially its unpaid subscriptions, is a trust fund for the benefit of the general creditors of the corporation; and when we consider the rapid development of corporations as instrumentalities of the commercial and business world in the last few years, with the corresponding necessity of adapting legal principles to the new and varying exigencies of this business, it is no solid objection to such a principle that it is modern, for the occasion for it could not sooner have arisen." As it is stated in 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1252: "Perhaps to this same head of implied trusts upon presumed intention (although it might equally well be deemed to fall under the head of constructive trusts by operation of law) we may refer that class of cases where the stock and other property of private corporations is deemed a trust fund for the payment of the debt of a corporation, so that the creditors have a lien or right of priority of payment on it, in preference to any of the stockholders in the corporation." This doctrine was clearly stated by Mr. Justice Story in Wood v. Dummer, 3 Mason, 311, in 1824, and has been generally followed and announced in the treatises on this branch of the law ever since that time. 2 Mor. Priv. Corp. § 780; 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 116. And we are not without authority in our own court for the same principle, as very clearly stated in an interesting and able opinion of the late Mr. Justice Davis in Foundry Co. v. Killian, 99 N. C. 501, 6 S. E. Rep. 680. This much being established, we may find the duty and liability of the director laid down in the very many, and sometimes diverse, decisions in the leading courts of this country. As he is selected and intrusted with the management of the affairs of the corporation, and has charge of its property and business, it applies to him that, "whenever confidence is reposed, and one party has it in his power, in a secret manner, for his own advantage, to sacrifice those interests which he is bound to protect, he will not be permitted to hold any such advantage." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 323. As a sequence to the foregoing propositions, we find: "An insolvent corporation being indebted to its officers and directors, they executed the notes of the corporation in their own favor, and, having obtained judgment by default, issued execution thereon. In the distribution of the proceeds of the sheriff's sale of the personal property of the corporation, held, that this conduct of the officers was a fraud in law, which gave them no preference over general creditors in the distribution." Hopkin's Appeal, 90 Pa. St. 69, cited as an illustration under the head of "Liability of Directors for Fraud," 1 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 343. In 17 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, at page 122, where very many cases pro and con are cited, this principle is evolved from the weight of authorities: "It may be stated as a general rule that directors of an insolvent corporation cannot, as creditors of such corporation, secure to themselves a preference. They must share ratably in the distribution of the company's assets." In 1 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 2416: "The directors of a company stand in the same relation towards creditors of the corporation that they do to its shareholders, being trustees for the benefit of corporate trustees, also." Mr. Justice Davis, in Drury v. Cross, 7 Wall. 299, speaking of the directors of a railroad company, says: "It was their duty to administer the important matters committed to their charge for the mutual benefit of all parties interested, and in receiving an advantage to themselves not common to the other creditors they were guilty of a plain breach of trust." It is true "that a director of a corporation is not prohibited from lending it moneys when they are needed for its benefit, and the transaction is open and otherwise free from blame; nor is his subsequent purchase of its property at a fair public sale by a trustee under a deed of trust, executed to secure the payment of them, invalid." Oil Co. v. Marbury, 91 U. S. 587. And there would be nothing to hinder a director from loaning money and taking liens upon the corporate property as security for its repayment, and in enforcing his lien, provided it was an open and entirely fair transaction; but even then it would be looked upon with suspicion, and strict proof of its bona fides would be required.

There are many decisions, however, which hold that although directors are bound to discharge their duties prudently, diligently, and faithfully, and apply the assets, in case of insolvency, for the benefit of creditors instead of stockholders, yet they are not technically trustees, nor bound to apply the assets ratably among the general creditors.

These decisions hold that they may not only make a preference between creditors, but such preference may be made in their own favor if they be creditors, and in such cases they must act with the utmost good faith. 17 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 122, note. This doctrine was held in Garrett v. Plow Co., 70 Iowa, 697, 29 N. W. Rep. 395, and in a note to this case in 59 Amer. Rep. at page 466, a great many cases are cited, all holding the contrary doctrine to the case last named, and sustaining that to which we adhere; and although it appears, from an examination of some of the cases cited in the American & English Encyclopedia on this subject, that there are very respectable and high authorities which would seem to relieve directors from the burden incident to their trust, we cannot hesitate to adopt the views which seem to us the most consistent with the virtuous exercise of the confidence reposed in them, and hold these fiduciaries to the duty which bids them put self-interest behind that of the creditors, who have not the same means of information, which might enable them to protect themselves. There are many cases cited in the brief of plaintiffs' counsel, and others found in the reports of the different states, which, for lack of decisions in North Carolina, are to us persuasive authority. The latest we have seen is that of the supreme court of Georgia in Lowry Banking Co. v. Empire Lumber Co., 17 S. E. Rep. 968, where the proper distinction is made between a mortgage to a director of an insolvent corporation as an indemnity for liabilities already incurred, and one made in the execution or performance of an agreement or undertaking entered into at or prior to the time when the liability was incurred. It might be, in some instances, greatly to the benefit of the creditors and shareholders that directors should in good faith advance to the corporation funds upon security, to enable it to carry out its undertakings.

To apply these principles to the case in hand. The defendant seems to be a corporation composed of but two persons or members, both of whom were necessarily officers and directors. The advantage to these persons in being erected into a corporation was most probably that they might thereby avoid, not to say evade, personal liability for the debts of the concern. It fails of success, and becomes insolvent, which means that it owes more than its capital can pay. It holds a meeting, in which, of course, both of its members participate, and by a unanimous vote it orders the one to confess judgment, in the name of the corporation, to the other, for a large amount of money "due by note." Will this transaction stand, to the detriment of the other creditors of the corporation? This is the first case of the kind which has come before this court for determination. It is an interesting and important question. By reason of the facility afforded by the statute for the formation of private corporations, much of the business of the country and of this state is now being transacted through such agencies. They offer many advantages to the stockholders, and in some respects they are fraught with danger to the public, unless they are held within the bounds of law and equity. Here comes in the beneficence of that public policy which places all corporations under the visitation of the courts. Can there be any essential difference between the principle as applied to a confession of judgment under the Code and a mortgage? Most of the cases we have observed were those of mortgages to secure directors or other officers who were creditors of their own corporations. In the few cases which have come before this court under section 677 of the Code, notably in Davidson v. Alexander, 84 N. C. 621, it has been held that on account of its liability to abuse, and for the purpose of enabling other creditors to have the opportunity to make full investigation if they should so desire, the requirements of the statute should be strictly complied with. It will be observed that the case of Sharp v. Railroad Co., 106 N. C. 308, 11 S. E. Rep. 530, was the confession of judgment by a corporation to one of its officers, and under circumstances calculated to excite inquiry, if not suspicion; but the appeal was from an order made upon a motion to vacate the judgment, where only matters of irregularity could be considered. To attack the same for fraud, it was necessary to bring an independent action, as has been done in this case. The effect of a confession of judgment is more expeditious in securing a lien, and offers a more immediate means of securing payment of a debt by the issue of execution and sale of the corporate property, than that given by a mortgage, for a mortgage made by a corporation cannot create a preference over antecedent creditors until a reasonable time after registration, which is notice, has been afforded them to protect their rights. Code, §§ 685, 1255. The preference is attempted to be reached by the confession instead of by a mortgage. The preference in this case is to be avoided by whatever means it is sought. In holding that an insolvent corporation cannot prefer one of its directors, who is also a creditor, before other creditors, we are not at variance with the decision in Blalock v. Manufacturing Co., 110 N. C. 99. The fourth headnote in that case is misleading when it says: "A corporation has the right to prefer a just debt to one of its officers, to those of other creditors."¹ The judgment was that the debt of this officer should be postponed until the other creditors had been paid. The law is that, where a corporation is insolvent, its capital is a trust fund for the payment of its debts. A director, creditor upon a debt theretofore existing, cannot take advantage of his superrior means of information to secure his debt as against other creditors. Judgment affirmed.

KING v. DUDLEY et al.

PLEADING—AMENDMENT—CHANGING CAUSE OF ACTION.

In replevin for a crop raised on land formerly owned by plaintiff's deceased husband, the complaint alleged that the land had descended to plaintiff's three infant children, for whom one of the defendants had been appointed receiver; that she had occupied the tract on which the crop was grown as lessee of the receiver; and that it was withheld from her by the receiver and her second husband. Held, that an amendment by which she laid claim to only part of the crop, as having been cultivated by her on the portion of the tract on which the mansion house of her deceased husband was located, and in which she claimed to be entitled to dower, did not assert a cause of action wholly different from that set out in the original complaint, nor change the subject-matter of the action.

Appeal from superior court, Pitt county; George A. Shuford, Judge.

Action by L. C. King against E. B. Dudley, administrator, etc., of John M. King, deceased, and S. V. Joyner, to recover possession of certain personal property and a crop of cotton and corn, alleged by plaintiff to belong to her. The action was originally brought against John M. King and S. V. Joyner, but, King having died, his administrator was substituted. R. R. Cotton was permitted, during the pendency of the action, to come in and defend, claiming as assignee or mortgagee of John M. King. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendant Cotton appeals. Affirmed.

The original complaint read as follows:

'The plaintiff alleges: (1) That she is the wife of John M. King, one of the defendants above named, having intermarried with him on the 11th of December, 1887. (2) That, previous to her said intermarriage, the plaintiff had been the wife of B. S. Atkinson, who died intestate in the county of Pitt on the 11th day of November, 1884, leaving, him surviving, the plaintiff and the following children, his only heirs at law, to wit, Peyton T. Atkinson, Alice Atkinson, and Helen Atkinson, all of which said children are under the age of fourteen years; the said Peyton T. being eleven years old, and residing with his grandmother Allie Joyner, and the said Alice and Helen, aged, respectively, ten and eight years, and residing with their mother, the plaintiff. (3) That at the time of the decease of plaintiff's first husband, the said B. S. Atkinson, he was seised and possessed of two valuable tracts or parcels of land situate in said county of Pitt, one of which was and is known as the 'Bensboro Place,' containing about 1,400 acres, and the other as the 'Moye Place,' containing about 1,200 acres, about 400 acres of the first-named tract, and about 250 acres of the last-named tract, being now cleared and under cultivation, and said tracts descended to his said children as such heirs at law, subject to the dower of this plaintiff. (4) That on the — day of —, 1888, by reason of the fact that the said infants were owners of said estate and without guardian, on motion made in due proceedings for that purpose in the superior court of said county of Pitt, the judge of said court appointed the defendant Samuel V. Joyner a receiver, to take under his care, control, and management the estates of the said infants. (5) That the dower of the plaintiff in said tracts of land has not, as yet, been laid off to her, and she has been in sole possession of and cultivating the said tracts ever since the death of her said first husband, and that she has been rendering to said infants through the said receiver, by agreement with him, a certain stipulated part of the crops raised on said tracts, in payment and satisfaction of their interests therein. (6) That under and by virtue of an agreement between the defendant John M. King and the defendant S. V. Joyner, receiver as aforesaid, ratified by this plaintiff, she (the plaintiff) has become bound to pay to the said infants, out of the crops raised on said two tracts during the present year, twenty bales of lint cotton, each of the weight of four hundred pounds, ten of which bales are to be paid out of the crop on said Bensboro tract. (7) That, in right of the plaintiff's said possession, her husband, the defendant John M. King, has ever since her intermarriage with him been managing and superintending the cultivating, making, and harvesting of the crops on the said Bensboro tract, and that on the said tract is situate the mansion house and last residence of her said deceased husband. (8) That in corn, fodder, and other effects the plaintiff has furnished, during the present year, at least three hundred and seventy dollars in value for the carrying on of the farming operations in cultivating the crops on said Bensboro tract, besides teams and farming implements necessary to such cultivation. (9) That the plaintiff is the owner of the following property now employed in making said crops, to wit: One black mule five years old, one black mule age unknown, one bay mule six years old, one gray mule six years old, one sorrel mule six years old, one bay horse seven years old, one two-horse wagon, five carts, twelve plows, two cotton planters, and a large number of other farming utensils, of the value of eight hundred dollars. (10) That this plaintiff is informed and believes the crops now standing and growing on said Bensboro tract of land will, when harvested, amount to at least twenty-four thousand pounds of lint cotton, of the value of twenty-one hundred dollars, and two hundred barrels of corn, of the value of six hundred dollars. (11) That, as the plaintiff is advised, informed, and believes, she is entitled to the immediate possession, management, and control of all the property specified in article nine of this complaint, and of all the crops on the said Bensboro tract. (12) That the plaintiff has demanded possession of the same of the said defendant John M. King, but he has refused, and still refuses, to deliver the same to the plaintiff, and wrongfully withholds the same from her. (13) That, as the plaintiff is informed and believes, the defendant John M. King has been improvidently contracting debts and giving liens on said crops and teams for the payment of the same, without the knowledge or consent of this plaintiff; and that the said defendant claims to be the sole owner of said crops and teams, and threatens to dispose of the same as if they were his own, and to deprive the plaintiff of the same, or of the value thereof. (14) That the defendant John M. King is insolvent, and, if he should so dispose of said property, the plaintiff would be without remedy against him in any action to recover the value of the same."

On the trial, plaintiff was permitted to amend her complaint as follows: "The plaintiff, amending her complaint by leave of the court, alleges, for second cause of action: (1) That on the 11th day of November, 1884, the plaintiff was, and for many years prior thereto had been, the wife of B. S. Atkinson, living with him at his residence on the Bensboro tract of land, in Pitt county. (2) That on said 11th day of November, 1884, the said B. S. Atkinson died intestate at his said residence, seised and possessed of the said Bensboro tract of land and other lands, and leaving, surviving him, the plaintiff, his widow, and Peyton T., Alice, and Helen, their children, minors. (3) That on the death of her said husband the plaintiff became entitled to dower in the said Bensboro tract of land, and in the other lands of which he died seised and possessed. (4) That from the death of her said husband the plaintiff has continued to reside on the said Bensboro tract of land, claiming dower therein, though the same has not been assigned her; and in the year 1889 she was in possession of the mansion house on said land, and of a five-horse crop of the cultivated lands thereof, and has had crops cultivated thereon with her team by croppers or tenants; and that the crops on said land cultivated by her are worth $——. (5) That the defendant John M. King has wrongfully taken the possession of said crops, and wrongfully and unlawfully withholds the possession thereof from this plaintiff; and that he and the defendant Cotten, who has made himself a party to this action, claiming said crops, threaten to apply said crops to the payment of debts of said John M. King to said Cotten, which debts, as she is informed and believes, the said Cotten claims to be liens on said crops, by virtue of mortgages or crop liens executed by defendant King thereon. That the defendant King claims the right to and possession of said crops, as she is informed and believes, under an alleged rental of the land on which same were grown from said defendant Joyner, as receiver of the other defendant heirs at law of B. S. Atkinson; and said defendants, as she is informed and believes, claim some interest therein as such heirs at law. That the value of said crop is $——, and that the plaintiff is the owner, entitled to the immediate possession thereof. The crops claimed are those cultivated by Rufus Phillips, Moses Stancill, Gracie Streeter, alias Atkinson, Allen Foreman, James Jones, and Nancy Leach. In consideration of the amendment being allowed, the plaintiff admits that she is not the owner of the other crops cultivated on said Bensboro farm in 1889, and waives claim to the same."

The amended answer was as follows: "The defendants R. R. Cotten and E. B. Dudley, administrator de bonis non of John M. King, answering the amended complaint, say: (1) The first allegation is admitted. (2) The second allegation is admitted. (3) The third allegation is denied. (4) The fourth allegation is denied. (5) They deny that John M. King or his personal representative wrongfully took possession of said crops, or that either of the answering defendants wrongfully and unlawfully withhold possession of said crops from the plaintiff. The defendant Cotten is in possession of certain crops raised on the Bensboro farm, but they aver such possession is lawful; that the plaintiff has no interest therein, but that the said Cotten is the owner thereof by virtue of certain mortgages, liens, sales, and contracts, which he is ready to produce; that John M. King rented said lands in the year mentioned; and that Cotten has succeeded to all his rights, and that the plaintiff is not entitled to the possession of said crops. (6) And the said defendants reiterate their former answers as if the same were herein written."

The court, among other things, charged the jury that according to the plaintiff's own evidence, and all the evidence in the case, the plaintiff had no interest in the Bensboro farm in the year 1889, further than to have her dower assigned to her therein, and that she was not entitled to any part of the crop or rents and profits from said farm, by reason of the fact that she was the widow of B. S. Atkinson, inasmuch as she had not had dower assigned to her in said land, and since said year had had dower assigned her in another and totally different tract of land; but that if the jury believed from the evidence that she was permitted by S. V. Joyner, receiver of the heirs of B. S. Atkinson, or by John M. King, the lessee of said receiver, to remain in possession of said land, or a part thereof, and by her tenants and with her teams to cultivate five crops upon it, either under a contract with the said lessee or without any express contract whatever, then she was the owner and entitled to the possession of said five crops, or so much thereof as did not belong to her tenants, and that the title to the same did not pass by the deeds of John M. King to Royster & Strudwick and R. R. Cotten; and that if she was permitted, as aforesaid, to remain in possession of said land and cultivate said crops, she would be entitled to recover the value of her interest in the same and in this action. To this instruction the defendant Cotten excepted. The court also instructed the jury that if the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the jury should so find, then she was chargeable with rents to the receiver, and she would be entitled to recover only the value of the five crops, less five-thirteenths of the value of 4,000 pounds of lint cotton, to wit, 1,338 pounds of lint cotton, it being admitted that 4,000 pounds of lint cotton was the amount of rent to be paid to the receiver of the heirs of B. S. Atkinson, and that only 13 one-horse crops were raised on the plantation that year. The court was of the opinion that the rent should be apportioned according to the amount of the land cultivated, and not the amount of crops raised, inasmuch as 4,000 pounds of lint cotton was to be paid for the entire farm, and there was no evidence as to the amount of land cultivated, except that 13 one-horse crops were raised on the entire farm, and the plaintiff raised 5 of these. To this charge the defendant Cotten excepted.

BURWELL, J. The plaintiff in her first complaint alleged that she was the owner of certain stock, wagons, and farming tools, which she described in the ninth article of that complaint, and of all the crops grown on a certain plantation, known as the "Bensboro Tract," in the year 1889, and that the possession of said property was wrongfully withheld from her by her husband and S. V. Joyner. This land had belonged to her former husband, B. S. Atkinson, and upon his death had descended to three infant children. The mansion house of said Atkinson was on this plantation, and no dower had been assigned to the plaintiff. S. V. Joyner had been appointed receiver of the estate of the said infants, and the plaintiff averred that the entire crop was hers under an arrangement between the receiver and herself, she being liable to him for the children's share of the rent. The defendant King died, and his administrator was made a party, and R. R. Cotten interpleaded in the action, and claimed the crop and a portion of the other property under a mortgage made thereon by King to Royster & Strudwick, and by them assigned to him. Upon the trial, after the plaintiff had introduced her evidence, or a portion of it, his honor intimated that she had failed to establish her alleged title to the crop as lessee of the receiver, and then allowed her, notwithstanding the objection of defendants, (Dudley, administrator, and Cotten,) to file an amended complaint, called by her counsel a "second cause of action," in which she set out that she was the owner, not of the whole crop, but of "a five-horse crop," grown on said plantation in 1889 by her tenants; that in that year she, being entitled to dower in the said tract as well as in other lands of which B. S. Atkinson died seised, occupied the mansion house on said tract, and had a five-horse crop cultivated thereon by her own tenants, who used her stock. We think it was entirely within his honor's discretion to allow this amendment. It did not change the subject-matter of the action. She had claimed all the crop. She, by the amendment, only admitted that a part of it belonged to the defendants. In her original complaint she asserted title to the crop as lessee of the receiver. In her second complaint she set out her relation to the Bensboro tract as the widow of B. S. Atkinson; that her dower had not been assigned to her, but that she did occupy and cultivate a five-horse farm on said land in 1889; and that the crop so cultivated by her was hers, and was wrongfully withheld from her. The effect of this amendment was neither to assert a cause of action wholly different from that set out in the original complaint nor to change the subject-matter of the action, and was allowable. Kron v. Smith, 96 N. C. 389, 2 S. E. Rep. 532. It is to be noted that S. V. Joyner, the receiver, who in this action is the representative of the infant heirs of B. S. Atkinson, did not object to this amendment. No exception was taken to the issues submitted to the jury. A careful examination of his honor's charge, as set out in the case, leads us to the conclusion that the law applicable to the matters thus at issue was fairly and clearly stated. There was certainly some evidence that the plaintiff had occupied by her tenants that part of the Bensboro tract on which she claimed to have cultivated "a five-horse crop" by the use of her own separate property. It matters not under what supposed right she occupied this portion of the land, for the purposes of this action, if in fact she did occupy it, and did grow a crop on it. Under the charge of the court and the verdict of the jury, the owners of the land (the heirs of B. S. Atkinson, represented by the receiver) got their rent, and are satisfied. The tenants by whose labor the five-horse crop was raised got their share, and they make no complaint. The appellant has no right to any part of the crop, except as assignee of a mortgage put thereon by J. M. King, plaintiff's husband. He had no better title than King had, and the verdict, founded in part on acts and declarations of the husband, has established the fact that the plaintiff was the true owner of the crop which in her amended complaint she claims. If, by her conduct, she had estopped herself from asserting title to this crop against Royster & Strudwick, King's mortgagees, or their assignees, it was incumbent on the defendant, by proper issues and proper prayer for instructions, to invoke the aid of that estoppel in defense of his rights. He pleaded it, and, as there is no exception to the charge in this respect, we assume that the trial was in this respect satisfactory to him. What we have said seems to cover all the exceptions taken to the charge, and the exceptions to the admission of evidence were not pressed before us. We find no error, and the judgment must be affirmed.

JETER v. BURGWIN et al.

PARTNERSHIP—AS AGAINST CREDITORS.

One who advances money to another to enable such other to carry out a specified contract for the manufacture of goods, with the understanding that the repayment of the loan is to be contingent on the profits, can be charged as partner by creditors of the manufacturer only as to the specific contract; and where he has not held himself out as a partner, a creditor of the manufacturer, whose debt was incurred after the termination of the contract, cannot hold the lender as a partner, though no notice of the dissolution of the quasi partnership was ever given.

Appeal from superior court, Vance county; George A. Shuford, Judge.

Action by W. L. Jeter against the Henderson Tobacco Company and W. H. S. Burgwyn to charge the defendant Burgwyn as a partner for a debt of the Henderson Tobacco Company. The court intimated that he would charge the jury in defendant's favor, and plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Cheek and H. T. Watkins, for appellant. J. H. Bridgers, for appellees.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The ruling of his honor, which is presented for review, does not involve a consideration of the question suggested in Fertilizer Co. v. Reams, 105 N. C. 283, 11 S. E. Rep. 467, and Cossack v. Burgwyn, 112 N. C. 304, 16 S. E. Rep. 900,—whether a loan to a partnership, to be paid out of the profits, does in itself, without any holding out, impose upon the lender a partnership liability to third persons. In Cossack's Case, after referring to the principle of the ancient English cases, that sharing in the profits was, with one or two exceptions, an absolute test of partnership, we stated that, even under the modern doctrine as declared by the house of lords in 1860 in Cox v. Hickman, 8 H. L. Cas. 268, (see Reams' Case, supra,) such sharing would at least make out a prima facie case as to the existence of that relationship. If, however, we should go further, and concede that any participation whatever in the profits would be conclusive evidence of partnership as to third persons, we would still be unable to perceive any force in the exception to the charge of the court. What constitutes a partnership is a question of law, (Jones v. Call, 93 N. C. 170,) and there is nothing in the various contracts between the Henderson Tobacco Company and the defendant Burgwyn, nor in their dealings with each other, that indicates an intention that Burgwyn was to become an actual partner in the said company. The plaintiff, therefore, in order to recover of Burgwyn, must show such circumstances as would constitute a partnership as to third persons, or, as it is sometimes termed in the text-books, a "quasi partnership." The Henderson Tobacco Company was, it seems, engaged in the manufacture and sale of tobacco, and had on the 20th of December, 1889, entered into a contract with one Blackwell to manufacture 300,000 pounds of certain brands of smoking tobacco during the next year, which the said Blackwell was to sell at a price which would net the company an estimated profit of $39,000. On the day above mentioned, Burgwyn and the company entered into an agreement reciting that the former had indorsed a note for the latter of $5,000, and that Burgwyn was to advance to the company during the succeeding 12 months an additional $5,000, to enable the company to carry out the Blackwell contract. It was agreed that the company was to secure Burgwyn to the amount of $10,000 by conveying to him all of their stock of leaf and manufactured tobacco, and their machinery, fixtures, etc., which conveyance was executed on the same day. In the aforesaid agreement it was further stipulated that the company should execute to Burgwyn a note for $5,000, which note was also executed on the same date. This note, it is conceded, was independent of the indorsement and advances just referred to, and was not secured by the conveyance of the property above mentioned. It was given in consideration of the indorsement and advances, and there was an apparent conflict in the testimony of Burgwyn and his statement on a previous trial in respect to the manner in which it was to be paid. The plaintiff contended that it was to be paid out of the profits of the Blackwell contract, and that its payment was entirely contingent upon such profits. The defendant Burgwyn insisted that the payment was not so contingent, but was an absolute engagement on the part of the company to pay at all events, and without reference to profits. Assuming the correctness of the plaintiff's view of the facts, and also his contention that such a view would constitute a quasi copartnership, yet it appears from the authorities that such a copartnership would relate only to the Blackwell contract. Lindley, in his work on Partnership, says: "If persons who are not partners agree to share the profits and loss, or the profits of one particular transaction or adventure, they become partners as to that transaction or adventure, but not as to anything else." Volume 1, p. 49. According to the contention of the plaintiff, the note was to be paid out of the profits arising from the Blackwell contract, and it is clear that if the said contract had terminated before the plaintiff's debt was contracted the defendant Burgwyn, not having held himself out as a partner, would not be liable as such. This would be true, although no notice of a dissolution of the particular quasi copartnership was given. Id. 213. There is no evidence that the said defendant ever so held himself out, or that plaintiff knew anything of the transaction in question. It must follow, therefore, that if the Blackwell contract terminated before the 7th of February, 1891, the date of the contract sued upon, the plaintiff cannot recover. His honor charged the jury that they must so find if they believed the testimony of Burgwyn and Dangerfield, which was explicit and uncontradicted on this point. In this there was no error. Nor was there error in his instruction that clauses Nos. 9 and 10 in the contract of April 29, 1890, and the contract of October 8, 1890, stating that Burgwyn's rights under former contracts should be continued, were no evidence that the contract with Blackwell had not terminated. The plaintiff, upon this charge, suffered a nonsuit, and appealed. For the reasons given we think the nonsuit must stand. Affirmed.

SYME v. RICHMOND & D. R. CO.

RAILROAD COMPANIES—INJURY TO PERSON ON TRACK.

A locomotive engineer, who sees a man on the track, going in the same direction as the train, is justified in assuming that he will step off, to avoid collision, when the danger signals are given; and the fact that a passing train on an adjoining track is making considerable noise does not render the engineer negligent in not attempting to stop his engine, since it is the duty of a person on the track to look, as well as listen.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; Brown, Judge.

Action by Andrew Syme, administrator, etc., of Thomas Roberson, deceased, against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, for the death of his intestate. At the close of the evidence, the court intimated that he would charge that plaintiff was not entitled to recover, whereupon plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit, and appealed. Affirmed.

The following is plaintiff's evidence as to how deceased was killed:

"T. A. Bowen: Live in the country. Work in Raleigh. I came in town by railroad track. Defendant's track is generally used as a walkway. I have been living where I now live six years. Great deal of walking done by public on defendant's track leading out of Raleigh to the west. The North Carolina Railroad track and the Raleigh & Augusta Air-Line track are eight or ten feet apart. Ties project about eighteen inches further. There is a ditch on side of track, and embankment runs up. Same on both sides. No pathway on either side of the tracks. The tracks of both roads are on one bed. Boylan's bridge spans both roads,—the North Carolina and the Raleigh & Augusta. The two tracks diverge, going east, after passing under the bridge. The deceased was killed forty or fifty yards west of the bridge. I saw the deceased when he was killed. The defendant's engine was coming from the North Carolina Railroad depot, going west. The tender was ahead, and engine backing. Roberson, the deceased, was going west. He had a bucket on his left arm. When Roberson was struck, there was a freight train on the Raleigh & Augusta track, passing along by the side of the deceased. I was fifty yards west of the deceased. I was coming to Raleigh, going east. Deceased was going west. The engine of the Raleigh & Augusta freight train was off against me, going west, when deceased was struck. Raleigh & Augusta train had fourteen or fifteen cars. Don't know exactly how many. I saw Roberson's face. It was towards me. He was walking briskly up the road towards me. The Raleigh & Augusta freight train was making considerable noise. When the engine and tender of defendant's struck deceased, it passed over him, and came nearly to a stop about thirty yards from deceased. You can't see the Raleigh & Augusta train from up the road until it comes under the bridge. When I first saw defendant's engine and tender, it was east of the bridge. From where engine and tender was when I first saw it, a man could see to where I was. The deceased was between me and the said engine. Don't think a person can see all the way to North Carolina Railroad depot from bridge. Distance from bridge to depot, 300 to 400 yards. A person on an engine on North Carolina road situated halfway between depot and said bridge can see to and under said bridge. It is possible to see a freight train from the Richmond & Danville depot from Hargett Street station to bridge. When I first saw Richmond & Danville engine and tender, it was thirty-five or forty yards from deceased, and had just got to bridge. From this point to where deceased was is open and straight, and Roberson could have been seen perfectly plain. The Raleigh & Augusta train was passing by deceased when Richmond & Danville engine struck deceased. The Raleigh & Augusta train had about half of it passed deceased. The freight train and engine and tender were running neck and neck. I waved my hand once or twice to deceased. He did not pay any at-attention to it. I don't know whether deceased stepped over from Raleigh & Augusta track or not. I heard the whistle of Richmond & Danville engine very plainly, and deceased was between me and engine. I motioned several times to deceased to get out of way, and he did not do so. There was plenty of room on the outside of Richmond & Danville or of North Carolina track for deceased to have stepped off. There was room on side of embankment and in the ditch, which was two feet deep. I stepped in ditch, and was not hurt. Engine passed me before it stopped. I was on same track as Roberson. If deceased had been on Raleigh & Augusta track, there was room on outside of that track for deceased to have stepped in, and saved himself. I heard whistle of engine of defendant blow twice, plainly. Engine had been slowed down before it struck deceased, because it stopped about thirty yards after it passed him, and after it passed me. Buck Howell was on same track, between me and Roberson. When engine blew, Howell also got off track, and so did I. Deceased did not. Both of us were further from Richmond & Danville or North Carolina engine than deceased. At the time Richmond & Danville engine blew, the Raleigh & Augusta engine was just about up in front of me. The train was passing Howell, and also deceased.

"George Davis: Live in the Fourth ward of Raleigh. Roberson was killed about 6:30 A. M. on October 9, 1891. I was ahead of him, going west on North Carolina track. I saw freight train on Raleigh & Augusta track. Was about 170 feet ahead of Roberson. Did not see deceased when he got on track, or when he was killed. I was going on up the road west. The Raleigh & Augusta train was going west. I heard engine on North Carolina track blow three times. It was then going west. I looked back, and saw nothing between me and the engine. I thought it was blowing for me to get off. I was right smart distance ahead of North Carolina engine. I am certain I saw no one between me and that engine. I stepped off on outside in ditch, and engine passed me. I got on track again, and looked back, and saw something on track. It was Thomas Roberson, dead. His whole body was between the rails. There was a hole in his head, and his foot cut off. His head was towards the east. The engine on the North Carolina Railroad did not stop. As it passed me, it was running fast,—thirty to thirty-five miles an hour. The shifting engine on the North Carolina track was going faster than Raleigh & Augusta freight train. When I started on the track, Thomas Roberson got on the track behind me, and I started in same direction that he did. From Boylan's bridge, and one hundred yards east of it, a person could see straight ahead to Cox avenue, nearly three-fourths of mile. There was room on outside of North Carolina track to get off in ditch, just as I did. When I heard engine blow on North Carolina track, the train on Raleigh & Augusta track was passing me, and the engine of that train had got beyond me going west. Cross-Examination: The freight was running pretty fast. Can't exactly say how fast it was running. About fifteen miles an hour. I met two men coming towards city, walking in ditch, one behind the other. They were thirty yards from bridge, west. The engine on the Raleigh & Augusta track was pulling fourteen cars, and was coming under bridge when I first saw it. It was exhausting very heavily. Did not see Richmond & Danville engine when I first saw Air-Line train. I looked back to see if Raleigh & Augusta train was on track I was on. I saw a man on the track behind me. I had got only a few steps before Raleigh & Augusta engine passed me. It was good daylight. Could see very plainly. The engine on North Carolina road was not far from the bridge, when I heard it blow. It had just passed under bridge going west, and then blew not far from bridge. The body of the deceased was lying about as far as from here to courthouse steps from bridge. This distance is about eight-five feet. The freight train on North Carolina or Richmond & Danville road came by the agricultural college about a half an hour after I got to work on building out there."

The defendant introduced the following evidence:

"A. F. Fowler: I am a shifting engineer on the Richmond & Danville Railroad. On October 9, 1891, when the man Roberson was killed, I had started out from depot for lantern lights on switch targets. I did not stop until I passed over deceased. At Boylan's bridge I first saw deceased. He was not on our track. He was coming from Raleigh & Augusta track, and got on ours. He was going west, and got on under bridge. As soon as I saw him get on track, I told the fireman to ring the bell. He did so. I blew whistle,—short, sharp blows,—the danger signal. As soon as I saw he did not notice signal, I reversed engine at once, at the risk of bursting out cylinder. I threw steam on the reverse to stop the quicker, and applied the brakes. When he first got on track, I did not stop engine, because I supposed he would obey signal and get off as I blew and rang bell. As soon as I saw he did not notice signal, I used every appliance to stop. The engine came nearly to a stop just after passing over body, after running about the length of the engine. After I saw I had passed over body, I went on, and got switch lights, and came back for body. I was going twelve miles per hour when I reversed. I got to body, and laid it one side, and sent for coroner. Cross-Examination: I am still employed by the Richmond & Danville Railroad. I was looking the way I was going, (witness showed how he was sitting, with face towards the side, and leaning back out of window, in which position he could readily see in the direction the engine was going,) and was sitting on my seat. My body was facing towards engine, and I looked out window, with head out, looking west,—the direction I was going,—and my hand on throttle. I don't know whether seat is higher than tender or not. I was about thirty yards from bridge when the engine of the Raleigh & Augusta train went under bridge. The deceased had just then stepped upon our track, and I then blew, and fireman rang bell. Our freight train from Greensboro was due at 6:45 or 6:47 A. M. I suppose I was thirty yards from deceased when I commenced blowing whistle. When I first saw deceased, he was about fifty yards off, coming from Raleigh & Augusta track, where it comes away from our track. The deceased could have seen my engine, and which way it was going, before he got on our track. He must have been about twenty yards from our track. It requires about twenty-five or thirty yards to stop my engine. I blew whistle as soon as he got on our track, and continued to blow. I had fifteen minutes to go and get switch lights, and get back, before our freight was due. This was plenty of time. Raleigh & Augusta train went on. I never did pass it. The body was about twenty-five yards from bridge when struck, I think. It was about thirty yards from bridge when we got hold of body. It was about twenty-five yards from bridge, east, when I first saw deceased, and blew and rang bell. I did not stop at first, but blew and rang bell. As soon as I saw deceased did not notice this, I had got nearer deceased, about twenty yards or so from him. Can't tell, exactly. Then I reversed engine and applied brakes. The engine passed nearly over the body before coming to a stop. I saw the man had been struck before I could stop. I started up to get lights, as ordered, before freight could get here, and I came back at once, and removed the body. If deceased had stopped under the bridge between the two tracks, there was plenty of room, and he would not have been hurt.

"Charles Hardie: I was the fireman on switch engine. Was putting in coal in the furnace when Fowler told me to ring the bell. I did so. Fowler reversed engine and put on steam to stop. He, before that, blew alarm whistle. I have been fireman now eighteen months. Our freight was due there at 6:45. I don't know how far west of bridge deceased was, when stricken. The body was twenty-five or thirty yards west of bridge, when found.

"Alex Henly: I was on engine that morning. Was sitting on fireman's box. When I first saw deceased, we were close on him. I was not looking before. I heard engineer shut off, and then I looked. I was sitting on fireman's box, and not looking west."

EVERY, J. Counsel for plaintiff did not contend that the intestate was deficient in any of his senses, or wanting in physical power or mental faculties; and, if they had, there would have been no evidence to support the contention. A priori, the engineer had no reason to think him other than a man possessed of all of the usual powers of mind and body, and was warranted in assuming that he would step off the track, and avoid a collision, until it was too late to save him. McAdoo v. Railroad Co., 105 N. C. 145, 11 S. E. Rep. 316; High v. Railroad Co., 112 N. C. 385, 17 S. E. Rep. 79. When a person is injured while walking on a railroad track by an engine that he might have seen by looking, the law, as a rule, imputes the injury to his own negligence. Meredith v. Railroad Co., 108 N. C. 616, 13 S. E. Rep. 137; Norwood v. Railroad Co., 111 N. C. 238, 16 S. E. Rep. 4. There being no testimony tending to bring this case within any exception to the general rule, we are of the opinion that there was no evidence of want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant, while, in any aspect of the case, the plaintiff's intestate was negligent in getting upon the track in front of the engine without looking, and exposing his person to injury, when he might have seen that it was approaching, and have avoided the collision by stepping off the track. We cannot yield to the ingenious suggestion of the able counsel for the plaintiff that the engineer must have seen the long freight train, and known the fact that the engine was "exhausting heavily," so as to render intestate so insensible to the approach of the other train as if he had been deaf, and that, therefore, the defendant's engineer was negligent in not attempting earlier to stop the engine. But it was the duty of the intestate to look as well as listen, under the circumstances, and he was negligent if he failed to use his eyes as well as his ears. McAdoo's Case, supra. On the other hand, the engineer was justified in assuming that intestate had looked, had notice of his approach, and would clear the track in ample time to save himself from harm. Even when a railroad company violates a statute or an ordinance by running at a given rate of speed in a town or city, negligence will not be presumed, in all cases. 2 Wood, Ry. Law, 1097, and note. But in our case there was no evidence of the existence of a town ordinance, nor was any statute forbidding such running cited by counsel; and no matter what the speed of the engine may have been, it did not appear that the accident occurred in a populous part of the city, or when there was at the time, or usually, such a number of persons using the track that an individual walking upon

It would not be able readily to see a moving train, or that all who used it as a foot-way could not secure their safety by stepping off of the track. On the contrary, the undisputed evidence is that the plaintiff's intestate had but to step to the ditch to place himself beyond the pale of danger, whether he was walking on the Raleigh & Augusta Railroad track, or that of the North Carolina Railroad. We think that the judgment should be affirmed.

LANE v. ROGERS.

WITNESS—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEASED.

In an action to recover money alleged to have been deposited with a deceased person, evidence by plaintiff that the deceased handed her a book containing memoranda of the sums deposited by her is evidence as to a transaction with the deceased, and is inadmissible, under Code, § 590.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; Brown, Judge.

Action by Mollie J. Lane against Candis Rogers, executrix, etc., of Andrew Jackson, deceased, and her husband, Luke Rogers, to recover $1,025, alleged to have been deposited by plaintiff with Andrew Jackson. There was a verdict and judgment in defendant's favor, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

It was admitted that Andrew Jackson died, leaving a will, and that Candis Rogers was the sole legatee and devisee under said will, and that she was appointed and qualified as executrix thereof, and that defendant Luke Rogers was the husband of the said Candis, and that she has children by him, the said Luke. On the trial the plaintiff introduced a memorandum book containing a statement of the sums alleged to have been deposited with the said Andrew Jackson by the plaintiff, amounting to $1,023, and purporting to have been signed by the said Jackson, and witnessed by C. H. Lane, now the husband of the plaintiff. Said C. H. Lane, being offered as a witness for the plaintiff, testified that on the morning of the day of his marriage to the plaintiff the said Jackson handed this book to plaintiff in his presence. The plaintiff, being sworn as a witness for herself, was asked, "State when and where you first saw the book now shown you," the book being the one about which C. H. Lane had just testified; and the object of the question, as stated by the plaintiff's counsel, was to show that she first saw the book in the possession of Andrew Jackson at the time he handed it to her, on the day of the marriage. The evidence was objected to under section 590 of the Code, and the objection was sustained, and the evidence excluded. Plaintiff excepted. The plaintiff further offered to show by C. H. Lane, recalled as a witness for her, that Luke Rogers had said to him that the plaintiff's claim was just, and ought to be paid. Upon objection this evidence was rejected, and the plaintiff again excepted.

Batchelor & Devereux and S. G. Ryan, for appellant. Battle & Mordecai, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The plaintiff was asked, "State when and where you first saw the book now shown you." The object of the question, as stated by plaintiff's counsel, was "to show that she first saw the book in the hands of defendant's intestate at the time he handed it to her on the day of the marriage." The intestate's "handing her the book" was a personal transaction between the plaintiff and the deceased, and the question being asked, as stated by her counsel, with a view of bringing out that as a part of her statement, it was properly ruled out, under section 590 of the Code. It is true it was competent to show by her that she saw the book in the hands of the intestate on the day of her marriage, (Gray v. Cooper, 65 N. C. 183; March v. Verble, 79 N. C. 19; McCall v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 598, 8 S. E. Rep. 225,) since that would not have been a transaction with the intestate. But the plaintiff's husband had testified that the book had been handed to the plaintiff by the intestate, and the object seems to have been to corroborate him by her testimony embracing that fact. If the object had been only to indicate the time, that could have been done by stating simply that she saw the book in the hands of the intestate on the day of the marriage. But, whatever the object may have been, we can only pass upon the inquiry as made. That the plaintiff did not properly restrict the inquiry, or amend it, so as to exclude the incompetent matter, was her own fault. The other exception is without merit, and was not relied on in this court. No error.

SIMMONS v. NORFOLK & B. STEAM-BOAT CO.

CORPORATIONS—DISSOLUTION—REMOVAL OF OFFICER FROM STATE—SUMMONS—RETURN.

1. In view of the fact that many statutes plainly contemplate that corporations chartered by the state shall keep their principal offices, and certainly some of their agencies, within the state, the failure of a domestic corporation to maintain its principal office within the state, as required by its articles of incorporation, and the withdrawal of all agencies from the state, is an abuse and misuse of its corporate franchise, within the meaning of Code, c. 16, § 694, authorizing a stockholder to institute proceedings for the dissolution of a corporation "for any abuse of its powers, to the injury of plaintiff or of the corporation."

2. Where a summons in a special proceeding is improperly made returnable to the superior court in term, it is proper for the judge to remand the proceedings with directions that the summons be amended so as to make it returnable before the clerk on a day certain.

Appeal from superior court, Martin county; G. H. Brown, Jr., Judge.

Action by Dennis Simmons against the Norfolk & Baltimore Steamboat Company for a dissolution of the defendant corporation, and the appointment of a receiver. From an order appointing a receiver, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Batchelor & Devereux and Jas. E. Moore, for appellant. Don. Gilliam, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. This proceeding is brought for the purpose of obtaining a decree of dissolution against the defendant company, and the most important question to be considered is whether the complaint sets forth facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the relief prayed for. The defendant was incorporated under the general act for the formation of corporations, (Code, c. 16,) and it is therein provided, among other things, that all corporations so created may be dissolved by "special proceedings" instituted by any corporator "for any abuse of its powers to the injury of the plaintiff or of the corporators, or of its creditors or debtors." Section 694. The articles of incorporation provide that the business of the defendant shall be the "transportation of produce and merchandise and all other kinds of freight and passengers to and from the various landings on the Roanoke river in North Carolina to and from the cities of Norfolk, in Virginia, and Baltimore, in Maryland, and to and from said cities to the said landings, and to and from all other points intermediate between said river and said cities; and its principal place of business shall be at Williamston," in this state. The plaintiff, who is one of the corporators, alleges that in 1887 the control and management of the defendant corporation passed into the hands of nonresident stockholders, "since which time the original aim and purpose of said corporation has been departed from, the value of the company's property greatly depreciated, the business fallen away, and its general affairs gradually, but steadily, grown worse." It is further alleged "that for more than a year now past the defendant company has altogether ceased to operate said ports, or any of them, within this state; that no single agency or place of business has been maintained within this state, and that the town of Williamston has been absolutely discontinued as the principal place of business of said company, as required by said article of incorporation." "It is a tacit condition of a grant to a corporation that the grantees shall act up to the end or design for which they are incorporated; and hence, through neglect or abuse of its franchises, a corporation may forfeit its charter as for condition broken, or for breach of trust. The duties assigned by an act of incorporation are conditions annexed to the grant of the franchises conferred, (Ang. & A. Corp. § 776,) and duties implied are equally obligatory with duties expressed, and their breach is visited by the same consequences." Attorney General v. Petersburg & R. R. Co., 6 Ired. 456; Field, Corp. 456, note. It has been held, without reference to any express provision of law or specific requirement of the charter, that it is the duty of a corporation to keep its principal place of business, its books and records, and its principal officers, within the state which incorporated it, to an extent necessary to the fullest jurisdiction and visitatorial power of the state and its courts, and the efficient exercise thereof in all proper cases which concern said corporation. State v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. Ry. Co., 45 Wis. 579. In commenting upon this decision, Mr. Morawetz (Priv. Corp. 361) says: "This doctrine is correct only provided the legislature has expressed the policy of the state by some special enactment, or by a general system of legislation regarding incorporated companies. There is no such rule at common law. It is always implied in the grant of a charter of incorporation, where there is no indication to the contrary, that the company shall have its central office or place of management in the state under whose laws it was organized. This, however, is merely a rule applicable to the construction of charters in determining the intention of the corporators and of the state, and is not an arbitrary rule of law." Accepting the principle as thus modified, and applying it to a corporation doing business, like the defendant, exclusively under a charter granted in this state, it would seem very clear that by the policy of our laws, as indicated by "a general system of legislation," the duty referred to is imposed upon the defendant. We have many statutes which plainly contemplate that such a corporation shall keep its principal place of business—certainly some of its agencies—within the limits of the state. Of such are sections 362 and 363 of the Code, relating to the attachment of shares of stock in corporations, and the interests and profits thereon, and authorizing the service of a certified copy of the warrant of attachment on "the president or other head of the association or corporation, or with the secretary, cashier, or managing agent thereof." Of such also are the provisions of section 694, Id., authorizing the dissolution of the corporation upon the return of an execution unsatisfied upon a judgment docketed in the superior court of the county "where it has its only or principal place of business." Reference may also be had to the visitatorial powers conferred upon the board of railroad commissioners, which, together with other provisions of the law, clearly show that a corporation of this character cannot entirely withdraw all of its officers and agencies from the state. The decision in State v. Milwaukee, L. S. & W. Ry. Co., supra, was based to some extent upon similar statutory provisions, and the general principle of that case has been here discussed for the purpose of showing that the express provision of the charter of the defendant, requiring its principal place of business to be at Williamston, in this state, may well be sustained by the general policy of our laws. The case is also direct authority that such a violation by a corporation of its charter is "an abuse and misuser of its corporate powers," and is within the spirit and meaning of our statute upon the subject. Without considering, then, the other causes assigned in the complaint, we are of the opinion that the persistent violation of the charter in withdrawing, as alleged, the principal place of business from Williamston, and all of its agencies from the state, would authorize the court to decree a dissolution of the defendant corporation. Attorney General v. Petersburg & R. R. Co., supra.

The summons in this proceeding was improperly made returnable to the superior court in term, and his honor remanded the proceeding, with directions that the summons be amended so as to make it returnable before the clerk on a day certain. This order, together with the other directions to the clerk, is fully sustained by the principle laid down in Epps v. Flowers, 101 N. C. 158, 7 S. E. Rep. 680. The judgment must be affirmed.

RAILROAD COMPANIES — ACCIDENT AT CROSSING — STATUTORY LIABILITY — PRACTICE IN CIVIL CASES — NONSUIT.

1. A motion for a nonsuit cannot be considered, where the grounds on which it is based involve the determination of a question of fact.

2. Injuries received at a railroad crossing by being thrown from a vehicle, on the frightening of the horse at an approaching train, are not caused "by collision with the engine and cars of a railroad corporation at a crossing," within Gen. St. § 1529, where there was no actual collision with either engine or cars.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Newberry county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by Samuel J. Kinard against the Columbia, Newberry & Laurens Railroad Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Lyles & Muller, for appellant. Johnstone & Cromer, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This was an action to recover damages for injuries sustained by reason of the alleged negligence of the defendant company. The allegations contained in the complaint are, substantially, as follows: That, on the day the disaster occurred, plaintiff was traveling in a buggy along the public highway which crosses the railroad a short distance below the town of Prosperity, and was on the roadbed, ready to cross the railroad, when a locomotive with a train of cars approached, which the officers and agents of defendant company negligently caused to approach the said crossing at great speed, and negligently and carelessly omitted, while approaching the said crossing, to give any signal by ringing the bell or sounding the whistle, by reason whereof the plaintiff was unaware of their approach, and that in consequence thereof the plaintiff, while attempting to avoid a collision, and to control the mule by which his buggy was drawn, was thrown from his buggy to the ground with such force as to break his collar bone. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon two grounds: (1) That there was no testimony tending to show "that this accident comes under the provisions of the act relating to that matter; * * * that the act was not intended to meet cases of simply frightening animals." (2) That "the testimony shows that the accident was caused by Mr. Kinard's own handling of the mule, rather than as resulting from the approach of the train." The motion was refused by the circuit judge upon the ground that the plaintiff "was there intending to cross," and after hearing the testimony of defendant, and that of the plaintiff in reply, the case was submitted to the jury, who found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff; and, judgment having been entered thereon, the defendant appeals, alleging error in the refusal of the motion for a nonsuit.

The plaintiff's testimony tended to show that he was traveling along the public highway, intending to cross the railroad track, at the crossing near which the disaster occurred, in a buggy drawn by a mule, but before he reached the crossing, and before he had got upon defendant's roadbed, he stopped to speak to a friend at a point some 15 or 20 feet from the railroad track, and while there, seeing the train approaching at a distance of some 50 yards or more, he attempted to turn his buggy, when the singletree or the traces broke, (the plaintiff saying the former, while his witness in the buggy with him said the latter,) whereby the mule was released, and the shafts of the buggy were run into a bank, and the plaintiff was thrown from the buggy, and received the injury complained of. There was also testimony tending to show that the signals required by section 1483, Gen. St.,—ringing the bell or blowing the whistle,—were not given by the approaching train; that it was not a regular, but an extra, train; and that plaintiff had no knowledge of its approach until it reached a point some 50 yards distant from the crossing,—too late, considering the speed at which it was running, for the plaintiff to venture to cross in front of it. There was also testimony tending to show that plaintiff's mule was frightened by the approaching train, and this was probably the reason why plaintiff attempted to turn his buggy in order to get further from the railroad track. From this outline of the leading facts of the case, gathered from the testimony, all of which may be found in the "case," the sole question for us to determine is whether there was error in refusing the motion for a nonsuit. It is quite clear that the second ground upon which the motion for a nonsuit was based cannot be sustained, as that would involve a determination of a question of fact,—whether the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence,—and it is too well settled by numerous cases that such a question cannot be considered on a motion for a nonsuit to need any citation of the cases.

The question is therefore narrowed down to the inquiry whether there was error in refusing to sustain the first ground of the motion, to wit, that there was no testimony tending to show that the action could be sustained under the provisions of section 1529 of the General Statutes, for the language used by the circuit judge in refusing the motion shows very clearly that he considered the question in that aspect solely. In speaking of the plaintiff he said: "If he had crossed over, and been on the other side, I am satisfied that the statute would not cover his case, but he was there intending to cross." From this it is apparent that his honor construed the section as giving a right of action to a person who was injured at a railroad crossing, if he was there intending to cross. We cannot concur in this construction, for the statute, in express terms, only gives the right of action therein provided for to a person injured, either in person or property, "by collision with the engine or cars of a railroad corporation at a crossing," and makes such corporation liable only for damages "caused by the collision." When, therefore, as in this case, there was not the slightest evidence of any collision at all, either with the engine or cars of the defendant company, it is very clear that the plaintiff had no cause of action under the statute, and that the circuit judge erred in ruling otherwise. Regarding, therefore, the action as an action under the statute, as it was manifestly considered by the circuit judge, the judgment below must be reversed for error in his ruling upon that subject. But as it may be possible that the plaintiff will be able to maintain his action, without reference to the statute, as an action for injuries sustained by reason of defendant's negligence at common law, a nonsuit will not now be granted, but the case will be remanded for a new trial, when the question which has not yet been considered by the circuit court, and cannot, therefore, be now considered by us, to wit, whether the plaintiff can maintain his action at common law, may be made. It will be observed that there is a great difference in the defense to an action under the statute and to an action at common law. In the former, in order to sustain the defense of contributory negligence, it would be necessary to show either gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff, or that he was acting in violation of law, while in the latter such a degree of negligence would not be required to be shown. It would therefore be manifestly unjust to allow a judgment recovered in an action erroneously treated as an action under the statute to stand, notwithstanding such erroneous ruling. It may be, in this very case, (though of course we intimate no opinion upon the subject,) that, while the defendant would not be able to show such gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff as would protect it in an action under the statute, yet a lesser degree of negligence, sufficient to protect it in an action at common law, might be shown. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

TILLINGHAST v. BOSTON & PORT ROYAL LUMBER CO. et al.

MOORE v. S. C. FORSAITH MACH. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 3, 1893.)

CONFLICT OF LAWS—CONTRACTS—PLACE OF MAKING AND PERFORMANCE—BREACH—WRITS—SERVICE OF PROCESS OUT OF STATE.

1. A promise to pay, contained in a telegram sent from Massachusetts to South Carolina, is a contract made in Massachusetts; and no cause of action can arise thereon in South Carolina, as the place of making is, presumably, the place of performance.

2. A contract cannot give rise to a cause of action until there has been some breach of such contract.

3. The courts of South Carolina cannot acquire jurisdiction of a foreign corporation, which has no property in the state, simply by personal service on such corporation in another state. Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, followed.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Hampton county; J. H. Hudson, Judge.

Actions by W. S. Tillinghast against the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company and the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, and by James W. Moore against the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, on contracts. On rehearing of a judgment which affirmed an order setting aside the service of summons and complaints, and dismissing the complaints. Reaffirmed.

The following is the letter referred to in the opinion: "Manchester, N. H., 5-5, '92. W. S. Tillinghast, Esq., Hampton C. H., S. C.—Dear Sir: In accordance with our promise by wire, we write you concerning the subject of your telegram to us on the 27th, reporting that Mr. Mitchell has returned, and given us a statement of affairs at Alameda. We are not clear from him as to your claims, nor is there anything in your message to make same clear; and we ask you to have the kindness to advise us fully what you do claim from this company, and what you claim from the Boston and Port Royal Lumber Company, as we are willing to pay anything that is just therein. But as we understood a reference was to be made, as agreed upon by both parties, as to what would be proper in the amount of fees, but this does not appear to materialize, will you have the kindness, therefore, to give us fully a statement of your claims, and they shall have prompt attention upon our part. Yours, respectfully, W. E. Drew, Agent."

C. J. C. Hutson, L. F. Youmans and James W. Moore, for appellants. Jeff. Warren and C. P. Sanders, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. These two cases were originally heard and considered together by this court during November term, 1892, and on the 21st of February, 1893, this court filed its opinion affirming the orders appealed from, as may be seen by reference to 17 S. E. Rep. 31. Subsequently, the appellants filed petitions for rehearing, which were granted, (17 S. E. Rep. 724, 725,) and the cases were reheard during the present term of this court. As we still think there are some differences in the facts of the two cases, notwithstanding the opinion of counsel to the contrary, we are of opinion that it will be better to consider the cases separately.

In the Tillinghast Case, it appears that on the 7th of May, 1892, the plaintiff issued a summons against the two companies named as defendants herein, calling on them to answer the complaint, dated—and, we suppose, filed—on the same day. In that complaint the plaintiff alleges that he is an attorney at law, practicing in the courts of this state; that as such he had previously instituted an action in the name of one W. R. Smith against the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company, alleging insolvency of said company, waste of assets, and asking that a receiver be appointed to take charge of said company's property for the protection of the rights of creditors and shareholders of said company; that he applied for and obtained an order for the appointment of a temporary receiver, who took charge of said assets; that, prior to the day agreed upon for the hearing of the motion for the appointment of a permanent receiver, all the parties interested, either as shareholders or creditors of said Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company, met in the city of Boston, and settled their conflicting claims and interests; that as soon as the said adjustment was made, all parties being desirous that the proceedings for the appointment of a receiver should be discontinued, a telegram was sent by the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, one of the defendants in the receiver case, that they would be responsible for the expenses of said case, which expenses included plaintiff's fee in said case, which expenses were to be ascertained by a reference; that on receipt of said telegram an agreement, in writing, was entered into between the plaintiff herein, the said W. R. Smith, plaintiff in the receiver case, and E. F. Warren, Esq., attorney for both of the defendants herein, a copy of which is exhibited as a part of the complaint; that, upon the delivery of said agreement to the plaintiff herein, he took an order discontinuing the receiver case, whereupon the assets of the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company were surrendered by the temporary receiver; that the plaintiff herein, without success, attempted to have the reference contemplated by said agreement, and finally one Hiram Mitchell, who came here as agent, and was the agent of the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, refused to have the reference, and left the county, returning to New Hampshire; that the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company is a foreign corporation, created under the laws of the state of Maine, and doing business and owns real and personal property in Hampton county, S. C.; that the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company is a foreign corporation, created under the laws of the state of New Hampshire, and owning an interest in the stock or property aforesaid of the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company in Hampton county aforesaid; that plaintiff is a resident of South Carolina, and the contract for the payment of his fee, as aforesaid, arose and was made in Hampton county, S. C.; and, after other allegations as to the value of his professional services, the plaintiff demanded judgment for the same. The following is a copy of the telegram referred to in the complaint: "Boston, Mass., April 9, 1892. To E. F. Warren, Hampton, S. C.: Discontinue all suits against lumber company, and get the matter out of court, and we will be responsible for cost, to be ascertained by reference, as the lumber company will resume business. S. C. Forsaith Machine Company. Manchester, N. H.,"—and the following is a copy of the agreement entered into after receipt of said telegram: "The state of South Carolina, county of Hampton. In common pleas. W. R. Smith, Plaintiff, vs. The Boston & Port Royal Lumber Co. Whereas, all parties interested in above case have agreed to a settlement thereof; and whereas, the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, of Manchester, N. H., has agreed to pay W. S. Tillinghast, plaintiff's attorney, his fee herein, (it being conceded by all parties hereto that such fee is to be paid, under the law, out of the general assets of the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company,) such fee to be ascertained by a reference; and whereas, it is agreed that the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company will protect W. R. Smith in his interest as the same may appear: In consideration of the foregoing, the above-entitled cause is to be withdrawn. It is further agreed that said reference to ascertain the amounts of said fees and costs will be held within next week, before —, if said fees and costs cannot be adjusted without such reference. [Signed] W. S. Tillinghast, Plaintiff's Attorney. E. F. Warren, Defendant's Attorney. W. R. Smith." On the 5th of July, 1892, upon the usual affidavit of the plaintiff, an order of publication was granted by the clerk of the court of common pleas for Hampton county, S. C., requiring publication to be made in the Manchester Daily Mirror, a newspaper published in the city of Manchester, state of New Hampshire, once a week for six successive weeks, and that a copy of the summons and complaint be forthwith deposited in the post office in Hampton, addressed to the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, Manchester, N. H. Such communication appears to have been sent by registered letter on the 8th of July, 1892, but it does not appear that any publication was ever made; the plaintiff relying upon service of the defendant company in New Hampshire in lieu thereof, as appears by the affidavit (a copy of which is set out in the "case") of one Daniel T. Healey, sheriff of the county in which the city of Manchester is located, made before one Thomas D. Luce, styling himself "Clerk Supreme Court," of said county, and certified to by him under his "hand and official seal," though no copy of such seal is affixed. It may be as well to state here that the action was dismissed as to the Boston & Port Royal Lumber Company upon the ground that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and, there being no appeal from the order entered to that fact, the case should now be considered as an action against the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company alone. Upon the papers above set forth and referred to, a motion was made before his honor, Judge Hudson, to set aside service of summons and complaint on the said defendant, made at their place of business in the city of Manchester, state of New Hampshire, and to dismiss the complaint of plaintiff for want of jurisdiction, whereupon the following order was granted: "On hearing the pleadings in above-stated case, and on motion of Jeff. Warren, attorney for the S. C. Forsaith Company, defendant, to set aside service of summons and complaint on the said defendant, made at their place of business in the city of Manchester, state of New Hampshire, and to dismiss the complaint of plaintiff for want of jurisdiction, counsel having been heard, it appearing to the satisfaction of this court that the defendant, S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, are a foreign corporation, and nonresidents of this state; that they have no property within the limits of this state, are represented by no agent, and have no place of business therein; that the cause of action, to wit, the breach of the contract, did not arise within the limits of this state; and that service of summons and complaint was made in the city of Manchester, state of New Hampshire,—ordered, that the complaint of plaintiff be dismissed, this court having no jurisdiction, on the grounds above set forth." Subsequently, the judge filed a paper setting forth more fully his reasons, a copy of which may be found in the former report of this case in 17 S. E. Rep. 31, and which, therefore, need not be set out here. From this order, plaintiff appeals upon the three grounds set out in the record, which make, substantially, three questions: (1) Was there error in holding that the cause of action did not arise in this state? (2) Was there error in holding that the breach of the contract constituted the cause of action? (3) Was there error in holding that, even if the cause of action arose in this state, the courts of this state could not take jurisdiction of an action in personam, and render a personal judgment against a party served with the summons outside of the limits of this state?

To determine the first question, two inquiries present themselves: First, when was the contract made? Second, where was it to be performed? These inquiries involve mixed questions of law and fact; and, so far as the latter are concerned, the finding of the circuit judge is conclusive, in a case of this kind. Hester v. Fertilizer Co., 33 S. C. 609, 12 S. E. Rep. 563. But the rule of law is that, "In the absence of anything indicating the contrary, the place of the making of a contract is presumably that of its performance," as was said by Mr. Justice McGowan in Curnow v. Insurance Co., (S. C.) 16 S. E. Rep. 133, quoting with approval from Bish. Cont. § 1391; and, as was held in Rodgers v. Association, 17 S. C. 410, the cause of action on a contract arises at the place where it is to be performed. Where, then, was the contract made, upon which the plaintiff bases his action, if, indeed, there was any such contract?—a point which is not now before us, and upon which we do not desire to be regarded as even intimating any opinion. It does not appear that the plaintiff ever before had any professional connection with the S. C. Forsaith Machine Company, and, if made at all, it must be traceable to the telegram copied above; and that was sent from Boston, Mass. We cannot regard the written agreement between Tillinghast, Warren, and Smith, set out above, as any evidence of any contract on the part of the defendant company to pay anything. The fact that Mr. Warren was attorney for that company in a litigation then pending could not invest him with authority to bind his client to pay money, without some authority other than that arising from his professional relations; and, certainly, the terms of the telegram conferred no authority to enter into such agreement. Indeed, the terms of that paper do not show that Mr. Warren undertook to bind his client to pay any sum of money whatever. On the contrary, the agreement contained nothing more than a recital of the fact that the defendant company had agreed to pay the fee of Mr. Tillinghast; and whether that recital was strictly correct or not is not a question now to be considered. If, therefore, there was any agreement on the part of the defendant company to pay the plaintiff's fee, it must be found in the telegram above referred to; and, if it contains any promise to that effect, such promise was not made in this state, but in Boston, and, under the rule above referred to, must be there performed, as it is quite clear that there is nothing in the telegram indicating the contrary. Appellant, in his argument, seems to rely somewhat upon a letter printed in the "case," from the agent of the defendant company to Mr. Tillinghast, as tending to show that defendant acquiesced in the arrangement for the payment of plaintiff's fee. But, as we did not consider that the terms of that letter indicated any such acquiescence, we did not deem it important to set out that letter, in making our statement of the case. Still, we would be glad to have the letter incorporated in the report of the case, in deference to the views of its importance by appellant's counsel. But even if that letter contained a positive promise to pay the fee, or a direct admission of defendant's liability, such promise, whether express or implied, was not made in this state, but in the state of New Hampshire; and hence, under the rule above stated, the cause of action could not be regarded as arising in this state, as there is nothing in the letter indicating that such supposed promise was to be performed elsewhere.

As to the second question presented by the grounds of appeal, we deem it only necessary to say that we cannot understand how any contract can give rise to a cause of action until there has been some breach of such contract. The mere fact that a person has entered into a contract with another can give no cause of action, and none can arise until there is some breach of such contract, which, therefore, must be regarded as the cause of action. The contract may give a party the right to demand its performance according to its terms, but there is no delict, and no cause of action, until the other party refuses or neglects to perform some duty required of him by the terms of the contract. We do not think, therefore, that there was any error on the part of the circuit judge in holding that the breach of the contract constitutes the cause of action.

The third question presented by the grounds of appeal is more difficult, and is much more important than either of the other questions. The Code provides, in section 143, that "civil actions in the courts of record of this state shall be commenced by service of a summons," and in subsequent sections (155 and 156) proceeds to prescribe how such service shall be made. In section 155 the provision is that, if the action be against a corporation, it must be by delivery of a copy of the summons to certain officers or agents of the corporation, "but such service can be made in respect to a foreign corporation only when it has property within this state, or the cause of action arose therein, or where such service shall be made within this state personally upon the president, cashier, treasurer, attorney or secretary thereof," followed by a special provision as to certain specified corporations, which have no application to the present case, as the defendant here is not one of the corporations specified. In section 156, provision is made for the service of the summons by publication in certain specified cases, the only one of which, applicable here, is couched in the following language: "Where the defendant is a foreign corporation, has property within the state, or the cause of action arose therein." That section contains this further provision: "Where publication is ordered, personal service of the summons out of the state is equivalent to publication," etc. Section 158 provides that in the cases mentioned in section 156 the service of the summons shall be deemed complete at the expiration of the time prescribed by the order for publication. Section 159 provides how proof of the service of the summons shall be made, and contains this language: "When the service is made out of the state, after order of publication, the affidavit of the person making the service shall be made before the clerk of any court of record in the state or district in which such service shall be made, who shall certify the same under his official seal,"—which was afterwards amended by the act of 1884 (18 St. 745) so as to include other officers besides such clerk. Section 160 provides that "from the time of the service of the summons in a civil action, or the allowance of a provisional remedy, the court is deemed to have acquired jurisdiction."

It must be admitted that, if we look alone to the provisions of the several sections of the Code above referred to, there is strong ground for the position taken by appellant,—that, if the cause of action arose in this state, the court had acquired jurisdiction of the defendant corporation, for in view of the findings of Judge Hudson that the defendant was a foreign corporation, having no property within this state; that it was duly served with a copy of the summons in the state of New Hampshire, after order of publication had been made,—we must take the facts so found, and there is no room for the objection, taken in the argument, to the proof of service as lacking the official seal of the clerk, as no such exception was taken below. So that the naked question now presented is that, even assuming that the cause of action in this case arose in this state, whether the courts of this state could acquire jurisdiction of this foreign corporation, which had no property in this state, through which it might have been reached by a proceeding in rem, at least so far as such property was concerned, simply by personal service on such corporation in another state. This question, as it seems to us, has been conclusively settled in the negative by the highest authority in the case of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714. In that case, Neff, being a nonresident of the state of Oregon, but owning property therein,—the land in question,—was sued on a money demand, in which action the state court of Oregon undertook to acquire jurisdiction of the person of Neff by publication under a statute of that state practically identical with our Code in this respect, and rendered judgment against him for the amount of such demand, and under the execution issued to enforce such judgment the land was sold by the sheriff, and bought by Pennoyer. Subsequently, an action was brought by Neff against Pennoyer to recover possession of the land in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Oregon, and carried thence by writ of error to the supreme court of the United States. The case turned upon the validity of the sale by the sheriff, or, rather, the validity of the judgment under which such sale was made; and the court held that the state court of Oregon could not acquire jurisdiction of the person of a nonresident defendant in a personal action simply by service by publication, and hence that the judgment was a nullity. As is said by Mr. Justice Field in delivering the opinion of the court, one of the well-established principles of public law respecting the jurisdiction of an independent state over persons and property is "that no state can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over persons or property without its territory. Story, Conf. Law, c. 2; Wheat. Int. Law, pt. 2, c. 2. The several states are of equal dignity and authority, and the independence of one implies the exclusion of power from all others; and so it is laid down by jurists, as an elementary principle, that the laws of one state have no operation outside of its territory, except so far as is allowed by comity, and that no tribunal established by it can extend its process beyond that territory, so as to subject either persons or property to its decisions." This doctrine does not deny or interfere with the right of a state to acquire jurisdiction over the property of a nonresident, located or found within such state, by a proceeding in rem,—for example, by attachment, or some proceeding in the nature of a proceeding in rem provided for by the laws of such state; but under such a proceeding no personal judgment can be rendered against the nonresident, and the judgment can only affect him so far as his property found in the state is concerned. See Stanley v. Stanley, 35 S. C. 94, 14 S. E. Rep. 675. The same doctrine had been previously laid down in Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. at pages 367, 368, where it is said: "Even the court of king's bench in England, though a court of general jurisdiction, never imagined that it could serve process in Scotland, Ireland, or the colonies, to compel an appearance, or justify a judgment against persons residing therein at the time of the commencement of the suit." The case of Pennoyer v. Neff, has not only been recognized and followed in numerous subsequent cases, but, so far as we are informed, has never been questioned by any tribunal. Even the learned judge (Mr. Justice Hunt) who dissented in that case did not question the doctrine for which we have cited the case, but based his dissent upon the sole ground that, inasmuch as Neff owned land within the state of Oregon at the time the action was commenced in which the judgment in question was recovered, it could be subjected to such judgment, even though no proceeding by attachment had been instituted. It is true that in that case the defendant was a natural person, and not, as here, a corporation, and that the service there was by publication, and not, as here, by personal service outside of the limits of the state. But neither of these circumstances can make any substantial difference between that case and this, for in the case of St. Clair v. Cox, 106 U. S. 350, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354, the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff was applied to a case of a foreign corporation, and it is there said: "The doctrine of that case applies, in all its force, to personal judgments of state courts against foreign corporations." And we are unable to discover any reason why it should be otherwise. See, also, Railway Co. v. Pinkney, 149 U. S. 194, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 859, where the same doctrine was applied in the case of a foreign corporation.

The other point of difference amounts to nothing, for the statute of Oregon, like our statute, expressly declares, "Where publication is ordered personal service of the summons out of the state is equivalent to publication and deposit in the post-office," thus putting the two modes of service precisely upon the same footing. Besides, in the case of Sugg v. Thornton, 132 U. S. 524, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 163, where the doctrine of Pennoyer v. Neff was applied, the case shows that the party who objected to the jurisdiction of the Texas court on the ground that there had been no legal service upon him was actually served in Wyoming Territory. It is apparent from what is said in other cases that the supreme court of the United States recognize no difference in the two modes of service. so far as the question we are considering is concerned, for in Machine Co. v. Radcliffe, 137 U. S. at pages 294, 295, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. at page 94, it is said, upon the authority of Pennoyer v. Neff, and other cases there cited, "that a personal judgment is without validity, if rendered by a state court in an action upon a money demand against a nonresident of the state, upon whom no personal service of process, within the state, was made, and who did not appear." And in Wilson v. Seligman, 144 U. S. at pages 44, 45, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. at page 542, the following passages from the opinion in Pennoyer v. Neff are quoted with approval: "Every state possesses exclusive jurisdiction and sovereignty over persons and property within its territory. * * * No state can exercise direct jurisdiction and authority over persons or property without its territory. * * * It is in virtue of the state's jurisdiction over the property of the nonresident, situated within its limits, that its tribunals can inquire into that nonresident's obligations to its own citizens, and the inquiry can then be carried only to the extent necessary to control the disposition of the property. * * * Where the entire object of the action is to determine the personal rights and obligations of the defendants,—that is, where the suit is merely in personam,—constructive service in this form upon a nonresident is ineffectual for any purpose. Process from the tribunals of one state cannot run into another state, and summon parties there domiciled to leave its territory, and respond to proceedings against them. * * * Process sent to him out of the state, and process published within it, are equally unavailing in proceedings to establish his personal liability. * * * A judgment which can be treated, in any state of this Union, as contrary to the first principles of justice, and as an absolute nullity, because rendered without any jurisdiction of the tribunal over the party, is not entitled to any respect in the state where rendered. * * * To give such proceedings any validity, there must be a tribunal competent, by its constitution,—that is, by the law of its creation,—to pass upon the subject-matter of the suit; and, if that involves merely a determination of the personal liability of the defendant, he must be brought within its jurisdiction by service of process within the state, or his voluntary appearance."

These being the well-settled principles applicable to a case like the one now under consideration, established by the supreme court of the United States,—a tribunal which is invested with final jurisdiction in controversies between citizens of different states,—it seems to us that we are bound, if practicable, to put such a construction upon the provisions of our Code, above referred to, as will bring it into conformity with such principles. This, we think, can be done by construing the above-mentioned provisions of our Code as applying only to cases in which a warrant of attachment has been issued, or to some other proceeding in rem, or in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and not to cases of mere personal actions, in which only a personal judgment can be obtained, for it must be remembered that an action cannot now, as formerly, be commenced by a writ of foreign attachment, but that now, under the Code, an attachment is merely a provisional remedy in aid of an action; and hence, to make it available, an action must be commenced in regular form, and judgment therein must be recovered before the attachment can yield the fruits which it is designed to produce. We are therefore compelled to construe the provisions of the Code, above referred to, providing for the mode of making a nonresident a party to an action, as applying only to such actions as may be regarded as proceedings in rem, and not applying to merely personal actions, in which only a personal judgment is sought or can be obtained. This being a purely personal action, in which no warrant of attachment has been or could be obtained, inasmuch as the defendant has no property within this state, we think that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the defendant corporation, by service of the summons out of the state, and hence there was no error on the part of the circuit judge in dismissing the complaint for want of jurisdiction.

The second case mentioned in the title of this opinion—that of Mr. Moore—differs in at least one very material respect from the case just considered. Here the undisputed evidence is that the contract which constitutes the basis of plaintiff's action was made in this state by a duly-authorized agent of the defendant corporation, and subsequently ratified by the general agent of said corporation; and, as there is nothing even tending to show that such contract was to be performed elsewhere, it must, under the rule announced in Tillinghast's Case, be regarded as a contract made and to be performed in this state, and hence that the cause of action arose in this state. If this were all, then a different conclusion from that reached in the case first considered would follow. But, under the views which we have taken of the third question presented by the appeal of Mr. Tillinghast, we are compelled to conclude that the court never acquired jurisdiction of the defendant corporation by a simple service of the summons in the state of New Hampshire, for in this case, as in the former, there was no warrant of attachment obtained, and none could have been, by reason of the undisputed fact that defendant, though a foreign corporation, had no property within the limits of this state. There was therefore no error on the part of the circuit judge in dismissing the complaint in this case for want of jurisdiction. For the reasons hereinbefore stated, we must adhere to the judgment rendered at the former hearing. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court in each of the cases stated in the title of this opinion be reaffirmed.

MARTIN v. SUBER.

ACTION ON NOTE — ADMISSION OF EXECUTION — RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE — CONTRACTS OF MARRIED WOMEN.

1. In an action on a note, defendant averred in her answer that she "did sign a note similar to the one in the complaint, and that she supposes that said note is correctly exhibited in the complaint;" that under certain promises she signed a note for her husband's debts, "the same being the note herein sued on," and that at the time of the signing of "said note" she was a married woman. Held, that there were such admissions of the execution of the note as to give defendant the right to open and close.

2. The mere actions and conduct of an alleged agent, not acquiesced in by the alleged principal, are not sufficient to establish the agency.

3. A note is not within the purview of Act Dec. 24, 1887, providing that all conveyances, mortgages, and like instruments of writing, affecting her separate estate, executed by a married woman, shall be effectual to convey or charge such separate estate whenever the intention so to do is declared therein.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Newberry county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by James N. Martin against Texanna Suber. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The charge delivered by the circuit judge was as follows:

"Mr. Foreman and Gentlemen: I come to the performance of my part of the duty in this case with a great deal of hesitation. I will, however, endeavor to give you, as I understand it, the law applicable to the case, with the hope that you may be able to find the facts from the testimony as you have heard it from the witnesses, and come to a correct and just conclusion in this case. This action is brought by the plaintiff to recover a certain sum of money alleged to be due to him by the defendant on a promissory note bearing date the 27th of January, 1888, which reads as follows: '$665.92. One day after date I promise to pay to the order of J. N. Martin six hundred and sixty-five and 92-100 dollars, for value received, with interest from date. [Signed] Texanna Suber.' The defendant admits the execution of the note, but denies in her answer that she is liable to the plaintiff thereon. She alleges that she was a married woman at the time the debt was contracted for which the note was given; that the debt was contracted by her husband, and that she was urged to give her note in payment of the account of her husband, and signed the same under certain conditions, which you have heard read in her answer. The plaintiff replies to the allegations set out in the answer that the consideration of said promissory note was for the benefit of the separate estate of the defendant. This is a brief statement of the pleadings and the issues raised thereby. You are to deal with, and are the sole judges of, the facts. I cannot even intimate an opinion as to them. I can only give you the law applicable to the case, as I understand it, and leave you to find the facts and apply the law to the facts as you may find them from the evidence.

"In this case the execution of the note sued on is admitted. On this point, therefore, you will have no difficulty. There is, however, some difficulty as to the law of the case, and I confess that I have some doubts as to the principles of the law by which you should be governed in deciding the issues raised. But, be that as it may, you are to take the law from the court, and if I should err there is a tribunal specially provided to correct my errors. Under the pleadings in this case it seems to me that you must necessarily go back in your deliberations to the contract which is claimed to be the consideration of the note set out in the complaint. If the supplies furnished by the plaintiff in 1886 were furnished to the defendant for the benefit of her separate estate, and were used and expended by her in making the crops upon her plantation during the year 1886, I am of opinion that she could, even in 1888, have given a promissory note in settlement of the account for supplies, which would be binding upon her. This being the case, certain important questions are presented for your consideration. Were the supplies advanced to the defendant by the plaintiff, and for the benefit of her separate estate? Or were they advanced to her husband, on his own credit, and for his own benefit, and used by him in making his own separate crops, in which his wife had no interest, and from which her separate estate derived no benefit? Or were the advances made to the defendant, and for the benefit of her separate estate, through her husband as her agent? A husband may act as the agent of his wife in obtaining supplies for carrying on her farming operations on her separate estate; but the authority must be shown. Does the evidence satisfy you that in obtaining the supplies in 1886 the husband of Mrs. Suber was acting as her agent, and with her authority? The mere declarations of the husband will not be enough to establish such agency. You must take all the testimony bearing upon this issue, and answer the question. The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff on this issue, and he must prove the agency to your satisfaction. Now, if the testimony satisfies you that the supplies were advanced to Mrs. Suber directly or through her husband as her authorized agent, and that these supplies were for the benefit of her separate estate, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover the amount due on the note, with interest from its date. If, on the other hand, you are satisfied from the evidence that the supplies were advanced to the husband, to be used in making his own crops planted that year, in which his wife had no interest, and from which she was to derive no benefit, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover.

"Again, if the supplies were advanced to the husband, and in 1888 Mrs. Suber gave her note to the plaintiff to secure the debt of her husband, her liability on the note would depend upon the construction of the act of 1887. Now, this act reads as follows: 'All conveyances, mortgages and like formal instruments of writing, affecting her separate estate, executed by a married woman, shall be effectual to convey or charge her separate estate whenever the intention so to convey or charge such separate estate is declared in such conveyances, mortgages or other instruments of writing.' Now, what instruments of writing affecting a married woman's separate estate shall be effectual to charge the same? The act says, 'All mortgages and like formal instruments of writing.' When shall such instruments of writing be effectual to charge the separate estate of a married woman? The act says, 'Whenever the intention so to charge her separate estate is declared in the mortgage or other instrument of writing.' Is a promissory note a like formal instrument of writing with a mortgage? There are certain formalities attending the execution of mortgages, such as signing, witnessing, and delivery, and, in cases of mortgages of real estate, sealing. The act says 'all mortgages;' this includes chattel mortgages. The same formalities attend the execution of a promissory note as attend the execution of a chattel mortgage. Both require to be signed and delivered. It is true that a chattel mortgage should be witnessed, if it is to be recorded; yet witnessing is not essential to its due execution. It may, therefore, be concluded that a promissory note is a like formal instrument of writing with a chattel mortgage. But it is not every like formal instrument in writing that will be effectual to charge the separate estate of a married woman under the act. It is only those like formal instruments which affect her separate estate; that is, those instruments which act upon her separate estate,—that is, create a lien or charge upon it which incumber it. Now, a promissory note is not such instrument of writing. But, if we admit that a promissory note is one of the like formal instruments in writing included in the act, this cannot help the plaintiff, because the act says in plain terms such instrument in writing shall be effectual to charge her separate estate whenever the intention so to charge such separate estate is declared in the instrument in writing. This being the case, a mortgage—one of the instruments named in the act—would not be effectual to charge the separate estate of a married woman if the intention so to charge is not declared in the mortgage. It will not do to say that the fact that a married woman executes a mortgage of her separate estate is a sufficient declaration of her intention to create a charge upon it. In interpreting statutes the rule is that they must be so construed as that every word and clause shall have effect. If the mere execution of the mortgage was a sufficient declaration of the intention of a married woman to create a charge upon her separate estate, then these words of the act would be meaningless and nugatory. There would be no necessity for them. And it will be borne in mind that the act says 'whenever'—that is, at whatever time—the intention to charge is declared in and not by the mortgage or like formal instrument of writing. The provision was in the nature of a condition. It was intended to put the woman on her guard, to call specially to her attention the nature of the act she was about to perform, and to impress her with its solemnity. It was for her protection. In order to create a charge upon her separate estate the act must be strictly followed. The power to charge her separate estate can only be exercised by complying strictly with the provisions of the statute. If this is done, a married woman, under the act of 1887, may charge her separate estate for the payment, not only of her own debt, but for the debt of her husband.

"So, then, gentlemen, the first question for your consideration is to ascertain, as I have previously said, whether or not these supplies were advanced directly to Mrs. Suber, and for the benefit of her separate estate; and, if you come to the conclusion that they were, then, as I have already said, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover. If you come to the conclusion, however, that they were not so advanced, but that they were advanced to the husband for his benefit and to carry on his farming operations, and were expended in the cultivation of his crops, and his wife had no interest in them, and derived no benefit from them, the plaintiff could not recover; and even in the event that they were advanced to the husband, and the defendant afterwards gave her note for it, I charge you that under this note the plaintiff could not recover, because the interpretation which I have given you of the statute of 1887, as I understand it, requires that it must be such an instrument as would affect the separate estate of a married woman, and I have already charged you that a promissory note is not such an instrument; and, even were it such an instrument, this note could not create a charge upon her separate estate, because the declaration required by the act is not contained in the note. I have further charged you with reference to the agency, and you will remember the law which I have given you in regard to the husband's acting as the agent of his wife. There was something said in this case by one of the witnesses, Mrs. Suber herself, that there were thirty or forty dollars of this note that were for supplies that were advanced to her and for the benefit of her estate, and which she got the benefit of, and which her counsel said she was willing to pay. It is for you to ascertain from the testimony, if you can arrive at it, what was the amount of this sum, and if you come to the conclusion that it went to her benefit, and the testimony is satisfactory to you on this point, you would be warranted in finding that much of the note for the plaintiff, but I leave that entirely with you; you must ascertain that fact from the testimony which you have heard. Is there anything further that you would have charged, gentlemen? (To counsel.) Mr. Carlisle: Nothing, except that the actions and conduct of the husband may go towards establishing the agency. The Court: I have told them they must take all the testimony they have heard bearing upon the subject of agency, and determine that question. The husband's mere declarations do not establish agency. Mr. Johnstone: We are ready to pay this thirty or forty dollars, but contend that it cannot be recovered under this note. The Court: A paper or lien was put in showing that these advances were made by J. N. Martin & Company, and the note shows that it was made to J. N. Martin. If you come to the conclusion that this was a new contract altogether, and had no connection whatever with these supplies, then I have charged you that the plaintiff could not recover under this note. So, gentlemen, if you come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case, you will find for the plaintiff the amount of the note, with interest from date at seven per cent., writing out the amount in words, and not in figures. If you come to the conclusion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover under the charge which I have given you, the form of your verdict would be simply, 'We find for defendant.' "

M. A. Carlisle, for appellant. Johnstone & Cromer, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. This was an action to recover a specific sum of money which the defendant had promised to pay to the plaintiff by her promissory note. The first allegation in the complaint, and the only one which it is deemed necessary to notice, is in the following words: "That the defendant is indebted to plaintiff in the sum of six hundred and sixty-five dollars and ninety-two cents, with interest from the 27th day of January, A. D. 1888, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, which said sum of money the defendant, by her promissory note, bearing date the 27th day of January, A. D. 1888, undertook and promised to pay to plaintiff,—a copy of which note is as follows, to wit: '$665.92. Jan. 27, 1888. One day after date I promise to pay to the order of J. N. Martin six hundred and sixty-five 92—100 dollars, for value received, with interest from date. Texanna Suber.'" The defendant answered, saying: "(1) That she emphatically denies that she is or was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of six hundred and sixty-five dollars and ninety-two cents, with interest from the 27th day of January, 1888, as stated in the complaint, or in any sum whatever. (2) That she admits that she did sign a note similar to the one mentioned in the complaint, and that she supposes that said note is correctly exhibited in the complaint; but she denies that said note represents any debt of hers, or that it is in any sense binding upon her. (3) That she alleges that the plaintiff herein had a claim or account against Mr. J. Benson Suber, of the county and state aforesaid, and urged her to give her note for or assume the payment of the said claim or account, at the same time, and as an inducement to her to accede to his request, promising her that she should pay the same when it suited her convenience, and at no other time, and distinctly promising her that she should not be pressed in the payment thereof. That, under these promises, she signed a note for said indebtedness of the said J. Benson Suber, the same being the note herein sued on. That if said note is to be held binding upon her, she demands that it be reformed by this court so as to conform to the real contract by her, if any legal contract she made with the plaintiff." In the fourth paragraph of the answer the defendant alleges "that at the time of the signing of said note, and at the present time, she was and is a married woman," and had no legal capacity to make any contract such as that evidenced by said note. In the fifth paragraph she alleges that she has been damaged to an amount stated by the conduct of the plaintiff in inveigling her into the signing of the said note, and by failing to incorporate therein the terms and conditions upon which she so signed, and by his failing to observe said terms, for which amount she demands judgment against the plaintiff. The plaintiff replied, denying the material allegations contained in defendant's answer upon which she rests her defense.

At the trial defendant's counsel stated "that, the execution of the note being admitted," the defendant had the right to open and reply, and the court so ruled, to which exception was duly taken by plaintiff's counsel. The trial proceeded accordingly, and, after a charge by the circuit judge, a copy of which should be inserted in the report of this case, the jury found a verdict for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered thereon, upon the following grounds, alleging error on the part of the circuit judge in his ruling and in his charge in the following particulars: "(1) In that he held that the defendant had the right to open and reply in this action, and that the burden of proof was upon the defendant. (2) In that he charged the jury that the mere declarations of the husband were not enough to establish agency for the wife in this action, and that the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff on this issue, and that plaintiff must establish the agency to the satisfaction of the jury. (3) In that he charged the jury that, even in the event that the supplies were advanced to the husband, and the defendant afterwards gave her note for them, the plaintiff could not recover on this note, as the statute of 1887 requires that it must be such an instrument as would affect the separate estate of a married woman, and a promissory note is not such an instrument; and, even if it were, this note could not create a charge upon her separate estate, because the declaration required by the act is not contained in the note. (4) In that he refused or neglected to charge the request of the plaintiff that the actions and conduct of the plaintiff may go towards establishing the agency."

As to the first ground of appeal it is clear that there is no ground for the alleged error there complained of. Since the case of Addison v. Duncan, 35 S. C. 165, 14 S. E. Rep. 305, where the previous cases were collected and reviewed, it must be regarded that the rule is well settled that where the plaintiff's whole cause of action is admitted by the pleadings, and the defendant relies solely upon an affirmative defense, which, of course, he is bound to establish, the burden of proof is upon the defendant, and he is entitled to open and reply. As is there said: "The true test is, who would be entitled to the verdict if the case is submitted to the jury simply upon the pleadings, without evidence being adduced by either side? If the plaintiff, then unquestionably the defendant, being the actor, would be entitled to open and reply." Applying this test to the case under consideration, it is clear that there was no error in the ruling complained of. The plaintiff here sought to recover damages for the breach of the contract evidenced by the note set out in the complaint, and all that it was necessary for him to show to entitle him to recover was the execution of said note by the defendant. But when the execution of the note was admitted in defendant's answer, there was nothing left for the plaintiff to prove, and hence, if the case had been submitted to the jury upon the pleadings simply, without any evidence being adduced on either side, there can be no doubt that the plaintiff would have been entitled to the verdict, as, the only fact which it would otherwise have been necessary for him to prove having been admitted by the pleadings, there was nothing left for him to prove; and under such admission he would unquestionably have been entitled to recover. It is urged in the argument on behalf of the appellant that the execution of the note was not, in fact, admitted by the answer; and to meet this view we have been particular to set out the pleadings more fully than otherwise would have been deemed necessary. It seems to us impossible to read the answer without perceiving that the execution of the note was distinctly admitted more than once. In the second paragraph of the answer the language is: "That she admits that she did sign a note similar to the one mentioned in the complaint, and that she supposes that said note is correctly exhibited in the complaint." In the third paragraph the language is: "That under these promises she signed a note for said indebtedness of the said J. Benson Suber, the same being the note herein sued on," (italics ours;) and in the fourth paragraph of the answer defendant says "that at the time of the signing of said note" (referring plainly to the note set out in the complaint) she was a married woman, etc. In the face of these repeated admissions, contained in the answer, we are at a loss to conceive how it is possible to deny that the execution of the note was admitted in the pleadings. This case differs materially from the case of McConnell v. Kitchens, 20 S. C. 430, for there the action was based upon a written contract, containing certain terms and stipulations, while the defendant, in his answer, in effect denied that the contract was properly described in the complaint, and, on the contrary, alleged that the contract really contained other terms and stipulations, as appeared by a copy thereof set out in the answer. Hence it was very properly held that the defendant, not having admitted, in his answer, plaintiff's cause of action as set out in the complaint, was not entitled to open and reply. Here, however, the defendant, in her answer, did distinctly admit the execution of the note set out in the complaint, and hence she was entitled to open and reply.

The second and fourth grounds of appeal, both relating to alleged errors in the charge in respect to agency, may be considered together. It seems to us that when the circuit judge instructed the jury that it was competent for a husband to act as agent for his wife, and that it was for them to determine whether the evidence was sufficient to show that in this case the husband was acting as the agent of his wife in purchasing the supplies for which the note was given, the jury were properly instructed as to the law applicable to that view of the case, for it certainly needs neither argument nor authority to show that, before one person can be made liable for a contract made by another, there must be satisfactory evidence that the person making the contract had the authority of the person sought to be charged to make such contract; in other words, there must be satisfactory evidence of agency. This evidence may be direct or circumstantial, and, when the jury were told that they "must take all the testimony bearing upon this issue and answer the question" we do not see what more could be required. As to the alleged refusal of the implied request to charge "that the actions and conduct of the husband may go towards establishing the agency," we think it is answered by several considerations. In the first place, the judge did not refuse to so charge the jury; on the contrary, his reply was: "I have told them they must take all the testimony they have heard bearing upon the subject of agency, and determine that question." In the second place, the testimony not being either set out or stated in the "case," we have no means of ascertaining whether there was any testimony upon which such a request could have been based. But, in the third place, we do not think that such a request could properly have been granted in its unqualified form, and therefore, under the well-settled rule that when requests are submitted, unless they are correct as submitted, they may be refused, there is no error in refusing such requests. Gunter v. Manufacturing Co., 15 S. C. 443; Insurance Co. v. Lawrence, 2 Pet. 25; Railroad Co. v. Horst, 93 U. S. 291. Now if, as we shall presently see, mere declarations of the alleged agent are not competent to establish the agency, upon the same principle mere actions and conduct of the alleged agent would not be competent to establish agency. Hence, even if the circuit judge had flatly refused to charge in accordance with this implied request,—which, however, we do not think he did,—there would have been no error; for the mere actions and conduct of the husband, unless shown to have been known to and acquiesced in by the wife, would not be competent evidence of the agency. That “the mere declarations of the husband will not be enough to establish such agency” seems to us too plain for argument. It would be a very dangerous doctrine to establish that one person could be made liable for a debt contracted by another simply by the declarations of the person contracting the debt that he was acting as agent of the person sought to be charged. Indeed, we think that until there is some other evidence of the agency, such declarations are mere hearsay, and as such incompetent. See 1 Greenl. Ev. p. 158, note b, and cases there cited; Renneker v. Warren, 17 S. C. 139.

It only remains to consider the third ground of appeal, which, as it seems to us, was taken under a misconception of the judge's charge. In the first part of the charge the jury were fully and properly instructed as to the law applicable to the case outside of the act of 1837, in terms to which no exception was or could be taken. But, as the note sued on was executed after the passage of that act, it became necessary to construe that act, in order to ascertain whether the defendant would be liable even though the jury should come to the conclusion that the supplies which constituted the consideration of the note were furnished to the husband, and not to the wife. It is very manifest that the jury must have reached the conclusion that the supplies were furnished to the husband, and not to the wife, for otherwise their verdict, under the first part of the charge, would necessarily have been in favor of the plaintiff. So that this ground of appeal raises only the question whether the circuit judge put the proper construction upon the act of 1837. The first section of that act (the only one pertinent to this controversy) reads as follows: “All conveyances, mortgages, and like formal instruments of writing affecting her separate estate, executed by a married woman, shall be effectual to convey or charge her separate estate whenever the intention so to convey or charge such separate estate is declared in such conveyances, mortgages, or other instruments of writing.” As was held in Mortgage Co. v. Mixson, (S. C.) 17 S. E. Rep. 244, the manifest object of that act was to effect a radical change in the previous law, not only by substituting a question of intention for a question of power, but declaring how such intention should be manifested. Hence, whenever a question as to the liability of a married woman on any of the classes of written instruments referred to in the act is presented, the question is no longer a question whether the married woman had the power to make such instrument, but the sole inquiry is whether she has declared her intention, in the instrument, to charge her separate estate. It will be observed that the act does not cover all instruments in writing, but only “conveyances, mortgages, and like formal instruments of writing” affecting the separate estate of the married woman. Hence, unless the instrument in writing in a given case falls within one or the other of the classes mentioned, the act will not apply. So that the first inquiry here is whether a mere promissory note falls within either of the classes mentioned. We agree with the circuit judge that it does not, for the reason that it is not a “like formal instrument in writing” to either of the classes specifically mentioned,—conveyances or mortgages,—which necessarily imply a transfer of or a charge upon the separate estate of the married woman. This is not only implied from the essential nature of the instruments specified, but also from the subsequent words in the statute, “shall be effectual to convey or charge her separate estate.” Now, it is very clear that a simple promissory note has none of the elements of a conveyance, and it seems to us equally clear that a note cannot properly be said to be a charge upon any estate. But, even if we are in error in this latter respect, a note is certainly not an instrument affecting the separate estate of the married woman; but, without resting our decision upon this point, it is sufficient for us to say that the absence of any declaration of intention on the part of the maker of the note in the note upon which the action was based was abundantly sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the statute; for this court has held, in the case of Reid v. Stevens, 17 S. E. Rep. 358, that even in the case of a formal mortgage of real estate, which does not contain the declaration of intention provided for by the act of 1837, the married woman will not be bound unless it appears that the contract which the mortgage was given to secure was a contract as to her separate estate. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

ODOM et al. v. NEW ENGLAND MORTGAGE SECURITY CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 10, 1893.)

ACTION ON NOTE—USURY—LAW OF PLACE—EVIDENCE—PLEADINGS.

1. A promissory note, payable in the city of New York, with interest from its date at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, is open to attack for usury by proof that the law of New York limits the rate of interest to 6 per cent. per annum, and declares void all contracts in which any higher rate is stipulated or reserved.

2. In an action upon such a note as that referred to above, a plea of usury, setting forth the statute of New York, the plea not being demurred to, but allowed to stand for trial, is sufficient to admit in evidence that statute, whether the sum on which the usury was to be paid, the time when the contract was made, when payable, and the amount of usury agreed upon, taken, or reserved, be set forth in the plea or not.

3. The fact that the note was secured by a deed of even date with itself, executed in Georgia, and conveying land situate in Georgia, would not render the statute of New York inadmissible as evidence to support the plea. Some of the material facts which affirmatively appear in other cases, such as Security Co. v. McLaughlin, 13 S. E. Rep. 81, 87 Ga. 1, and Jackson v. Mortgage Co., 15 S. E. Rep. 812, 88 Ga. 756, are not disclosed by the record in this case.

Error from superior court, Muscogee county; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by the New England Mortgage Security Company against E. H. Odom and others on a promissory note. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Thornton & McMichael, for plaintiffs in error. W. E. Simmons and Little, Worrill & Little, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. When the statutes of the state of New York, by a duly-certified copy, were offered in evidence to sustain the pleas of usury, two objections were made,—one that the evidence was irrelevant, the other that the pleas did not state the amount of interest charged. On these objections the evidence was excluded.

1. The excluded evidence would have shown that by the law of New York the rate of interest is limited to 6 per cent. per annum, and that all contracts reserving or stipulating for a higher rate are void; void not only as to the usury, but as to principal and interest also. The promissory note declared upon was payable to Flint or order at the office of the Corbin Banking Company, New York city, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum. The general rule is that as to the rate of interest the law of the place of performance controls, unless the parties intended that the law of some other place should apply, and contracted with reference to the latter. The question of intention is one of fact, and as such is always open to investigation. Tried by the face of the note itself, the parties to this contract seem to have had in view the law of the state of New York as the one applicable to the payment of interest as well as to the payment of principal. If they did, they must have intended to violate that law, for they stipulated for a rate of interest which it forbids. The pleas of usury in the case are based upon this theory; and if, in point of fact, the parties contemplated the laws of New York, and not the laws of Georgia, or some other state or country, as governing performance in respect to the rate of interest, the defense ought to prevail. It is perfectly competent for the plaintiff, by evidence in answer to the pleas, to show as matter of fact that the parties did not intend the law of New York to apply, but did intend some other law to have application as to the rate of interest. This fact being shown, whether by direct or circumstantial evidence, the presumption arising upon the face of the instrument would be rebutted, and the law of New York would give place to the law of the state or country which the parties intended should apply. It is not alleged in the declaration, nor does it otherwise appear from any of the pleadings, where the note sued upon was executed. So far, therefore, as the pleadings are concerned, no place whatever is directly suggested as furnishing the law of the contract declared upon, except the state of New York. This being so, what room is there for doubt that the pleas of usury are good in substance as an answer to the declaration?

2. Neither of the pleas was demurred to, though one of them contains blanks which ought to be filled, and neither of them is sufficiently detailed and specific as to some particulars to render them good in form as pleas of usury under the Code, § 3470a. But, as the statute of New York renders void the whole contract, and not merely a part of it as does our statute, the want of these particulars may be treated as defects of form; and the exclusion of the evidence because of them, the pleas being good in substance, was not authorized.

3. It seems that the parties went to trial upon the pleas, and the plaintiff below introduced in evidence the note sued on, and a deed of even date therewith, executed in Georgia, conveying land situated in Georgia. This was all right, and perhaps from the note, if the place of execution appeared on its face, and the deed and its contents, the jury could have inferred that the parties had in view the law of Georgia, and not the law of New York, in fixing the rate of interest. But certainly this would not prevent the defendants below from introducing evidence to support their pleas. The plaintiff's evidence might answer the pleas by evidence already in as well as by more to come in, but that would not render the statute of New York inadmissible as evidence to support the pleas. The admissibility of evidence to support a plea does not depend upon what evidence the plaintiff introduces to overcome it.

Until the plea is proved, there is nothing to overcome. We rule nothing in this case which conflicts with Security Co. v. McLaughlin, 87 Ga. 1, 13 S. E. Rep. 81, and Jackson v. Mortgage Co., 88 Ga. 756, 15 S. E. Rep. 812, or other like cases. Some of the material facts which affirmatively appeared in them as matter of evidence do not appear on the face of the pleadings in this case. And on the question of supporting the pleas by evidence we cannot look to what the plaintiff proved or could have proved, since to do this would be to rule out evidence offered by the one side because the other side had already answered it, or else could answer it by other evidence. We need not say that this would be absurd, but it would certainly be very unsound practice. Judgment reversed.

HOWARD v. JOHNSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 3, 1893.)
NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS — USURY — RELEASE OF SURETY — JUDGMENT ENTRY — LEADING QUESTIONS.

1. Where in an action against principal and surety the latter defends, but the former does not, and the verdict is against the principal, only, for the amount of the debt sued for, the legal effect is a finding in favor of the surety, and a judgment accordingly is not erroneous. Though a judgment declaring him to be discharged may be irregular in form, it is good, in substance, as a judicial announcement of the legal effect of the verdict, as between the plaintiff and the surety.

2. The legal effect of usury in a promissory note, in preventing a surety from whom the usury is concealed from being bound by his undertaking, cannot be evaded by afterwards purging the note of usury by an arrangement between the creditor and the principal debtor, in which the surety takes no part, and to which he does not assent.

3. The allowance of a leading question in the examination of a witness is generally matter of discretion, and no cause for a new trial. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Cartersville; Shelby Attaway, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by W. H. Howard against Lindsey Johnson, as surety, and another, as principal. From a judgment against the principal, only, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

John W. Akin, for plaintiff in error. Albert S. Johnson, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The trial took place on a defense presented alone by the surety, the principal not defending; and the verdict rendered was in favor of the plaintiff against the principal, only, and was silent as to the surety. This was in accordance with the form of verdict which the court instructed the jury to bring in if they found the surety was discharged or not bound. No doubt, superadding an express finding in favor of the surety would have made the verdict better in form, but in substantial legal effect the verdict was the same without this addition as it would have been with it. No one reading the whole record together, and intelligently construing it, would fail to understand that the jury considered the debt sued for as the several debt of the principal, and not as the joint debt of both defendants. The plaintiff claimed as against both. One defended; the other did not. The jury found for the plaintiff as against the latter, only. This was equivalent to finding against the plaintiff as to the former. The judgment declaring the surety discharged may have been irregular in form, but it was good in substance, for it declared judicially the legal effect of the finding. In this respect it was quite as efficacious as would have been a judgment that the surety recover of the plaintiff his costs, which, on the verdict rendered, would have been good, both in form and substance, as a discharge of the surety.

2. It is now settled law in this state that concealed usury in a promissory note which contains a waiver of homestead or exemption prevents a surety signing the note with his principal from being bound by the instrument, provided he makes this defense in due time and proper manner. The defense cannot be evaded by any arrangement between the creditor and the principal purging the note of usury, the surety taking no part in the same, and not assenting thereto. The purgation made or attempted in this instance was not only after the execution of the note, but after suit on it was brought. Most certainly a contract which was without obligation as to the surety when it was made could not be rendered obligatory upon him by something done afterwards, without his concurrence or co-operation, and which he has never ratified or adopted.

3. Granted that the question propounded to Johnson, the surety, was leading, the allowance of it was not cause for a new trial. Such details in practice are generally subject to the discretion of the trial court. The objection to the answer to this question, that it was not matter of fact, but was matter of opinion, merely, is without any color of merit. There was no evidence showing, or tending to show, that the surety had any notice or knowledge of the usury when the note was executed. The evidence showed he was ignorant of it. Judgment affirmed.

JACKSON v. STATE.

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO RAPE — WHAT CONSTITUTES ASSAULT — QUESTIONS FOR JURY — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. Where a man, under the incitement of lust, and with the intention of gratifying it by force, enters the bedroom of a virtuous woman, at a late hour in the night, and gets upon the bed in which she is sleeping, within reach of her person, for the purpose of ravishing her, he commits an assault upon her, although he may not actually touch her, being prevented from so doing by her outcry, and by the interposition of an occupant of the adjoining room.

2. Social customs, founded on race differences, and the fact that there was difference of race between the accused and the woman alleged to have been assaulted, may be considered by the jury upon the question of whether the assault was committed with intent to rape, the evidence showing that the room in which the woman was sleeping was entered late at night, and there being nothing to indicate that the entry was by permission or due to any encouragement held out by her upon which to found a hope or expectation of consent.

3. The charge of the court complained of did not trench upon the province of the jury, and was free from substantial error.

4. The evidence was barely sufficient to uphold the verdict. It made a case on which the jury might well have doubted whether the accused intended to ravish, but the verdict negatives the existence of any reasonable doubt, and the trial judge was satisfied with the finding.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Decatur county; B. B. Bower, Judge.

Major Jackson was convicted of assault with intent to rape, and brings error. Affirmed.

O. G. Gurley, for plaintiff in error. W. N. Spence, Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. As defined by the Code, § 4357, an assault is an attempt to commit a violent injury on the person of another. Where a rape is intended, the injury contemplated can be inflicted only by actual contact of the sexual organs of the man with those of the woman. In order for an assault with intent to rape to be committed, is it necessary that the persons of the two should be in such proximity as that the organs of the male shall be within what may be termed "striking distance" of the organs of the female? Or, is the virile member to be treated as a gun, which is harmless until brought within "carrying distance" of the target? We think not. It seems to us that where rape is intended, and the would-be ravisher, with the purpose of presently executing his intention, enters the bedroom of the woman when she is asleep, and mounts upon her bed, thus bringing himself near enough to seize at will her person, or some part of it, the attempt to commit a violent injury upon her is complete. Certainly, when matters have proceeded thus far, she would be in imminent danger of being ravished. Nothing but a change of intention on the part of her assailant, the interference of some third person, or her own resistance, would be likely to shield her. No actual touching of the woman's person is necessary to complete the assault. There need be nothing more than the intention to accomplish sexual intercourse presently by force, and the active prosecution of that intention until a situation of immediate, present danger to the woman is produced. If, in the case before us, the accused, under the incitement of lust, and with the intention of gratifying it by force, entered the bedroom of the girl, near midnight, and got upon the bed in which she was sleeping, within reach of her person, for the purpose of ravishing her, he committed an assault upon her, even if he did not actually touch her, except casually and incidentally while she was in the act of leaping out of bed to escape from him, or even if he did not touch her at all, he being prevented from consummating his design by her outcry, and by the intervention of her father, who occupied an adjoining room. Under the evidence in the record, the acts done by the accused, if they were accompanied with an intention to ravish, were quite sufficient to constitute an assault.

2. The doctrine of the court's charge to the jury that, upon the question of intention, social customs, founded on race differences, and the fact that the man was a negro and the girl a white person, might be taken into consideration, is undoubtedly correct. There was nothing in the evidence to indicate that the girl was not virtuous, or that she had held out any encouragement to this negro, or to any other person, white or black, to enter her bedroom for illicit intercourse. Not the faintest trace of a reason appears on which he could have founded any hope or expectation of consent. Surely it was legitimate for the jury to note any departure from the customary modes of visiting which was involved in a nocturnal entrance by a negro man into the bedroom of a white woman during the hours usually devoted to sleep. The difference of sex, to say nothing of the difference of race, would afford ample ground for directing attention to this element of the case.

3. The charge of the court complained of was substantially correct throughout, and no part of it trenched unduly on the province of the jury. We find nothing in it which challenges more than mere verbal criticism.

4. We confess to a serious doubt in our own minds as to whether the accused really intended to commit rape. Two facts strongly indicate the contrary; one of these being that he knew the father of the girl occupied an adjoining room, and was near enough at hand to protect her; and the other being that, instead of seizing her while asleep, he paused upon the bed, and called her by name. Why he should have done this if his mind was made up to violate her person, we are at some loss to understand, or even to conjecture. But the workings of a criminal mind, especially while under the dominion of brutal passion, are often mysterious. A bad man, who has procured his own consent to commit a great outrage, will frequently take great risks and prosecute his criminal enterprise in the most foolish manner. Desperation and folly are close relatives, and are found not seldom in each other's company. Guilt is shrewd only when it is timid. When it becomes bold and reckless, it is in no mood to consult discretion, or to heed the dictates of prudence. The jury had a right to interpret the prisoner's conduct in the light of this trait of vicious human nature, and, so doing, there was no violation of sound logic in reaching the conclusion at which they arrived. They might well have doubted, as we do, whether there was an intention to ravish, but we cannot say that 12 honest, fair-minded men might not be free from any reasonable doubt on the subject. We cannot, therefore, do otherwise than accept the verdict as negating the existence of any such doubt in the jury box, the presiding judge having approved the finding. Had we been present and witnessed the whole trial, we might have been no less satisfied than he was. Our conclusion is that the evidence was sufficient, though barely sufficient, to uphold the verdict, and that in denying a new trial no error was committed. Judgment affirmed.

DANIEL v. WILSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 31, 1892.)

CORPORATIONS — DURATION OF EXISTENCE — RECEIVERS — EJECTMENT — DEFENSE — ESTOPPEL.

1. The charter of a loan and building association granted by the superior court at October term, 1866, expired by statutory limitation at the corresponding date in 1886.

2. Where the superior court of the county in which a corporation was located appointed, in 1879, before the charter expired, a receiver for all the assets of the corporation, and in another suit, commenced after the charter expired, appointed another receiver in 1887 for all the assets then remaining, and ordered the latter receiver to institute such actions as he thought necessary to reduce to possession any property claimed by third persons to which the corporation had title, a defendant in an action of ejectment brought by the second receiver cannot protect himself against a recovery by setting up outstanding title in the first, the first having been appointed pendente lite, and no final decree, so far as appears, ever having been made in the cause. It is doubtful whether title to the realty of the corporation would vest in the first receiver by the mere order appointing him, but, if it did, he never having asserted it, it was divested by the order appointing the second receiver in so far as to enable that receiver to recover the property, and administer it under the direction of the court as provided for by section 1688 of the Code. The same court, having jurisdiction over both receivers and over the custody by them of any assets brought in by either, would be competent to protect the rights of all parties, including the defendant in ejectment, against any conflicting claims by the receivers.

3. A receiver of an extinct corporation, if he would be estopped at all by the acquiescence and assistance of a stockholder and ex-officer of the corporation in a sale of assets made by a third person after the charter expired, would not be estopped unless it appeared that such acquiescence and assistance were with knowledge that the corporation had some right or title to the assets thus dealt with. Where the assets consisted of a small parcel of woodland embraced in a larger tract, and the larger tract was sold and conveyed by a third person with the assistance as well as acquiescence of the stockholder and ex-officer, he not being aware at the time that the larger tract included the smaller one, there would be no estoppel. Especially would there be none which could be set up and asserted in a mere action of ejectment brought by the receiver against the purchaser, to which action the stockholder and ex-officer was no party.

4. The purchaser of land at an administrator's sale gets no better title than the intestate had. Hence, where the intestate had conveyed absolutely to his creditor, whether in payment of a debt or only as security therefor, a purchaser from his administrator got no title as against the creditor, except upon condition of redeeming the land if it was taken by the creditor as security only.

5. There was no error in admitting or rejecting evidence, or, if any, it was immaterial to the substantial merits of the case. Upon the controlling facts the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the court was correct in directing the jury accordingly.

Error from superior court, Fulton county; Marshall J. Clarke, Judge.

Action in ejectment by R. H. Wilson, receiver, against John B. Daniel. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Julius L. Brown, for plaintiff in error.
Hillyer & Lee and Caudler & Thomson, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. By Code, § 1676, par. 2, the duration of any corporation chartered by the superior court is limited to 20 years. The charter involved in this case was so granted in the year 1866, consequently it expired at the corresponding time in the year 1886, and there is no suggestion that it was renewed afterwards.

2. For the reasons suggested in the second headnote, we are of opinion that the receiver appointed after the dissolution of the corporation could recover, notwithstanding the appointment of the first receiver, and notwithstanding that appointment had never been formally revoked.

3. The third headnote explains very fully why the receiver should not be treated in the present action as being estopped by the acts and acquiescence of one of the stockholders of the extinct corporation, who was formerly an officer of that corporation.

4. Both parties claimed under George W. Knight,—the receiver by a warranty deed from Knight, executed in 1869, and duly recorded, conveying the premises to the corporation; the defendant by a deed from Knight's administratrix, executed in 1887, conveying to defendant a larger tract, of which the premises in dispute were shown by evidence to constitute a part. The defendant contended that the deed to the corporation, though absolute in terms, was made to secure a debt which Knight owed to the corporation, and, consequently, that the sale and conveyance afterwards made by Knight's administratrix was an administration of the property, the title of the corporation being divested thereby, and passing to the purchaser from the administratrix. We think it manifest that, were the fact as contended, the legal consequence claimed to flow therefrom would not follow. The deed to the corporation, being absolute, passed the title out of Knight into his grantee, whether the conveyance was made only to secure a debt or in payment of a debt. No title being left in Knight, there was none which constituted a part of his estate when he afterwards died, and, consequently, none which his legal representative could have administered. All that she could possibly have administered was Knight's equity to redeem, and that was all which a purchaser from her could acquire. This being so, the latter could protect his purchase only by paying or tendering payment of the debt as security for which Knight's deed was excuted. Until such payment or tender the purchaser could not resist an action of ejectment based, as this was, on that deed. The cases which rule that an administrator of a mortgagor or of a debtor by judgment may administer fully as against the mortgagee or the judgment creditor, are not applicable, because in such cases there is only a lien outstanding against the property administered, the title being in the mortgagor or debtor; whereas in such a case as the present the title itself, and not a mere lien, is in the creditor. Of course, if the conveyance by Knight to the corporation was not made to secure a debt, but in payment, no interest whatever was left in him or his estate, and, consequently, the sale by his administratrix passed nothing to the purchaser relatively to the premises now in dispute.

5. If there was any error in admitting or rejecting evidence, it was immaterial to the substantial merits of the controversy. Upon the controlling facts, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and the court committed no error in directing the jury accordingly. Judgment affirmed.

CITY OF ATLANTA v. WARNOCK.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 9, 1892.)

ABATEMENT OF NUISANCE—SEWER GAS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. The municipal government of Atlanta, though invested by statute with plenary powers over the subjects of streets, sewers, drainage, water supply, and sanitation, has no right to create and permanently maintain a nuisance dangerous to health and life, which nuisance consists of openings, called "manholes," in a sewer located in a public street contiguous to the dwelling of a citizen, the manholes being allowed to emit poisonous gases in large quantities through perforated covers placed over them. This is true, at least, where the dangerous character of the nuisance results, in all probability, not from defects inherent in the general system, but from defective execution of the system, in failing to adapt it to local conditions, such as steep grade in the particular street in which the unwholesome sewer is constructed and maintained.

2. There was no abuse of discretion in granting the temporary injunction, enjoining the city "from continuing said manholes in such condition as to allow the escape of noxious gases." In the light of the pleadings and the evidence, the terms of the order were sufficiently definite and specific.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; Marshall J. Clarke, Judge.

Action by Mary J. Warnock against the city of Atlanta for injunction to abate a nuisance. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

J. B. Goodwin and J. A. Anderson, for plaintiff in error. Hall & Hammond, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. There was evidence indicating that the system of sewerage adopted by the city was a good and safe one, and that the nuisance complained of, or its dangerous character, did not result from any defect inherent in the system itself, but was due to defective execution, in failing to adapt the system properly to the steep grade of the street in which this particular unwholesome sewer was constructed and is maintained. There was ample evidence that poisonous gases, in large quantities, were emitted through the manholes in this sewer, which were dangerous to health and life, and that the plaintiff, whose residence was on adjacent premises, was subjected to special injury and annoyance thereby. If such a nuisance owed its origin, not to the general system of which this sewer was a part, but to a defective execution of the same at this particular place, there can be no doubt of the power to restrain the city from continuing the nuisance, notwithstanding the municipal government is, by statute, invested with plenary powers over streets, sewers, drainage, and sanitation. Whether a nuisance attributable to a mistaken exercise of the legislative power of the city in adopting an unsafe or unwholesome system of sewerage might be the subject-matter of injunction, is a question on which no decisive opinion need be expressed, the strong probability being that the nuisance now under consideration had a different origin.

2. In granting the temporary injunction restraining the city "from continuing said manholes in such condition as to allow the escape of poisonous gases," the presiding judge did not abuse his discretion; and the terms of the order were sufficiently definite and specific, construing them in the light of the pleadings and the evidence. The city officials, if they honestly and conscientiously endeavor to comply with the injunction, will have no real difficulty in ascertaining, to a reasonable certainty, what manholes they are to deal with, and what gases are to be kept from escaping through the same. Any affected ignorance on this subject is not to be anticipated. Judgment affirmed.

LEE et al. v. ATLANTA ST. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 9, 1892.)
PRACTICE—STIPULATION OF COUNSEL TO BE IN WRITING—WAIVER.

In order to be enforced by the court, any consent of counsel not to insist that the brief of evidence shall be filed within 30 days after the trial, where a motion for a new trial is made, must be in writing. Rule 20, Code p. 1348. In the present case there was no waiver by conduct outside of the alleged express consent, and, the latter not being in writing, there was no error in dismissing the motion for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; Marshall J. Clarke, Judge.

Action between Annie Lee and others and the Atlanta Street Railroad Company. From a judgment dismissing the motion for a new trial after verdict for the railroad company, Lee and others bring error. Affirmed.

Westmoreland & Austin, for plaintiffs in error. N. J. & T. A. Hammond, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The main case tried below came within the act of 1889, which requires the brief of evidence to be filed, as well as the motion for a new trial to be made, within 30 days after the trial was had. The brief of evidence not having been filed until after the 30 days had expired, the court, for that reason, dismissed the motion for a new trial. It was insisted that this was wrong, because the delay to file the brief was matter of consent between counsel for the respective parties. There was no waiver by conduct outside of the alleged express consent, and the latter was not in writing, nor was it admitted to have been made by the party or the counsel against whom it was sought to be enforced. In other words, the fact that there was any consent of counsel was controverted. This being so, rule 20 of the superior courts, (Code, p. 1348,) applies. This rule reads thus: "No consent between attorneys or parties will be enforced by the court, unless it be in writing and signed by the parties to the consent." The counsel evidently misunderstood each other, and thus one of the actual evils against which the rule was aimed arose in the present case. There was no error in dismissing the motion for a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

LOWE BROS. CRACKER CO. v. BROOKE

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 14, 1892.)
RECEIVERS—APPOINTMENT—WHO MAY APPLY FOR —EVIDENCE.

1. To obtain a receiver under the insolvent traders' law. (Code, § 3149a.) as amended by the act of 1889, it is necessary that three unsecured creditors should unite in filing the petition, unless the petitioning creditors represent one-third of the whole unsecured indebtedness of the insolvent debtor. If one of the three petitioning creditors be secured, whether by personal security or otherwise, he cannot be counted as an unsecured creditor.

2. If the second creditor's place in the proceeding can be supplied by amendment bringing in another creditor not at first a party, the amendment must allege that such added creditor is unsecured.

3. The evidence adduced at the hearing showing that one of the petitioning creditors was secured by a solvent indorser, and was therefore not entitled to the harsh remedy afforded by the insolvent trader law, the judge erred in appointing a receiver and granting an injunction.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; Marshall J. Clarke, Judge.

Action by George W. Brooke and others against the Lowe Bros. Cracker Company for the appointment of a receiver, and other relief. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Read & Brandon and Mayson & Hill, for plaintiff in error. C. D. Maddox and Alex. & Victor Smith, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. Waiving several questions as needless to be decided, the application for a receiver was defeated when it turned out at the hearing that one of the three original petitioners, to wit, the firm of J. J. & J. E. Maddox, was not an unsecured, but was a secured, creditor. The petition did not allege that the petitioning creditors represented as much as one-third of the whole unsecured indebtedness of the debtor corporation. This being so, in order to prevail it was necessary, under the Code, (section 3149a,) as amended by the act of 1889, that all three of the petitioning creditors should prove to be unsecured. The secured one could not be counted. This left only two, and it was impossible, under the statute on which the proceeding was based, for two to prevail, unless they represented at least one-third of the unsecured indebtedness of their debtor. There is no indication in the statute that the security which renders a creditor disqualified to petition is to be of one kind rather than another. Personal security will disqualify as effectually as would a mortgage, collaterals, or any other species. In ordinary speech, a secured creditor is one who has security for his debt, and, if he has this by reason of indorsement, guaranty, or suretyship of a third person, he would be so denominated. We think the statute contemplates anything as security which would be so regarded, according to usage and ordinary modes of expression. The statutory meaning of "unsecured" is the same as the popular meaning of that term.

2. When three unsecured creditors are requisite to inaugurate a proceeding, and only two of that class join in it at first, it is questionable whether the place of the third can be supplied by adding another unsecured creditor by amendment pending the imperfect and unauthorized proceeding. But grant that this may be done; certainly the amendment should show on its face that the added creditor is unsecured. The petition was brought in the present case on the 18th of July, and on the same day a temporary restraining order was granted by the judge, who also appointed a temporary receiver. On the 3d of September thereafter, the ultimate hearing for interlocutory receiver and injunction came on, and then it was that several other creditors petitioned to be made parties plaintiff, and orders were granted making them such parties. It did not appear from these petitions or orders that any of these added creditors were unsecured. Indeed, they did not present themselves on any idea or theory of taking the place of the Maddox firm in the original suit, but as additional parties seeking to share in the fruits of that suit, treating it as well brought in the beginning. The Maddox firm remained a party, and insisted on occupying the position of an unsecured creditor. One of the firm swore to the truth of an amendment to the original petition filed on the same day the new parties were added, but sworn to and allowed previously, which amendment alleged that the debts due each of the complainants in the petition, as set out therein, are each and all unsecured. It is obvious that this amendment applied only to the claims of the three creditors who complained originally, and in nowise to the claims of the coplaintiffs who became parties after the amendment was verified and allowed.

3. By any fair construction of the evidence as a whole, it is manifest that the Maddox firm was a secured, and not an unsecured, creditor. The claim of that firm consisted of an acceptance of the corporation, indorsed by L. D. Lowe, the president of the corporation, in his personal and individual capacity. There was an effort to prove his insolvency, but this was a complete failure. There can be no doubt that his name on the acceptance, whether he be held as indorser, guarantor, or a joint acceptor, affords ample security for the payment of this debt. The facts in evidence make this perfectly clear. The case, as one requiring three unsecured creditors to begin and carry it on, broke down completely at the hearing on the merits, and, irrespective of the minor questions involved in it, the judge erred in appointing a receiver and granting an injunction. Judgment reversed.

PLANTERS' LOAN & SAV. BANK v. BERRY.

ACTION AGAINST NATIONAL BANK—ATTACHMENT BEFORE JUDGMENT.

The statute of the United States prohibits seizure of property belonging to national banks (irrespective of whether they be solvent or insolvent) before final judgment, by virtue of any attachment issued under a state law, and returnable to a state court. Any such seizure is therefore void, and a bond given by a national bank to dissolve such attachment, served by summons of garnishment, is also void. The giving of such bond is not an appearance in the attachment case so as to make valid a judgment entered up on the bond in that case against the bank and the sureties executing the bond. The judgment is wholly void; and an affidavit of illegality, made and filed by one of the sureties in resistance to a levy upon his property under an execution founded on the judgment, must be sustained. The judgment being wholly void for want of jurisdiction in the court rendering it, affidavit of illegality is a proper defensive remedy.

Error from city court of Richmond; W. F. Evc, Judge.

Action by J. M. Berry against the Planters' Loan & Savings Bank. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Geo. A. Mercer, J. B. Cumming, Bryan Cumming, Francis C. Barlow, and Barlow & Wetmore, for plaintiff in error. Frank H. & Wm. K. Miller, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. How the statutes of the United States stand at the present time on the subject of protecting national banks against the seizure of their effects by virtue of attachments in advance of final judgment may be seen by reference to Rev. St. U. S. § 5242. The only words necessary to be now quoted are these: "And no attachment, injunction or execution shall be issued against such association or its property before final judgment in any suit, action or proceeding, in any state, county, or municipal court." The opinion, whether professional or judicial, which construes this legislation as allowing seizure under attachment before final judgment in case the defendant bank is solvent, and prohibiting it only where the bank is insolvent, is manifestly unsound. Certainly, no such distinction is made in the letter, and we discern no necessity for it in the context or in the reason and spirit, of the legislation. The statutory policy seems to be to prevent all preference or priority in claims against these banks sought to be acquired by seizure of effects under state authority before the final adjudication of such claims, and to protect the banks from being weakened or crippled by such antecedent seizures. The national banks created by congress are to control their own assets and resources as against state interference at the instance of creditors, or of pretended creditors, until the real existence of the alleged debts has been ascertained by final judgment. Ante-judgment seizures cannot be made; a state can make post-judgment seizures only. Mesne process will not suffice for seizing by state courts; these courts can seize alone by final process. This policy may be wise or unwise, wholesome or unwholesome, but in either event it is the one established by competent legislative authority, and must be respected and enforced accordingly. In Bank v. Mixer, 124 U. S. 727, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 718, Walte, C. J., said: "Although the provision was evidently made to secure equality among the general creditors in the division of the proceeds of the property of an insolvent bank, its operation is by no means confined to cases of actual or contemplated insolvency. The remedy is taken away altogether, and cannot be used under any circumstances." Whether this was obiter or not, as applied to the facts of that case, we agree with it, and accept it as a sound interpretation of the statute. And we agree with the court of appeals of New York that no aid can be derived from the act of congress of July 12, 1882, providing that the jurisdiction for suits brought against national banks shall be the same as for suits against state banks. Raynor v. Bank, (1882) 93 N. Y. 371. In the case at bar the attachment was issued under a law of this state, and was returnable to one of the courts of the state. It was levied, before final judgment, by the service of a summons of garnishment upon one of the debtors of the national bank, the defendant in attachment. This was a seizure of the debt, and the debt was the property of the bank. The seizure was utterly void, and the bond given by the bank to dissolve the garnishment was equally void. Bank v. Mixer, 124 U. S. 728, 729, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 718. Certainly it was void as a statutory bond, for, as there was no valid statutory authority for issuing or serving the garnishment, there could be none for taking the bond. In principle, this was ruled in the case of Bruce v. Conyers, 54 Ga. 678. No suit or action has been brought upon this bond, but, treating it solely as a statutory bond, and applying to it the spirit of sections 3319 and 3540 of the Code, the plaintiff in attachment caused judgment upon it to be rendered against the bank and the sureties who joined with the bank in executing it. The judgment was the outcome of the original suit brought against the bank by attachment. In that suit the sureties on the bond entered no appearance, and had no right to enter any. They were not heard, and could not have been heard had they so desired, save, perhaps, by some collateral motion. It is contended, however, that by giving the bond, the bank did what was equivalent, under section 3328 of the Code, to appearing and making defense. Grant this was so, the result would be only that "the judgment rendered against him [the bank] in such case shall bind all his property, and shall have the same force and effect as when there has been personal service." Surely this would be quite enough to follow as a necessary legal incident of giving a void bond. But to render a binding judgment on the bond against the bank and the sureties would be much more than this. It would be to change the character of the bond from void to valid, and affect the sureties by the attachment suit equally with their principal. It is manifest that, in order to reach the sureties and render them liable, mere appearance, or any other act of their principal, would not suffice. Even a confession of judgment by the latter would in no wise affect the former if the bond was void. In order for anything done by him, as their representative, to affect them, the real relation, not merely the nominal relation, of principal and surety would have to exist. If there was no jurisdiction to issue the attachment or the garnishment pending the attachment, and no jurisdiction to serve the garnishment or cause it to be served, there was none to require the bond or to take it, or to enter up judgment thereon in the attachment suit, whether jurisdiction over the defendant in that suit—jurisdiction over the bank in personam—was acquired or not. To render judgment on the bond such as was rendered, it was necessary to have jurisdiction over the sureties also. This could not be acquired by taking the bond, for there was no jurisdiction to take it; and there is no pretext that it was acquired otherwise. To show that the bank did enough to subject itself to a general judgment in personam under section 3328 of the Code, even could this be conceded, would leave the want of jurisdiction over the sureties untouched. The Planters' Loan & Savings Bank, the party now complaining, is one of these. Its property has been levied upon under a fi. fa. based upon this judgment. It has filed an affidavit of illegality, and in so doing has chosen the proper remedy. It has not had its day in court; there has been no court having jurisdiction to bind it. It is not bound, and to overrule its affidavit and to order the execution to proceed was error. Let an order be entered in the superior court sustaining the affidavit of illegality. Judgment reversed.

BALLARD TRANSFER CO. v. CLARK.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE—PROCEDURE—BILL OF PARTICULARS—CERTIORARI.

1. A magistrate, when not presiding in court, does not act judicially in answering questions put by counsel on a court day, whether or not a given case has that day been called; and counsel, shaping his conduct by such answer, must take the risk of its being correct.

2. By virtue of the act of October 8, 1885, a justice's court may hold from day to day until its business is disposed of. A petition for certiorari which alleges that the regular court day was on the first Monday of the month, and that the judgment in question was rendered on the 12th day of the month, without alleging that the court did not sit from day to day, or that its business was disposed of before the 12th day of the month, or that for some reason it was not in legal session, does not call upon the presiding magistrate to show by his answer that his court was legally in session on the latter day.

3. A bill of particulars attached to a summons in a justice's court is an office paper of the court, and, when lost, a copy may be established instantan. That this was done, and that the copy may not have been correct, will not be cause for reversing the final judgment in the case, if the judgment itself was free from material error.

4. The evidence, as recited in the magistrate's answer, warranted the judgment; and the superior court committed no error in disposing of exceptions to the answer, in dismissing the traverse, or in overruling the certiorari and affirming the judgment.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Fulton county; M. J. Clarke, Judge.

Action by Mattie V. Clark, by her next friend, against the Ballard Transfer Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Mattie V. Clark, suing by next friend, obtained a judgment in a magistrate's court against the Ballard Transfer Company. The defendant took the case by certiorari to the superior court. Upon the call of the case in that court, defendant (plaintiff in certiorari) excepted to the answer of the magistrate on certain grounds, and the court overruled each of the grounds of exception. It thereupon traversed the answer of the magistrate, and the court overruled each of the grounds of traverse, and, after hearing the cause, ordered that the certiorari be dismissed, and the judgment of the court below affirmed. Plaintiff in certiorari excepts to the rulings of the court as indicated above.

The petition for certiorari alleged: Mattie Clark, by next friend, sued petitioner in a magistrate's court, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff, which was set aside by the superior court on certiorari. Defendant thereafter sent regularly to the justice court, after each court day, to see if the case had been called for trial. The court day of said justice court is the first Monday in each month, and it is customary for lawyers, when otherwise occupied, to send up after the call, and if any case has been called, to agree upon a day for trial. After the call on the first Monday in September, petitioner's attorneys sent to A. A. Manning, justice of said court, and asked if they had any cases called, and he replied that no cases of theirs had been called. The messenger, by instruction, further asked about the case now in question, and the justice replied that it had not been called because the papers had not been sent back; thereby misleading and deceiving petitioner, because no cases are ever tried in a justice court, except those called upon a court day. At said time the case had in fact been called, and set for the 12th of September. On that date, plaintiff appeared, and established as a copy of the original bill of particulars, upon the ground that the bill of particulars had been lost, what was not a copy; the total amount being the same, but the original bill of particulars being more specific, and differing in some other particulars from the alleged copy. The established copy and the original were set out in the petition for certiorari. The original bill of particulars was in the office of defendant's attorneys, they having obtained it to make their former petition for certiorari, and having given a receipt therefor. It had not been returned to the justice because it had not been asked for. Plaintiff herself then swore that she gave the defendant the trunk, (one of the items in the bill of particulars;) that the trunk had in it the things named in the bill of particulars; that they were worth the amount stated in the bill of particulars; that she had never got them back; and that she went to get the trunk, and did not get it. She introduced no other evidence. Petitioner assigns as error (1) the establishment of an incorrect bill of particulars; (2) the establishment of a bill of particulars without any proof; (3) the rendition of a judgment upon the evidence introduced, the evidence not being sufficient; (4) the evidence was specially insufficient when plaintiff or her attorney knew that the trunk was in the possession of defendant, subject to plaintiff's order; (5) it was illegal to try the case upon September 12th, without any consent, the same not being the court day for said court; (6) because defendant was deceived by the false statement of the justice, plaintiff not desiring to impute improper motives to the justice, but charging that his conduct amounted to legal fraud.

The magistrate answered: After the order of the court directing a new trial had reached him, he called the case in its order at the next term, and set it down for trial. "On the day set, plaintiff and her counsel were present, and announced 'Ready.' The bill of particulars had been lost or mislaid, and plaintiff's counsel made a substantial copy, and asked to establish it. As it had been lost from the possession of the court, I allowed it to be established, and the trial to proceed. Plaintiff swore that she placed her trunk in the possession of defendant, took its check for the same, and produced it in evidence. She also swore that the goods mentioned in the bill of particulars were in the trunk, belonged to her, and were worth $79; that she had called several times, and asked for the trunk, and had failed to get it, or its contents, or its value. As to the original bill of particulars, I do not know where it was. It was not in the office. Defendant was not represented on the trial, or the call of the docket. If any one sent to inquire about the case, I have no recollection of it, and do not think it occurred. It is not the general practice or custom for attorneys to send after the call and find out about their cases, unless my attention is called to them, and they ask them to be set. I do so when I think of it, but never promise, as I cannot recollect all cases or requests made, but try to accommodate counsel as far as I can, they taking chances of the same. I gave judgment against defendant for $79."

The exceptions to the answer were as follows: "The answer is defective, in that the justice does not state positively whether or not inquiry was made of him at the conclusion of his call, on the first Monday in September, 1889, as to whether the case had been set for trial, and was further defective, in that he does not state whether or not the day upon which the case was tried was the court day for said court." The traverse to the answer was as follows: "The justice claims in his answer that, to the best of his recollection, no one was sent to his office on court day, inquiring whether the case had been set for trial. Plaintiff in certiorari denies the truth of this, and says the facts set forth in his petition are true. It further traversed the answer, and shows that the statement of the justice that it is not the general practice and custom for attorneys to send after his call to find out about their cases, except under certain conditions stated in his answer, is not true. The justice states that, if any one was sent to inquire about said case, he had no recollection of it, and did not think it occurred. Plaintiff in certiorari denies the truth of said answer, and affirms the truth of the allegations in his petition for certiorari touching this subject, [setting out what those allegations were.]"

Burton Smith and W. H. Pope, for plaintiff in error. John Clay Smith and Arnold & Arnold, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, O. J. From the headnotes, read in connection with the reporter's statement of the facts, this case, and the rulings of the court thereon, will be fully understood. No principle of law is involved, of sufficient importance to be discussed. Judgment affirmed.

McTYIER v. STATE.

SEDUCTION—PROMISE OF MARRIAGE—EVIDENCE—CHARACTER OF PROSECUTRIX—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESS—INSTRUCTIONS—IMPEACHING VERDICT BY AFFIDAVIT OF JURORS.

1. On a trial for seduction alleged to have been accomplished by persuasion and promises of marriage, promises of marriage made and letters written by the accused to the woman after the seduction, but pending the marriage engagement, are admissible in evidence. So, too, is a promise made by him to her at the time of the intercourse, or prior thereto, that if she yielded to him that time he would not make such a request again.

2. It is not competent, on examination in chief, to impeach either chastity or credibility by evidence of what a third person said to the impeaching witness touching the character or conduct of the woman sought to be impeached; and, where counsel declared his purpose to be to establish general character in this way, it was not error for the court to exclude the evidence without having heard counsel state what he expected to show by the witness that the third person had said, notwithstanding such third person was a relative (the uncle) of the woman whose character was in question. General character cannot be proved by evidence of particular statements made by relatives.

3. On a trial for seduction, the woman seduced having testified as a witness in behalf of the state, and her chastity and credibility having been drawn in question, it was not error to charge the jury that a witness might be impeached "by proof of general bad character, or by proof of general bad character as to the subject-matter of inquiry," and that a witness "may be sustained, and his credit restored, by proof of general good character or by the proof of general character in respect to the matter or subject of inquiry;" and "whether a witness has been impeached by any of these modes is a question of fact for the jury." These propositions, applied to such a case, are correct in the abstract, and giving them in charge was not prejudicial to the accused, though the evidence was less comprehensive than the charge.

4. The testimony of an impeached witness should be disregarded by the jury unless sustained by circumstances or by other credible testimony.

5. On a trial for seduction, the legal definition of the phrase "a virtuous unmarried woman" is matter of law for the court, and not a question of fact for the jury. The presumption of the law is that a female alleged to have been seduced was virtuous, and that presumption remains until removed by the evidence. The jury should treat her as virtuous unless the evidence, direct or circumstantial, should satisfy them that she had lost her virtue by having illicit intercourse. Repeating the engagement vow at the time of the sexual intercourse may imply persuasion.

6. It was not error for the court, in its charge, to caution the jury not to be influenced by public opinion, whether for or against the accused, and to state to them that they had nothing to do with the pleasure or displeasure of the public.

7. It was not error, as against the accused, to instruct the jury to consider the prisoner's statement in connection with the evidence, the instruction as to the statement being otherwise full, complete, and correct.

8. In charging on the prisoner's statement, it is not error for the court to say that the law "permits" it to go to the jury along with the evidence, this being literally and accurately true.

9. The court having permitted certain evidence to go to the jury, not as constituting proof of seduction, it was not error so to state in the final charge.

10. A correct charge on reasonable doubts, followed by the phrase, "I charge you, however, that in legal investigations mathematical certainty is not attainable," is not rendered erroneous by the use of the word "however."

11. The verdict, being for the offense of seduction, is not vitiated by what the court may have charged touching the lesser offense of fornication.

12. On the facts disclosed in the record, the remark imputed to a juror as having been made to his fellow jurors while serving on the trial of a previous case was not cause either for declaring a mistrial or for granting a new trial.

13. Where there was no separation or misconduct of the jury, but one of them casually overheard something, such as, "We, the jury, find the prisoner guilty," said by a bystander, one of a large crowd in the street along which the jury in a body, and in charge of a bailiff, were, with leave of the court, passing during a recess of the court on their way to dinner, there is no necessary presumption that the accused, whose case was then on trial, was injured. On the facts contained in the record the court was warranted in holding that the substantial conditions of a fair and impartial trial had not been violated; that the person who made the remark did not intend the jury to hear it, and was not aware that they were in hearing distance; that not more than one member of the jury did in fact hear it; and that none of them were influenced by it in their finding. Jurors cannot be heard to impeach their verdict. Affidavits having this object should not be received or read upon a motion for new trial.

14. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Sumter county; W. H. Fish, Judge.

W. E. McTyler was convicted on an indictment for seduction, and brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Indictment charging W. E. McTyler with seduction of Miss Ida Jennings "by persuasions and promises of marriage." Verdict of guilty. Exception to denial of new trial. Besides the general grounds, the motion for new trial sets forth the following:

(1) Error in admitting the testimony of Miss Ida Jennings, over the objection of defendant's counsel, in relation to promises of marriage after the alleged seduction.

(2) Error in permitting Miss Ida Jennings to testify, over the objection of defendant's counsel, "that he told me, if I yielded to him that time, he would not ask me such a question any more,"—there being no charge in the indictment of "other false and fraudulent means;" and error in admitting a letter purporting to have been written by the defendant, after the alleged seduction, to Miss Ida Jennings.

(3) William Laney was introduced as a witness by defendant, and he testified that he knew the defendant, but did not know Miss Jennings. Defendant's counsel asked: "Ever heard of her?" Answer. "Only through Mr. Johnny Jennings. In October or November I kept the track out on the Sam road. He came out there down to where I was working, after they had arrested McTyler." Here the state's counsel objected to the witness stating what Mr. John Jennings told him. The court inquired: "How are the sayings of some one else admissible?" Defendant's counsel replied: "It is what people say about her character. That is how her character has been sought to be established by the state. What we expect to prove is what her own kinsman said." By the Court: "I don't care to hear what you expect to prove. I will hear from you as to the admissibility of the sayings of a third party. The rule, as I understand it, is this: That you can show character by general repute, but that you cannot show it, or the want of it, by specific acts. When a witness swears as to general character, then you can, on cross-examination, inquire into his knowledge by asking as to specific acts. I understand that you propose to show by this witness what some other person said." Counsel: "I have not stated that. I propose to prove her general character by means known to this witness and myself." The Court: "You have not stated that, but the witness started to tell what he had heard some one else say." Counsel: "I expect to prove certain things by this witness going to show her general character,—what her own kinsman thought of it." The Court: "I ask you now, by statements made by some other person to this witness?" Counsel: "I will tell your honor, if you want me to, what I propose to show by this witness." The Court: "The evidence is ruled out. I asked you what you proposed to prove, and you decline to state it." Except as above stated, the court did not refuse, nor did the defendant offer, to prove the character of Miss Jennings for virtue. The motion for new trial alleges that the court erred in refusing to allow defendant to prove her general character for virtue, by showing her reputation among her own relatives; and also in making the statements above quoted, in presence of the jury.

(4, 5, 6, 7, 8.) One of the jurors who tried the case was W. R. Drane. After verdict, one Brannon made affidavit that, on Tuesday night before the trial of McTyler on Friday, Drane remarked to deponent and others, while in the investigation of another case in which they were jurors, that he believed McTyler was guilty of seduction as charged, and that, if he (Drane) was selected or put on the jury to try McTyler, he would convict him, which facts and information deponent did not make known to either McTyler or any of his counsel until after McTyler's trial. Defendant's counsel made affidavit that they knew nothing of the remark, "I believe W. E. McTyler guilty of seduction, and he should suffer the punishment of the law," made by Drane before the trial, until the trial had been gone into, and most of the evidence delivered to the jury; and that, immediately after they were informed as to the remark having been so made, they made it known to the court, and proposed to establish it by proof, moving for a mistrial, but the court refused to hear the proof, and overruled the motion. In rebuttal, Drane's affidavit is as follows: He did not say to Brannon or any one else that if he was on the jury he would find McTyler guilty of seduction, nor that he believed McTyler was guilty of seduction as charged, and that if he (Drane) was selected or put upon the jury to try McTyler he would convict him. He has not in five years spoken to Brannon, who is his personal enemy. He was with Brannon on the jury that tried Joe Duckworth for rape at the same term, and some of the jury said, "If we clear old Duck, we will be on these other two screwing cases;" whereupon deponent said, merely in jest: "If that be the case, boys, I make a move to find them all guilty now, of the offense of rape, on the ground that they are all so ugly they can't get any unless they do rape, and recommend all to the mercy of the court, and let the court turn them loose. That will save the lawyers three or four long speeches apiece, and old man Hudson, and will save the court three or four days' work." Deponent had never heard any of the evidence under oath, had never formed or expressed any opinion about the case of McTyler, and did not express any opinion to anybody about the case. To the same effect are affidavits by seven others of the jury who tried Duckworth, in one of which occurs the additional statement that Duckworth's case had not been submitted to the jury when Drane made his remark; also that, when the remark was made, Brannon said to a juror by whom he was sitting that that looked like trying cases "before them came before us." The defendant submitted the affidavits of three persons that during the dinner recess of court, as the jury were being carried to dinner, and just as they were passing a crowd assembled in front of the courthouse, one Cosby, who was but five or six feet distant, addressed to the jury in a loud tone the words, "We, the jury, find the defendant guilty." In one of these affidavits it is stated that the affiant was bailiff in charge of the jury; that he heard Cosby's remark, whose face was turned to the jury, many of whom were nearer Cosby than affiant. In another of the affidavits the affiant says that there was a large crowd on the sidewalk which obstructed the street; that it took an effort on the part of the bailiffs in charge of the jury to make a passage for the jury through the crowd; that Cosby was speaking and conversing about the trial to affiant and others; that he heard Cosby utter to and in the presence of the jury, in a loud tone, the words, "Jury, we, the jury, find W. E. McTyler guilty;" and that affiant heard various members of the crowd say that would have an effect on the jury trying the case, and an influence over the jury. The third affiant says that he was bailiff of the court, and his account agrees with that of the bailiff first mentioned. It appears that the defendant was present at the time and place the words were said. His affidavit agrees with those of the bailiffs as to what the words were; and he further swears that the whole group of men were staring at the jury as they passed; that on the utterance of the words the jury turned and looked at Cosby and the group, and that the bailiff arrested Cosby, and placed him in charge of another officer of the court. J. M. Duckworth made affidavit that he was one of the bailiffs in charge of the jury, and was in front of them at the time in question, pushing and asking for passage through the crowd, and, his whole attention being directed to this purpose, he did not hear the words spoken by Cosby. In rebuttal are the following affidavits: By J. D. Duckworth, that he was present with Cosby, defendant, McTyler, and others, at the time in question, and heard McTyler say to Cosby: "If I had my pistol with me, I would shoot you;" and Cosby remarked: "By the time you get through with the shooting you have done, I reckon you will be satisfied. Just wait till the jury comes down and says, 'We, the jury, find the prisoner guilty.'" That these words were said in an ordinary tone, and Cosby's back was towards the jury, who were passing about 20 or 30 feet away; that he did not use the remark to the jury, and did not address the jury, but said the words in jest, whereupon deponent told him to hush, that there went the jury,—and that there was no excitement nor loud talking in the crowd. The affidavit of Cosby is to the same effect. He further says that he was summoned as a witness in the case; that, when he made the remark to defendant, he did not know any of the jury were passing, but when Duckworth told him to hush, etc., he turned and saw the jury passing; that he did not then know a single man on the jury, and did not know who the jury was, and was astonished when arrested and told that it was for a remark he had made before a jury; that he was a friend to McTyler, had no interest in the trial for or against him, and, if his sympathy went out for anybody, it would be for McTyler; that he did not know the prosecutor, nor the lady McTyler seduced; that the affidavits for the defendant are mistaken as to his addressing those remarks to the jury, for he did not see the jury, and did not know there was a jury about, until Duckworth called his attention to it; and that he is familiar with the practice of the courts, and would not have used that remark in the presence of the jury, under any circumstances, had he known the jury was present. All of the jurors made affidavits that the verdict was based solely on the evidence and the charge of the court, and that they were not influenced by Cosby's remark. All of them save one swore that they did not hear the remark made, and this one swore that he did not know who made it, and was not influenced by it. One swore that he heard in the jury room, while the case was under consideration, that Cosby had said, in the hearing of the jury, to find the defendant guilty, and that this remark was discussed in the jury room. Drane and another juror swore that it was not discussed in the jury room in their presence; and this other swore that he never heard of it at all until Sunday morning after the trial, when he was at home. Under the above facts, the defendant alleges that a new trial ought to be granted, because the court overruled his motion to declare a mistrial; because the conduct of Cosby was an attempt to influence the jury into finding a verdict of guilty as an expression of public opinion; because Drane had prejudged the case, and had made up his mind to convict without hearing the evidence; and because the jury discussed Cosby's remark in the jury room.

(9) The court charged: "It matters not to you nor to me what the public may think. It matters not with whom the public opinion is,—whether it be for the accused, or for the woman who is alleged to have been seduced. * * * Let the public be pleased, or let them be displeased, with the matter; as I have already said, you have nothing to do." This charge is assigned as error in causing the jury to presume that there was a public prevailing opinion and sentiment in the case, and that it had not come to their knowledge; and in tending to mislead and influence the jury into making their verdict unfavorable to the defendant, etc.

(10) The court charged: "Now, if you find from the evidence in this case, considering in that connection the prisoner's statement," etc. The error alleged is in restricting the statement, and leaving the jury no alternative but to consider it with the evidence, and not otherwise.

(11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21.) Errors in the charge: "The indictment is founded upon this section of the Code." (Code, § 4371, read.) "The term 'virtuous,' as used in this section of the Code, upon which this prosecution is based, has a legal meaning and significance. What is a virtuous unmarried woman is a question of law to be decided by the court, and not a question for the jury." "The presumption of the law is that the female alleged to have been seduced was virtuous, and that presumption remains until removed by proof." "But unless the evidence, direct or circumstantial, should satisfy the jury that she had lost her virtue,—had had illicit intercourse with man,—the jury should pronounce her virtuous." "The repeating of the engagement vow at the time of the sexual intercourse may imply persuasion." "Another way of impeaching a witness is by the proof of a general bad character, or by proof of general bad character as to the subject-matter of the inquiry. When it is sought to impeach a witness by the proof of general bad character in any one particular, such witness may be sustained, or his credit restored, by the proof of general good character, or by the proof of general character in respect to the matter or subject of inquiry. Whether a witness has been impeached by any of these modes is a question of fact for the jury." "And, if you should believe that a witness has been impeached, then the testimony of such witness should be set aside; you should not consider it unless it should be sustained and supported by circumstances or other testimony which you believe to be true." "Now, the court permitted some evidence to go to you as to the conduct, sayings, and declarations of the accused after the time of the alleged seduction. The court permitted the evidence to go to you, not for the purpose of constituting, of itself, proof of seduction." It is alleged that this charge tended to mislead and confuse the jury. "If you should believe, from the evidence and the principles of law applied thereto, as I have given them to you in charge, that he is not guilty of seduction, but is guilty of the offense of fornication, the lesser offense," etc. The error here alleged is in joining a felony with a misdemeanor; there being but one count in the indictment, and the charge being vague and uncertain, with no evidence to support it. "If you have that sort of a doubt resting upon your mind, it is your duty to give the prisoner the benefit of it. I charge you, however, that in legal investigation mathematical certainty," etc. The error alleged is in the use of the word "however;" it being contended that such use conveys the idea that the charge of reasonable doubt has no bearing on the question, and that there is no reasonable doubt in the case. "The prisoner has a right to make a statement to the jury, which is not under oath, and which is not, technically speaking, evidence; but the law permits it to go to the jury along with the evidence." The error alleged is in using the word "permits;" thereby leading the jury to believe the statement was only suffered to go to them, instead of being made as a right.

L. J. Blalock, W. H. Kimbrough, and J. B. Pillsbury, for plaintiff in error. C. B. Hudson, Sol. Gen., J. B. Hudson, and Harrison & Peeples, for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. A full discussion of the numerous points ruled in this case would require an opinion of great length and tedious minuteness. No such seems necessary; and merely to restate the points and reiterate the rulings announced in the syllabus would be unprofitable. In most instances the correctness of these rulings is sufficiently apparent on the face of them. The propositions in which they are embodied and enunciated are almost self-evident. We leave the case to stand on the headnotes, together with the facts set out in the official report. Judgment affirmed.

HENRY v. MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF MACON.

DOPSON v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 13, 1893.)

MUNICIPAL AUTHORITY — REGULATING MARKET — REASONABLENESS OF ORDINANCE — EVIDENCE OF VIOLATION.

1. Where successive statutes confer powers on a municipal corporation, they are, so far as consistent in their provisions, to be taken in pari materia, and construed together as one law. Thus where, by an act passed in 1866, the authorities of the city of Macon were empowered to prohibit by ordinance the sale of certain marketable articles in the city elsewhere than in the city market, and by an act passed in 1886 the authorities were authorized to construct a public market house on any one of the public streets in the city, and to pass suitable ordinances for the proper regulation thereof, the power granted by the first act could be exercised just as if the grant had been repeated in the second. Under this rule there was, after a market had been erected in a street, and established as the city market, no want of legislative authority to pass an ordinance prohibiting the sale of certain articles within market hours elsewhere within the city than at said market. The recital in the ordinance of the act of 1886 instead of the act of 1866 as the source of such authority did not vitiate the ordinance.

2. Where a statute grants the power to prohibit the sale of marketable commodities in a city elsewhere than in the city market, without any limitation as to time or hours, it will not be construed literally, for, if so construed, it would be void. The proper construction of it is that the legislative intent was to confer power to prohibit sales during the reasonable hours appropriated for selling at the market, and to leave the privilege of selling elsewhere open for exercise during the rest of the day or night. An ordinance which fixes market hours from daylight till 10 o'clock A. M. in the winter, and from 3 o'clock till 9 A. M. in the summer, with the addition of an afternoon service on Saturdays, extending from 3 P. M. to 8 P. M. in the summer, and 9 P. M. in the winter, is reasonable as to hours, and such an ordinance may be passed and enforced under the general legislative grant above referred to.

3. Evidence that the shop of the accused was open, and that he and his employes were "proceeding to sell beef and other meats," is sufficient, prima facie, to prove that he sold beef and other meats, or offered to sell them.

Error from superior court, Bibb county; A. L. Miller, Judge.

W. L. Henry and Walter Dopson were convicted of violating an ordinance regulating the market in the city of Macon, and each brings error. Affirmed.

Dessau & Bartlett, for plaintiff in error Henry. S. A. Reid and Washington Dessau, for plaintiff in error Dopson. R. W. Patterson, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The acts of 1866 and 1886, conferring powers on the municipal corporation of Macon in respect to markets, are, so far as consistent in their provisions, to be taken in pari materia, and construed together as one law. The former act empowers the municipal authorities to prohibit by ordinance the sale of certain marketable articles elsewhere in the city than in the city market. The latter act authorizes the construction of a public market house in any one of the public streets in the city, and empowers the authorities to pass suitable ordinances for the proper regulation thereof. If the power conferred by the first act had been repeated in the second, there could be no doubt that after a market was constructed in a street of the city, and established as the city market, there would have been no want of legislative authority to pass such an ordinance as the first act contemplated. By construing the two acts together as one law, we reach the same result. When the new market in the street had been erected and established as the city market, the act of 1866 applied to it just the same as it had previously applied to any city market which the city may have had. The ordinance which was in fact passed referred to the act of 1886, by recital, as the source of authority for passing it; but this did not vitiate the ordinance, for the recital was unnecessary, and may be treated as surplusage. See Acts 1866, p. 283; Acts 1886, p. 224.

2. As the act of 1866 grants power to prohibit sales elsewhere than in the city market, without any express limitation as to time or hours, must we conclude that the legislature intended to be taken literally, and must we hold that on that account the grant of power is void? We think not. It is more reasonable to construe the statute as intending to confer power to prohibit sales during the reasonable hours appropriated to selling at the market, and leave the remaining hours open for selling elsewhere during the day or night. So construed, the act is valid. There is not the least reason for thinking that the legislature intended to confer any larger power than they could confer. They simply omitted, by inadvertence, to qualify and limit their language so as to express the meaning accurately which was in their minds. They knew by a prior decision of this court (Bethune v. Hughes, 28 Ga. 560) that they could not confer authority to pass any ordinance which would be wholly prohibitory upon sales elsewhere than in the city market. What they really intended was to confer a power as large as they could confer, but no larger; and this construction was conformed to by the municipal authorities of the city in framing the ordinance which is alleged to have been violated. That ordinance fixes market hours from daylight till 10 o'clock A. M. in the winter, and from 8 o'clock till 9 A. M. in the summer, with the addition of an afternoon service on Saturdays, extending from 3 o'clock P. M. to 8 o'clock P. M. in the summer, and to 9 o'clock P. M. in the winter. This is a reasonable ordinance as to hours, and it may be enforced under the general legislative grant above referred to. It does not prohibit, or undertake to prohibit, any sale within the city, except during these market hours.

3. There was no controversy that the terms of the ordinance, as well as the act of 1866, were broad enough to cover fish and meats, the particular articles involved in these two cases; but in one of the cases under consideration it was contended that the proof was insufficient to establish any violation of the ordinance. The evidence showed that the shop of the accused was open, and that he and his employes "were proceeding to sell beef and other meats." We think the prima facie meaning of this phraseology is that he sold beef and other meats, or offered them for sale, in his shop. When a man has his shop open, and is proceeding to sell an article, he is engaged in selling it; and to be so engaged he must have a customer present, and a bargain must have been just consummated, or in progress, or about to be begun. The ordinance would be violated by either selling or offering to sell. The proof was ample that it was within market hours. Judgment affirmed.

MANN et al. v. POOLE et al.¹

ASSIGNMENT FOR THE BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—PREFERENCES—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Defendant allowed notes to go to protest, and judgment to be taken against him by default, in January; was consciously insolvent in February, when he executed mortgages for $12,000 to members of his family to secure previously incurred debts; denied the execution of the mortgages in April, but put them on file a few days before making an assignment for the benefit of creditors, in May; and his liabilities were $38,000, his assets, $26,000, and his preferred debts, including the mortgages, were $23,000. Held, that defendant contemplated the assignment when he executed the mortgages, and that the assignment and mortgages, together, constituted an assignment with preferences.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Action by Jacob Mann, Henry Mann, and Leon Mann (as partners under the firm name of J. & H. Mann & Co.) against J. T. Poole, as an individual, and as guardian of J. Ralph Martin, Annie Louise Martin, and Leonora Martin, N. B. Dial, (as assignee of J. T. Poole,) Anna W. Poole, J. Ralph Martin, Annie Louise Martin, and Leonora Martin, on promissory notes, to set aside mortgages and a deed of assignment, and for the appointment of a receiver. Judgment for plaintiffs on the notes, setting aside the assignment, and appointing a receiver. Both parties appeal. Modified.

Ball, Simkins & Ball, Simpson & Barksdale, Ferguson & Featherstone, and Johnson & Richey, for plaintiffs. W. H. Martin and F. P. McGowan, for defendants.

POPE, J. The plaintiffs commenced their action against the defendants on the 21st June, 1892, in the court of common pleas for Laurens county, in this state. The complaint, substantially, alleged that the defendant J. T. Poole, who was a merchant in the town of Laurens, was indebted to the plaintiffs, a mercantile firm, for goods and merchandise sold and delivered to the defendant J. T. Poole during the months of March and September, 1891, amounting in value to $531.50, and as an evidence of this said indebtedness the defendant had made and delivered to them his two promissory notes, due in 60 and 90 days, respectively, from the 28th January, 1892,—the date of said notes,— less the sum of $50, which he had, previous to the last date, paid on such indebtedness; that the said J. T. Poole, who is the grandfather of the defendants J. Ralph Martin, Annie Louise Martin, and Leonora Martin, and with whom said defendants reside, is the general guardian of said defendants, all of whom are infants under the age of 14 years; that the said J. T. Poole, on the 2d day of February, 1892, executed a mortgage on four tracts of land, aggregating more than 1,300 acres, and situate in the county of Spartanburg, unto his wife, the defendant Anna W. Poole, to secure two promissory notes aggregating $3,559, dated, respectively, 16th September, 1891, and 10th October, 1891, and due 60 days and 1 day after date, respectively; that on the 9th of February, 1892, the defendant executed unto the infant defendants, J. Ralph Martin, Annie Louise Martin, and Leonora Martin, two mortgages,—one covering all his stock of goods in the town of Laurens, and the other covering all the lands situate in Spartanburg county, which had been previously mortgaged to his wife, the said Anna W. Poole,—and that the alleged consideration of said mortgages to his three grandchildren was the securing the three bonds, each for $5,000, he had executed to the judge of probate of Laurens, as the guardian of the three said grandchildren, in January and February, 1891; that on the 18th May, 1892, the said J. T. Poole executed a deed whereby he conveyed unto N. B. Dial, the defendant, as assignee to pay his debts, all his property, real and personal, enumerated in said deed of assignment; that said N. B. Dial accepted such trust, and thereafter, on the 19th May, 1892, such deed of assignment was duly recorded in Laurens county, and on the 29th May, 1892, was recorded in Spartanburg county; that said Dial has possessed himself of the assigned estate, and is disposing of the same under said deed. The complaint charges that the said J. T. Poole has withheld certain property from the operation of the terms of said deed of assignment, in fraud of the rights of his creditors; that the mortgages to his wife and grandchildren were a fraud upon his creditors, in that thereby the said J. T. Poole, who was then insolvent, and being largely indebted to many persons and firms, intended to secure an advantage to himself and different members of his family. Wherefore, the plaintiffs pray judgment (1) for a judgment against J. T. Poole for their debt; (2) setting aside, as null and void, the mortgages to the wife and grandchildren of the said John T. Poole, and also the deed of assignment to N. B. Dial, as assignee; (3) for an injunction against N. B. Dial, restraining him from collecting and selling any of the assets of the assigned estate, and from distributing the same, and also enjoining J. T. Poole from disposing or interfering with his property; (4) for the appointment of a receiver. The answers denied any impropriety or fraud in any of the transactions, as set out in the complaint, denied the right of plaintiffs to any of the relief sought, and prayed that the complaint be dismissed.

Testimony was taken before a special referee, and reported to the court. The cause came on to be heard before the Honorable J. J. Norton, as presiding judge in the court of common pleas for Laurens county, at February term, 1893, on the pleadings and testimony already taken. By his decree rendered on the 2d May, 1893, he held: (1) That the mortgages by J. T. Poole to Anna W. Poole, and to Leonora Martin, Annie Louise Martin, and J. Ralph Martin, both joint and several, are not parts of the general assignment of J. T. Poole for the benefit of his creditors, but are valid, subsisting liens upon the property embraced in them, respectively. The last three are entitled to payment out of the funds in the hands of N. B. Dial, the proceeds of the stock of goods which were mortgaged therein. (2) That the paper purporting to be a general assignment by J. T. Poole for the benefit of his creditors, dated 18th May, 1892, be set aside. (3) That Harvey W. Anderson be appointed receiver of all the real and personal property embraced in the deed of assignment. (4) That Harvey W. Anderson, before entering upon the discharge of the duties of his office as receiver, do enter into a bond, in the penal sum of $20,000, conditioned to secure the performance of his duties as receiver, before the clerk of court for Laurens, with sureties to be approved as sufficient by said clerk. (5) That N. B. Dial shall turn over to such receiver all the property of the assigned estate; the proceeds derived from sale to be in lieu of the property sold. Reserving the question whether N. B. Dial is entitled to any compensation, and, if any, how much, to the further order of court. (6) That the plaintiffs pay the costs to date of defendants Anna W. Poole, and the three minor grandchildren. (7) That plaintiffs have judgment against J. T. Poole for the sum of $481.50, with interest from 1st March, 1892, and also some additional interest and costs up to date. (8) That the clerk advertise for six consecutive weeks for creditors of J. T. Poole to present and establish before him their respective demands, on pain, upon failure to do so, of being barred of all benefit under this decree. (9) That, J. T. Poole's real estate, situate in Spartanburg county, not having been embraced in his purported assignment, the mortgagees thereof may enforce their mortgages thereon, as they may feel advised, both as to that portion dealt with by N. B. Dial in his supposed character as assignee, and also those portions of such real estate with which said Dial has not interfered. Anna W. Poole will, however, remain a party to this action, for the purpose of adjusting her equities in regard to any surplus or deficiency.

Both plaintiffs and defendants have appealed from this decree.

The grounds of such appeal by the plaintiffs are: First. Because the circuit judge erred in finding (1) that the note executed by J. T. Poole to his wife, Anna W. Poole, on the 10th day of October, 1891, was due 90 days after date, the same being really due one day after date; (2) that the Spartanburg lands, 1,356 acres, were omitted by J. T. Poole from his assignment; (3) that J. T. Poole, at the time of giving the mortgage to his wife, and the mortgage to his wards, had no intention of making a general assignment afterwards; (4) "that the mortgages in favor of Anna W. Poole and of the minors are valid, and not obnoxious to chapter 72 of the General Statutes of this state, prohibiting an insolvent debtor from giving a preference to any creditor in an assignment for the benefit of creditors, but are within the provision [allowing] an insolvent debtor to make such preference at any time more than ninety days prior to the making of such assignment;" (5) that the mortgage from J. T. Poole to his wife, and the mortgages from him to his wards, are not parts of his general assignment for the benefit of his creditors, but are valid and subsisting liens upon the property embraced in them; (6) that the mortgages to the wards are entitled to payment out of the proceeds of the stock of goods in the hands of N. B. Dial, Esq.; (7) that Mrs. Anna W. Poole may proceed to foreclose her mortgage over the Spartanburg lands, independent of this action, and of the receiver appointed herein. Second. Because the circuit judge erred in not holding (1) that J. T. Poole, when he made the mortgages to his wife and to his wards, intended following them, after 90 days, with his assignment for the benefit of his creditors; (2) that the mortgages of J. T. Poole to his wife and to his wards were intended to be, and are, in effect, parts and parcels of his general assignment, and, with said assignment, are void, as operating to give his said wife and wards preferences; (3) that the mortgages to Poole's wards were in fact mortgages to himself, whereby he undertakes to secure for himself the use of the money, and commissions thereon, for many years; (4) that the Spartanburg lands should be taken in charge by the receiver, and by him disposed of under the orders of this court. Third. Because the circuit judge erred in adjudging plaintiffs to pay the costs of the defendant mortgagees.

The defendants set up these grounds of appeal: (1) Because his honor erred in finding that J. T. Poole omitted from his schedule and assignment his lands in Spartanburg county, containing 1,356 acres. (2) Because his honor erred in holding that, under the terms of the deed of assignment, no property was conveyed, except that embraced in the schedule. (3) Because his honor erred in holding that the construction of the deed of assignment was not affected by subsequently setting apart as a homestead the personal property omitted from the schedule, when such construction was based upon testimony aliunde. (4) Because his honor erred in holding that the omission of property from the schedule, combined with the requirement of releases from creditors, made the assignment fraudulent, and voidable by creditors. (5) Because his honor erred in holding that J. T. Poole intentionally omitted any personal property from his schedule, and that there was no testimony explaining such omission. (6) Because his honor erred in holding that the terms of the deed of assignment necessarily implied that the homestead and exemption were reserved out of the property conveyed. (7) Because his honor erred in holding that the defendant J. T. Poole was consciously insolvent at the time of, or subsequent to, the execution of the mortgage to Anna W. Poole. (8) Because his honor erred in directing N. B. Dial, the assignee, to turn over the gross proceeds of sale, and the assigned property, to H. W. Anderson, as receiver. (9) Because his honor erred in rendering a personal judgment against J. T. Poole in favor of the plaintiffs—First, because such judgment was not within the scope of this action; second, because the decree did not ascertain the amount alleged to be due the plaintiffs. (10) Because his honor erred in setting aside the deed of assignment, and appointing a receiver.

We will consider the grounds of appeal of the plaintiffs in their order:

(1) There is no difficulty in sustaining this ground of appeal. The circuit judge, for the moment, disregarded the pleadings and the proof. The note of J. T. Poole to his wife, Anna W. Poole, for $1,200, and dated 10th of October, 1891, was really due 1 day after that date, and not 90 days after date, as found by the circuit judge.

(2) Nor is there any difficulty in sustaining the second ground of appeal. However, justice to the circuit judge requires us to say that it was admitted in the argument before us that this error arose from a defective copy of the assignment deed furnished by counsel to the court. This was not intentional on the part of counsel here engaged, but, as we shall see later on, serious results have followed from this unintentional oversight. The 1,356 acres of land situated in Spartanburg county were included in the deed of assignment executed by J. T. Poole on the 18th day of May, 1892.

We will next consider the remaining grounds of appeal, (being those numbered, respectively, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, under the first branch of these grounds of appeal, presented by plaintiffs:)

To do justice to all parties concerned, it may be well to group the facts that bear upon this branch of the controversy: J. T. Poole was not only a practicing physician at Laurens, but he conducted a large mercantile establishment there. Not only so, but he was the owner of a handsome dwelling house there. Besides all these, he owned 1,356 acres of land in Spartanburg county, and some farming lands in Laurens county. It seems that he had been a partner, prior to 1890, with his son-in-law, Mr. Jordson Martin, who died before 1890, and that this mercantile firm had lost money in their business. To protect two sureties on an indebtedness to the National Bank of Laurens, he had mortgaged his dwelling house in Laurens up to its full value. He also had placed a mortgage upon his real estate in Spartanburg county, to Shattuck & Huffman, to secure a debt that, 22d November, 1892, amounted to $2,700. In the first months of the year 1891, he had become the general guardian for his three grandchildren,—J. Ralph, Annie Louise, and Leonora Martin,—and on the 1st January, 1892, he owed them $7,500. He also owed his wife, Anna W. Poole, $3,559, that he borrowed in September and October, 1891. Not only did he owe these sums, but he was indebted to others for more than $15,000. On the 19th January, 1892, he accepted service of summons and complaint, and consented that judgment be taken against him for about $1,000 for two commercial creditors. His affairs, so far as payment to his creditors were concerned, were in such shape that he allowed notes and drafts through the two banks at Laurens, during the months of December, 1891, and January, 1892, to be presented and returned for nonpayment. He answered attorneys who presented demands for payment that he was unable to pay them. On the 2d February, 1892, he gave his wife, Mrs. Anna W. Poole, a mortgage of his lands in Spartanburg to secure the debt of $3,559 that he owed her. This mortgage was recorded in Spartanburg in March, 1892. On the 9th of February, 1892, he executed a mortgage to his three grandchildren, who were his wards, on his lands in Spartanburg county, to secure them from loss at his hands as guardian. This mortgage was recorded in May, 1892. On the same day, 9th February, 1892, he executed to each of his three wards a mortgage upon his stock of goods in Laurens to secure them against loss by reason of his guardianship of their estates. In April, 1892, he denied, in effect, that he had executed these mortgages to his wife and three grandchildren. On the 9th May, 1892, these mortgages on his stock of goods were marked as filed for record, although Mr. L. W. Simkins, an attorney for creditors, could find no trace of them in the clerk's office on the 16th May, 1892, when he searched that office for liens upon Poole's property. On the 18th May, 1892, he executed a deed of assignment. This last deed was duly recorded on the 19th May, 1892, and under it Mr. N. B. Dial was the assignee. The object of the plaintiffs is to set this assignment aside—First, because the assignor, Poole, did not include all his property in the assignment; and, second, because prior to the assignment, and in contemplation thereof, mortgages for large sums were executed by the assignor to members of his own family for the purpose of preferring the mortgagees, and that such mortgages and assignment were parts and parcels of one transaction, and constitute an assignment giving preferences, in violation of the assignment act. We will pass over, for the present, the question of the omission from the assignment of certain property of the assignor. Really, the grounds of appeal we are now considering embody the second ground of attack upon the validity of this deed of assignment. It is no longer profitable, in the light of the repeated adjudications of this court on the subject, to consider the right of an insolvent debtor to give a mortgage to one or more of his creditors, when it is intended that such a mortgage or mortgages shall operate as mere securities to secure such creditor or creditors, bona fides. In the light of our decisions, whenever it becomes necessary to canvass the transactions of insolvent debtors with their creditors who are preferred by receiving a lien upon such insolvent debtor's property to the exclusion of all other creditors, so as to determine whether such preferences are obnoxious to the provisions of chapter 72 of our General Statutes, the crucial test is this: Was it the intention of the insolvent debtor to honestly secure the debt of one or more of his creditors by giving a judgment or a mortgage or an assignment of certain choses in action, or was it his purpose thereby to give one or more of his creditors a preference over other creditors? Thus, the intention of the insolvent debtor must be ascertained, and this presents a question of fact. The circuit judge, in this action, has found as a fact that John T. Poole, at the time he executed these mortgages to his wife and three grandchildren, was consciously insolvent, but his honor would not go any further in this direction. The appellants ask this court to examine the facts, as proved, and see if their charges as to these mortgages are not true. The settled rule of this court is that the findings of fact by a circuit judge will be accepted here, unless they are without any testimony to sustain them, or are manifestly against the weight of the testimony. We cannot say that there is an absence of testimony here, because he has found that the indebtedness of J. T. Poole to his wife and three grandchildren, respectively, was a bona fide indebtedness, and it is admitted that the mortgages were executed at their respective dates, and there is not a scintilla of testimony, respecting the conduct of Mrs. Poole or the grandchildren, to impeach their good faith. It remains to see if the conclusions of the circuit judge are manifestly against the weight of the testimony. Granted, that, if there are ties in human life that appeal to the heart of man, it is the marital tie, that bids a man protect the wife of his bosom, or the sacred duty he owes to the prattling babe,—the offspring of a dead child. Delicate and tender as are all these, yet the laws require that, when the property of the wife or the grandchildren pass under the control and custody of the husband and grandfather, the time to be most careful is the moment when such property comes into his hands. If J. T. Poole had executed a mortgage to his wife at the time he borrowed her money, or had executed a mortgage to the sureties on his guardianship bonds when he became guardian, that would have been one thing. To wait months in one case, and a year in the others, presents a more serious question. The deed of assignment, in the inventory of property attached thereto, values his estate at $43,415.58, and his indebtedness at $32,473.68. If this was a correct estimate, Poole was solvent, but what does the testimony disclose? N. B. Dial, in his testimony, states that debts against the assigned estate for between $33,000 and $34,000 have been presented to him. The costs and fees connected with the assignment will not be less than $2,500. Thus, his liabilities range at about $36,000. Mr. Dial, in his testimony, thus places his estimate upon Poole's property:

Stock of goods sold for.....	$ 8,757 81
His choses in action, \$9,815.15, worth $\frac{1}{4}$	3,271 71
The Whitmire place and the Davis place	1,800 00
4 other tracts in Spartanburg, (home place, 60 acres; Garrett place, 60 acres; $\frac{1}{2}$ Montgomery place,)....	2,407 00
The bal. of Montgomery tract and the Ferguson tract.....	1,000 00
Mrs. E. Poole tract, 60 acres.....	400 00
Sexton place, 317 acres.....	1,500 00
The Bolton place.....	500 00
Phelson place, (testimony of L. A. Langston,) Laurens.....	200 00
The Judge Martin place, in Laurens	2,550 00
Home place	5,000 00
	$27,386 52

Deduct from this sum his home- stead	1,000 00
---	----------

Total available assets.....	$26,386 52
-----------------------------	-------------

Compare this sum with his debts, $36,000, and his estate will not pay his debts, in full, by $10,000.

Now, the home place is mortgaged, virtually, to National Bank of Laurens	$ 5,000 00
The judgments obtained in February	1,000 00
The mortgage of Shattuck & Huffman is	2,700 00
The mortgage of Mrs. Anna H. Poole is (and interest).....	3,800 00
The mortgage of the grandchildren is $7,500 and interest.....	8,500 00
The costs and expenditures of assigned estate are.....	2,500 00

Amount of preferred debts is..	$23,500 00
--------------------------------	-------------

Deduct this from available assets, $26,386.52, leaves $2,886.52 left of this estate for all other creditors. When the interest and costs account are accurately stated, there will not be the sum of $2,866.52 for general or unpreferred creditors. Of $23,500 of preferences, over $12,000 is to his own family,—to his wife and grandchildren. Courts of justice cannot be expected to sanction such bald-faced wrong. Whether such sanction is expected or not, the proof should not be wanting that they will not. To expect any man to believe that Dr. Poole did not systematically contrive this result is asking too much of human credulity. Every step makes a design. See the judgments, unresisted, for $1,000. See how quick he is to pay off claims under $100, when suit is brought in the court of trial justice. See the vigilant care to have the mortgages to his grandchildren marked "Filed" 9th May, 1892, in the clerk's office, when the assignment is made on the 18th May, 1892. These mortgages are from himself to himself, virtually, for, as general guardian, he could collect and control every dollar of this more than $8,500. And there is a clause in these mortgages to his grandchildren, who are his wards, wherein there is a covenant in which he seems to look forward to such a step as an assignment. To our minds, the weight of the testimony is manifestly against the conclusions of the circuit judge, and these grounds of appeal are sustained. But, as to the seventh, it is necessary to explain that the circuit judge was innocently led into this mistake, as has already been explained under subdivision 2 of the first general division. The conclusions just announced render it unnecessary to do more than announce that we sustain all the remaining grounds of appeal presented by the plaintiffs.

Let us next consider the grounds of appeal presented by the defendants:

(1) We sustain the first exception of these appellants. As we have before remarked, this was an innocent error on the part of the circuit judge.

(2) As to the second exception, we do not feel that it is necessary for us to pass upon this nice question, for we have already decided that the assignment was void for another or other reasons; but it is well to remark that, under the circumstances of this case, we would not feel at liberty to canvass the decision of the circuit judge, when it relates to the invalidity of the deed of assignment on the ground that the assignor failed to include therein all his property, for it must be remembered that the circuit judge found as facts that assignor had omitted 1,356 acres of land situate in Spartanburg, and $218.25 of personal property, from the inventory attached to the deed of assignment, and as a part thereof. Now, this court could not undertake to say whether the circuit judge would have vacated and annulled the deed of assignment if only $218.25 of personal property was omitted from such deed, or not, for he certainly had in his mind the omission of the Spartanburg lands being 1,356 acres. Hence, while we have been pleased with the ability of the counsel for the respective parties to this appeal in arguing this proposition, we must decline to consider it, in justice to the circuit judge. Indeed, but for our conclusion on the other branch of the case, we fear our duty would have required us to send the cause back for a rehearing in the circuit court. The third exception, for the reasons just given, cannot be sustained. And so, also, for similar reasons, we cannot sustain the fourth exception. The fifth exception, under our views of the conduct of J. T. Poole, could not be sustained.

We think the decision of the circuit judge was correct, in holding that the terms of the deed necessarily imply that the homestead and exemption were reserved out of the property conveyed. The very terms of the instrument seem to demand this construction. Hence, the sixth exception is overruled. We do not think it necessary to repeat the testimony relied upon by us to support the consciousness of J. T. Poole that he was insolvent at the time of, or subsequent to, the execution of the mortgage to Anna W. Poole. How any other conclusion could have been reached by Dr. Poole, in his mind, we cannot conjecture.

As to the eighth ground of appeal, we are somewhat perplexed. The deed of assignment has been declared by us to be invalid, and it would seem that N. B. Dial, having gained his connection with the assigned estate under that invalid deed, would not be able to do otherwise than surrender all connection with said property, under the terms of Judge Norton's decree; yet we are confronted, in the case, with an order, consented to by all the parties to this controversy, that Mr. Dial should use at least $2,700 of the assigned estate in his hands to pay a preferred creditor of the assigned estate. It does seem that to this extent, at least, he is entitled to his fees, as fixed by law, without any regard to what other compensation shall attach, under the orders of court in this case, to the services rendered the assigned estate by Mr. Dial. The decree should be so modified that, in paying over the assigned estate, Mr. Dial should be allowed the usual commissions on this $2,700 received and paid out to Shattuck & Huffman. And to this extent, alone, we sustain the eighth exception, the remainder thereof being overruled.

As to the ninth ground of appeal, we apprehend it will not be seriously considered necessary for us to say much. The claim of plaintiffs had to be established, in order to entitle the plaintiffs to successfully maintain their action under section 2016 of the General Statutes of this state. The only mode of establishing it here was to give judgment thereon.

The tenth ground of appeal is very general,—too much so, we fear, to be seriously urged for our consideration. It possibly might have been necessary, if we had taken a different view of this case. We have already sustained the judgment of the circuit court in annulling the deed of assignment, but upon a different basis than that pointed out by his honor, the circuit judge. The appointment of a receiver was the logical consequence of annulling the deed of assignment. This exception must be overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be modified in accordance with the principles herein announced, and the action is remanded to the circuit court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

ARMSTRONG et al. v. HURST et al.

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—VALIDITY—ACCEPTANCE AND RELEASE—SUFFICIENCY.

1. An assignment by a copartnership of all the firm's property, for the benefit of its creditors, and containing provisions requiring releases by such as accept the assignment, is not void, as a partial assignment, though it does not include the individual property of the partners. Trumbo v. Hamel, 8 S. E. Rep. 83, 29 S. C. 520, followed.

2. The fact that one of the partners, several months afterwards, confesses judgment in favor of an individual creditor, which is made a lien on such partner's individual property, does not, in the absence of fraud, render such assignment void.

3. Where an assignment requires an acceptance and a release within a time specified, an acceptance, with a mere "offer" to release, made by a creditor within such time, is insufficient, but both must be executed within such time. Jaffray v. Steedman, 14 S. E. Rep. 632, 35 S. C. 35, followed.

4. Attorneys for creditors, who are not attorneys in fact, cannot execute releases for their clients.

5. The execution of a release after the expiration of the time fixed in the assignment, taken in connection with an offer to release made within the time, is not a sufficient compliance with the requirements of the assignment to entitle a creditor to the benefit of its provisions.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; James Aldrich, Judge.

Action by Armstrong, Cator & Co. and others against Hurst, Purnell & Co. and others, for the purpose of obtaining a construction of an assignment by N. C. Dacus and M. M. Jordan, copartners under the name and style of Dacus & Jordan, and ascertaining the rights of creditors thereunder. From the judgment entered, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The following is the decree of Judge Fraser, referred to in the opinion:

"This case came before me at the term of the court held in July and August, 1892, on a report of the master, and exceptions thereto by plaintiffs, and by several of the defendants for themselves and others. It will be better to take up the exceptions in their order:

"(1) Plaintiffs' exceptions: First. I do not see how the fact that J. C. Rogers is the assignee of Dacus & Jordan, or that he was a party to the same action in the United States court in reference to the assignment in this case, and in which there was no judgment against his claim, can deprive him of any rights he may have acquired under the assignment. This exception is overruled. Second. I think that some of the creditors of Dacus & Jordan have taken proper steps to acquire preference under the assignment, and this exception is overruled. Third. I think that J. C. Rogers, the assignee, is entitled to be paid in full the sum of $23.60, the account of the Enterprise Soap Works, purchased by him before the assignment, and to the sum of $248.84 paid by him for the account of Harvey, Blair & Co. for $622.02, if the pro rata share amounts to so much in these cases, which I suppose to be the 'certain claims' referred to in this exception. It must therefore be overruled. Fourth. The release of J. B. Lewis was executed by his attorneys in this case,—Messrs. Furman & Furman. There is no evidence of any written authority, in writing and under seal, for the attorneys to execute any release under seal, and none can be presumed from the relations of the parties. This exception is therefore well taken, and must be sustained.

"(2) Defendants' exceptions,—Smith & Stoughton: First. The evidence as to this claim has not been furnished to me, and I am unable to say whether the amount is correctly found by the master. It is ordered that this claim be recommitted to the master for his report thereon. Second. I see no good reason why the assignment should be set aside, and as it would be necessary to do this, in order to distribute the fund without regard to the preferences acquired under the releases in pursuance of the terms of the assignment, this exception must be overruled.

"Hurst, Purnell & Co., for themselves and others: First. Creditors who have not filed, not only notices of acceptance of the terms of the assignment, but releases in writing and under seal, within the time limited, are not entitled to preference under this assignment, and therefore this exception must be overruled. Second. The paper referred to in this exception as a notice from Perry & Heyward, attorneys for certain creditors, is not a release, under the acts and under this assignment. This exception must be overruled. Third. Having come to the conclusion that J. C. Rogers, A. M. Dacus, and R. B. Ligon have accepted the terms of the assignment, and filed releases, in proper form, within the time limited in the assignment, and therefore entitled themselves to preferences, this exception is overruled. Fourth. This is a case in which there are various conflicting claims arising under the deed of assignment, and a large number of creditors have established their claims under the order of this court. It is a proper case for the order and direction of the court in the construction of the terms of the deed of trust, and the administration of the trust fund. The good faith of Hurst, Purnell & Co., in bringing an action in the United States court can in no way affect the rights of creditors to bring another action like this. This exception is overruled. Fifth. A general exception, like this, does not bring to the attention any particular error complained of, and raises no question for the court, and is therefore overruled. The master is correct in charging Hurst, Purnell & Co. with the $200 ordered to be paid out of this fund, or their interest therein, in the proceedings in the United States court.

"It is therefore ordered and adjudged that in all respects, except as indicated above, the report be confirmed, and that parties have leave to apply for proper orders to carry out the same. Questions not herein passed upon reserved. It is further ordered that the time for creditors to come in and establish their claims under the previous order of this court be extended to the 1st day of October next."

Perry & Heyward, for appellants. Earle, Orr & Mooney, for respondents. Haynsworth & Parker, for assignee.

McIVER, C. J. On the 27th of November, 1891, N. C. Dacus and M. M. Jordan, copartners in trade under the name and style of Dacus & Jordan, executed an assignment to J. C. Rogers of all their partnership property for the benefit of their partnership creditors. The deed of assignment provided, among other things, after providing for the payment of all proper costs and charges incurred in preparing and executing said assignment, as follows: "And then, if the money so realized be insufficient to pay all the creditors of the said Dacus & Jordan, then, in trust, first to pay debts due the public, and the debts of such of the creditors of the said Dacus & Jordan as may, within sixty days from the date hereof, accept the terms of this assignment, and execute a release of their claims against the said Dacus & Jordan, and that the balance, after paying said debts, be distributed among the other creditors of the said Dacus & Jordan, pro rata, without preference or priority." It appears from the report of the master to whom it was referred to hear and determine the issues of law and fact, and to call in all the creditors of Dacus & Jordan to prove their demands before him, that, within the prescribed time, some of the creditors, to wit, J. C. Rogers, A. M. Dacus, R. B. Ligon, and J. B. Lewis, duly accepted the terms of the assignment, and filed releases of their claims with the assignee, and that on the 26th of January, 1892, Messrs. Perry & Heyward, as attorneys for certain of the creditors therein named, filed with the assignee a notice, of which the following is a copy: "To Mr. J. C. Rogers, Assignee, Greenville, S. C.: Take notice that the creditors whose names appear upon the list hereto attached, with their respective claims against the firm of Dacus & Jordan, hereby accept the terms of the assignment made to you by the firm of Dacus & Jordan—N. C. Dacus and M. M. Jordan—on the 27th day of November, A. D. 1891, and offer releases of their said claims, respectively, as required by said assignment,"—and that none of the other creditors had attempted to comply with the terms of said assignment. It should be here stated that about 10 days after the service of the notice just set out, but after the expiration of the 60 days, the creditors therein mentioned executed and delivered formal releases of their claims against Dacus & Jordan. It also appeared that at March term, 1892, of the court of common pleas for Greenville county, Smith & Stoughton, and others of the creditors of Dacus & Jordan, brought actions against Dacus & Jordan, to which no answers were filed, and they recovered judgments by default, which were duly entered on the 11th of April, 1892; and transcripts thereof were duly filed on the same day in the county of Anderson, where, it seems, N. C. Dacus, one of the members of the firm of Dacus & Jordan, individually owned certain property,—real estate. In the mean time, however, N. C. Dacus, on the 7th of April, 1892, confessed judgment in favor of J. C. Rogers for the sum of $635, and a transcript of the same was duly filed in the county of Anderson on the same day. This does not seem to be one of the claims proved against Dacus & Jordan under the call for creditors, as it does not correspond in amount with either of the claims so proved; and hence we suppose that it was a claim held by Rogers against N. C. Dacus individually, and not a claim against the partnership, though, under the view which we take, it is a matter of no consequence whether our supposition be well or ill founded. It further appeared that on the — day of December, 1891, the appellants Hurst, Purnell & Co. filed their bill in the circuit court of the United States to set aside the assignment, and for the appointment of a receiver, but that, after the appointment of a temporary receiver, that cause was discontinued, and by consent of the parties an order was passed, directing the temporary receiver to turn over the assets in his hands to the assignee and agent, and making certain provisions for the payment of the costs of the case and the compensation allowed the receiver, the particulars of which need not be stated, further than to say that $200 of the compensation allowed the receiver should be paid out of the pro rata share of Hurst, Purnell & Co. in the assets of the assigned estate.

The master found, among other things, as matter of law, that the parties named above as having accepted and executed releases within the time prescribed were entitled to be first paid, (after expenses, etc.) and that Hurst, Purnell & Co. and the other creditors named in the notice above set out, not having executed releases within the prescribed time, could not be placed in that class. To this report, several of the parties filed exceptions, and the case was heard by his honor, Judge Fraser, upon the report and exceptions, who rendered his decree sustaining some and overruling others of the exceptions, as may be seen by reference to the exceptions and decree thereon set out in the case. The decree concluded in these words: "It is therefore ordered and adjudged that in all respects, except as indicated above, the report be confirmed, and that parties have leave to apply for proper orders to carry out the same. Questions not herein passed upon reserved. It is further ordered that the time for creditors to come in and establish their claims under the previous order of the court be extended to the 1st day of October next." To this decree the following notice of exceptions was given in due time, to wit: "For the purposes of appeal to the supreme court from the final decree in this cause, the defendants Hurst, Purnell & Co., in behalf of themselves and all others of the creditors of Dacus & Jordan who occupy the same position, except" to the decree of Judge Fraser, upon two grounds, which are set out in the record, but need not be copied here, as they raise, substantially, but two questions: (1) Whether there was error in holding that the notice given on the 26th of January, 1892, above set out, was not a sufficient compliance with the terms of the assignment to place appellants in the class of accepting creditors. (2) If not, there was error in holding that the execution of the releases 10 days after the prescribed time had expired, taken in connection with the said notice, was insufficient.

Smith & Stoughton, who, though not parties to the original record, had become so by coming in under the call for creditors, and establishing their demands, in part at least, also filed the following exceptions to Judge Fraser's decree "for the purposes of appeal to the supreme court from the final decree in this cause," to wit: "For that his honor holds that there is no good reason why the assignment should be set aside, whereas he should have held that, taking into consideration the conduct of N. C. Dacus and J. C. Rogers before and after the date of the assignment, the form of the assignment, and the confession of judgment by N. C. Dacus to the said J. C. Rogers, it was evidently the purpose of the said N. C. Dacus to give a preference to the said J. C. Rogers over other creditors, and the said assignment and confession of judgment are therefore void."

It seems that Judge Fraser, in his decree, recommended the report of the master for two purposes, only, so far as we can discover: (1) To ascertain the correct amount due Smith & Stoughton; (2) to extend the time allowed creditors to come in and prove their claims. In accordance with this portion of the decree, the master made a second report, ascertaining the correct amount due Smith & Stoughton, and reporting other claims established. This report came before his honor, Judge Aldrich, with exceptions thereto, as we presume, though none are set out in the case; and Judge Aldrich rendered his decree, confirming the second report of the master, and directing, among other things, that the assignee and agent of the creditors do pay out the assets to the several creditors in accordance with their rights, as ascertained by the decree of Judge Fraser. Notice of appeal from this decree was given by Messrs. Perry & Heyward, as attorneys for the defendants; but the only exceptions we find in the record are those of Hurst, Purnell & Co. and others, (who the "others" are, is not stated,) and of Smith & Stoughton,—those of the former making the same points, substantially, as were made in their exceptions to Judge Fraser's decree, and those of the latter making the same points as were made in their exceptions to Judge Fraser's decree, and, in addition thereto, the further point that the assignment "being a partial assignment, requiring releases, it is void upon its face."

Before going into a consideration of the questions raised by these exceptions, it is necessary to notice certain preliminary objections to the hearing of these appeals, raised by counsel for respondents in their argument here, based upon the ground that Judge Fraser's decree was a final decree, at least so far as the rights of Hurst, Purnell & Co., and others standing in their position, are concerned, and, there being no notice of appeal from that decree, these appellants have no standing in this court, and that Smith & Stoughton's appeal cannot be considered, for the same reason, as well as for the further reason that these last-named appellants have no such connection with the record as would entitle them to appeal. But, under the view which we take of this case, we do not deem it necessary to consider these objections, of a somewhat technical character, especially as they were not taken by any formal notice of a motion to dismiss the appeals; and we shall, therefore, pass them by without expressing, or even intimating, any opinion as to whether such objections are well or ill founded. Coming, then, to a consideration of the questions presented by the exceptions, we propose to take them up in what seems to be their logical order, without regard to the order in which they are presented in the record:

First, whether there was any error on the part of Judge Fraser in holding that there was no good reason why the assignment should be set aside. This involves two inquiries: (1) Whether it was void, as a partial assignment requiring releases; (2) whether it was rendered void on account of the conduct of the parties—N. C. Dacus and J. C. Rogers—evincing an intention to give J. C. Rogers an unlawful preference, by the terms of the assignment, and the confession of judgment.

The first inquiry is conclusively answered by the recent decision of this court in the recent case of Trumbo v. Hamel, 29 S. C. 520, 8 S. E. Rep. 83, where it was held that an assignment by a copartnership of all its partnership property for the benefit of its partnership creditors, and containing provisions for releases, was not void, as a partial assignment, though it did not embrace the individual property of one of the partners. As was well said by Mr. Justice McGowan in that case: "A copartnership is a distinct entity, entirely separate from that of any of its members, and we know of no reason why it may not assign its property for the payment of its debts without including the individual property of the different partners." Here, as in that case, the assignment embraced all of the partnership property, as found by the master, to which finding there was no exception; and there is no reason why the fact that it did not also embrace individual property of one of the copartners, N. C. Dacus, should render it invalid. There was no finding of fact, and no testimony upon which such a finding of fact could have been based, either that there was any fraud intended, or that the fact that one of the copartners had individual property, was concealed from the creditors. Second, as to the second inquiry, there was a like absence of any evidence tending to show any fraud in the conduct of the parties; and surely the confession of judgment to Rogers by one of the partners, made several months after the execution of the assignment, and after an effort had been made, and abandoned, to set aside the assignment, could not possibly have the effect of bringing this case within the rule laid down in the cases from Wilkes v. Walker, 22 S. C. 108, down to Putney v. Friesleben, 32 S. C. 492, 11 S. E. Rep. 337. The act of making the assignment, and the act of confessing the judgment several months afterwards, were the acts of two different and distinct persons, in the eye of the law,—the copartnership, and one of its individual members,—and it would require much more evidence than we have been able to find in this record to bring these two acts together as parts of the same transaction. Besides, it is more than questionable whether the issues sought to be raised by the exceptions of Smith & Stoughton are not so wholly beyond the scope of the pleadings in this case as to preclude the court from considering them. The action was brought for the purpose, as we learn from the case, of construing the assignment, and ascertaining the rights of the parties under it. This necessarily assumes the validity of the assignment; and to allow one who is not a party to the original record, and only became so by coming in under the call for creditors, to attack the assignment, would, to use no harsher term, certainly be anomalous. These exceptions of Smith & Stoughton must therefore be overruled.

It only remains to consider the questions raised by the exceptions of Hurst, Purnell & Co. and others. Here, too, we think that the first question presented by these exceptions is conclusively determined by the recent decision of this court in the case of Jaffray v. Steedman, 35 S. C. 33, 14 S. E. Rep. 632, adversely to the appellants. That case decides, distinctly, that there must be, not only an acceptance of the terms of the assignment, but also a release. Here the paper relied upon, a copy of which is set out above, is simply a notice, signed by the attorneys of said creditors, that such creditors "hereby accept the terms of the assignment * * * and offer releases of their said claims, respectively, as required by said assignment." But no releases were executed, either by the creditors or their attorneys, within the prescribed time. The fact that the paper contained, not only an acceptance of the terms of the assignment, but an offer to release, cannot avail these appellants, for as is said in Burrill, Assignm. § 485: "Where a release is required by the assignment, it must be actually executed by the creditor. A mere offer to execute is not sufficient." And the author cites in support of this proposition the case of Pearpoint v. Graham, 4 Wash. C. C. 232, which was a much stronger case than this, for there the trustee—or "assignee," as he is called here—under the assignment gave public notice that a release would be prepared by him for the signature of the creditors, and one of the creditors called upon the trustee before the expiration of the 60 days, and offered to execute the release, but was informed by him that the instrument had not been prepared; and yet it was held that the offer was not tantamount to a release, and that the creditor was, nevertheless, bound to execute a release in due form within the prescribed period. The reason of this ruling, doubtless, was that, the object being to fix the rights of the parties at the time specified, a mere offer, which might be withdrawn before it was accepted and acted upon, would not be sufficient. But, in addition to this, it appears that this paper was signed by the attorneys of the creditors,—attorneys at law, not attorneys in fact,—and it is settled that an attorney at law has no power to execute a release of his client's claims. Gilliland v. Gasque, 6 S. C. 406; Kirk's Appeal, 87 Pa. St. 243.

The only remaining inquiry is whether the execution by the creditors, themselves, of formal releases, 10 days after the expiration of the time limited, would not have the effect of ratifying and confirming the previous action of their attorneys, so as to give such action effect from the day when it was taken. It seems to us very obvious that such cannot be the effect of the subsequent so-called ratification. The object being, as we have said, to fix a specified time when the rights of the parties shall become vested by a compliance with the prescribed conditions, it is very clear that, when the rights of some of the creditors have thus become vested, no subsequent act of other creditors can be permitted to divest or disturb such vested rights. If the attorneys had the right to execute releases, then no subsequent ratification would be necessary; but, if they did not have such right, then their action could not bind their clients until ratification was made. But this becomes unimportant, under the view which we have taken, that, even if the attorneys had the power to execute releases, they did not in fact exercise such supposed power; and hence, in no view of the case, could these appellants come within the class of creditors who had accepted and released within the prescribed time. The judgment of this court is that the judgments both of Judge Fraser and Judge Aldrich be affirmed.

McGOWAN and POPE, JJ., concur.

CORNWALL v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 20, 1893.)

BURGLARY—ARTICLES STOLEN AS EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—INSTRUCTIONS—IMPEACHING VERDICT BY JURORS—COMPETENCY AND CONDUCT OF JURORS.

1. There was no error in admitting in evidence the bag which contained the silver when stolen from the broken building, and which bag was afterwards found in the prisoner's possession; and, though the tools admitted in evidence were new ones, and had not been used, this did not exclude them, there being evidence of the prisoner's admission that he had thrown away or concealed the tools used in the burglarious enterprise, and also evidence tending to show that the new ones were adapted to a like use as well as many other uses.

2. The bag in which silver money was when taken from a safe in the burglarized building, though of little or no value in itself, is such an article of property as the rule with reference to accounting for the possession of stolen goods applies to, this bag having been found in the prisoner's possession within four days after the burglary was committed.

3. A detective having arrested the accused, and being about to turn him over to other custodians, told him he knew where he came from, and what he had done, which was false, and said to him privately: "When I turn you over to these people you have my handcuffs on, and if you get away I want you to send my handcuffs back. If you get away you may need this money," giving him two dollars,—admissions in the nature of a confession which followed immediately without other inducement than this were admissible in evidence; nor would the fact that the confession was indirect, rather than direct, render it inadmissible.

4. The jury may consider a confession if it was freely and voluntarily made, though the detective to whom it was made used artifice, trick, or deception in order to impose on the accused, and induce him to confide in his good will and friendly feeling.

5. None of the witnesses who testified in the case being impeached by evidence introduced for that purpose, it was not error to charge the jury thus: "The law presumes all witnesses who testify under oath are credible and worthy of belief. The law presumes prima facie that no witness will willfully, knowingly, and absolutely swear to what is false. The law does not impute perjury to a witness, nor are you at liberty to do so. The law presumes that a witness will not testify falsely; that is a prima facie presumption only; it is not a conclusive presumption. The defendant is permitted by law to make a statement in his own behalf not under oath, and it is your right and duty to weigh and consider that statement. The law says that you may believe that statement in preference to the sworn evidence in the case. If you believe it, then you may accept the unsworn statement of the defendant in preference to the sworn evidence. Not capriciously and arbitrarily, but in search of the truth, you have a right to believe it in preference to the sworn evidence. There is no presumption touching the defendant's statement, no presumption that it is true, nor any presumption that it is untrue. In other words, it goes to you without presumption either for it or against it."

6. It was not error to charge the jury thus: "There are two kinds of evidence known to the law: one known as 'direct evidence,'—that is, that which immediately points to the question in issue. There is also known to the law indirect or circumstantial evidence; that is, that which only tends to establish the issue by proof of various facts sustaining by their consistency the hypothesis claimed. If you find there is no sufficient positive evidence to authorize a conviction in this case, then ascertain whether or not there is sufficient circumstantial evidence to authorize a conviction. If you find the evidence acceptable to you is of a circumstantial character only, then determine whether that evidence removes all reasonable doubts of the defendant's guilt. When testimony relied on to convict is entirely circumstantial it should be so strong as to exclude every reasonable hypothesis save that of the defendant's guilt. It must be sufficient to remove all reasonable doubt. If there is no reasonable hypothesis upon which it could be placed, that would remove any reasonable doubt, if there is a reasonable doubt. But whether the testimony be positive or circumstantial, if it removes from the mind of the jury all such reasonable doubt, it would be sufficient to authorize a conviction. If you find from the evidence in the case, whether positive or circumstantial, that it is sufficient to remove all reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, then evidence of either character—if it removes from your mind all reasonable doubt—would legally authorize a conviction."

7. Though it was not accurate to charge the jury thus: "And if you find there was a burglary committed, and that goods were stolen from the house burglarized, and the defendant was found in possession of such articles under such circumstances as to make it incumbent on him to show that he obtained the articles honestly and legally, and he does not do so, then you would be authorized to find him guilty on that proof,"—yet this inaccuracy is no cause for a new trial in the present case, the evidence as a whole showing beyond any reasonable doubt that the verdict was correct.

8. Jurors will not be heard to establish facts which go or tend to impeach the verdict which they have united with their fellow jurors in rendering.

9. Where the expression imputed by one witness to a juror as made by him before the trial was, "If they take me on the jury in that burglary I will convict them fellows sure," and by another. "If I am caught on that jury I will convict him sure," and the juror in explanation testifies that all he said was addressed to one of the prisoner's counsel, and was, "That if the evidence warranted it, he would hang the defendant;" also that he said this without any prejudice whatever against the prisoner, and was rather in hopes that he would be rejected as a juror, there was no error in treating the explanation as sufficient, and in holding that the juror had not rendered himself incompetent. He was most probably endeavoring to evade service as a juror. He testified also that he was perfectly impartial, and only wished the prisoner, who was an entire stranger to him, might have a fair trial.

10. That one of the jurors repeated aloud to the attending bailiff a message which he requested the bailiff to deliver to his, the juror's, son, touching the conduct of some work which was to be done at the juror's home, and that the son was near enough to hear the message as his father dictated it, would not vitiate the verdict.

11. That 2 of the jury left the room in charge of a bailiff to attend a call of nature, and were absent 15 or 20 minutes, and that the 10 who remained in the room with the door and windows closed in the mean time were unguarded by an officer, and not locked in, will not vitiate the verdict where it appears that neither those who went out nor those who remained in had any intercourse with any one during the absence of the bailiff with the two who thus retired.

12. If the attending bailiff remained all night in the same room occupied by the jury at the hotel, where they were lodged under instructions from the court, this would not vitiate the verdict, unless it appeared that the jury were there for the purpose of deliberating, or that something was said or done touching the case, more especially as the affidavits in the record strongly indicate that the room was occupied by the jury merely as a place of repose for the night, and that the case was not under discussion or immediate consideration at any time when the bailiff was present, or during that night. Nor does it appear that he remained in the room, or was in the room at all, save by the affidavit of one of the jurors.

Error from superior court, Jones county; W. F. Jenkins, Judge.

James Cornwall was convicted of burglary, and brings error. Affirmed.

W. D. Stone and J. C. Barron, for plaintiff in error. H. G. Lewis, Sol. Gen., H. T. Lewis, and Richd. Johnson, for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The storehouse of J. D. Anchors was entered burglariously at night, his safe blown open, and money to the amount of about $225 was stolen therefrom. This money was mostly in silver; probably a small amount of it was gold; perhaps some was paper; all of it being contained in a small sack, which is designated in the evidence as a "shot sack." The commission of the burglary by some one was put by the evidence beyond question. The only real problem which the jury had to solve was whether Cornwall was the burglar, or one of the burglars. The motion for a new trial complains of the admission of certain evidence, the charge of the court, refusal to charge as requested, disqualification of one of the jurors, separation and misconduct of the jury, and misconduct of the bailiff who had the jury in charge. It complains also of the verdict as being unwarranted by the evidence, contrary to the same, contrary to law, etc. The motion was overruled.

1. The shot sack was found in Cornwall's possession four days after the burglary. It was empty. Its admission in evidence was objected to because it was not sufficiently identified, and it was contended that, if admissible at all, it should have come in "only as a circumstance," and not as stolen property. An examination of the evidence satisfies us that it was identified with sufficient certainty. On principles both of law and common sense it was admissible as evidence tending to connect Cornwall with the burglary, although the sack was empty when it was found on his person. Certain implements, such as drills, were found in his possession at the same time. They were new, and had the appearance of never having been used, but the evidence showed they were adapted to use in opening safes as well as in other mechanical work. One of the witnesses had seen similar tools used for getting into safes. Cornwall professed to be a traveling mechanic, engaged, when he could get employment, as a marble cutter. Moreover, there was evidence of his admission that he had concealed the tools used in committing this burglary. If he had done so, this might account for the purchase of a new set, as parting with the old ones would likely give occasion to procure a new outfit, whether he designed to commit more burglaries or simply to ply his vocation as a marble cutter.

2. It was contended that a small shot bag made of cloth was such a trifle and of so little value as not to be on the footing of stolen property with reference to accounting for the recent possession of it after the crime was committed. The court took a different view, and in so doing was correct. It is not solely the element of value which gives probative force to the possession of an article of property which disappeared when a crime was committed. The main consideration is that the possession must have had some origin, and, as it could have originated by committing the crime, there is, or may be, some presumption, though often very slight, of its having so originated, unless a different origin appears to be probable; and, inasmuch as the person having the possession best knows how his possession did in fact originate, and has the best means of accounting for it, it is reasonable and proper that the burden of so doing should rest upon him. If any inanimate thing be at a particular place, and shortly thereafter is found in the possession of some one at a different place, that he was the person who removed it, unless a different agent is pointed to, is in some degree probable. Here, on the 20th of January, 1891, a small shot sack was in a certain safe, locked up in a storehouse situated in the county of Jones, and four days thereafter the same article was found in the possession of Cornwall, in the city of Savannah, in the county of Chatham. Why should there not be some accounting for this removal and change of possession by Cornwall, no matter whether the sack was of much or little value or of no value at all?

3, 4. The admissions in the nature of a confession made by Cornwall to the detective were competent evidence notwithstanding they were obtained by artifice, trick, or deception, and they could be considered by the jury. The means used to obtain them did not prevent them from being free and voluntary. Doubtless Cornwall was misled and deceived as to the detective being his friend, and in sympathy with any effort he might make to effect his escape from custody. But the hope and belief that he had found a friend would not render it the least probable that an admission or confession made to the supposed friend was untrue, and the reasons why confessions made under the influence of hope are excluded is the danger of their being false. The detective made no suggestion that he would aid in effecting an escape, nor did he suggest the making of any admission or confession. What he said and did are fairly indicated in the third headnote. He sealed his pretended friendship by handing Cornwall two dollars, and thereupon the latter said, "Now I will talk to you," and proceeded thus: "These are new tools. They are not the tools I was using; they are buried underneath some old cross-ties at the Central Railroad wharf. Yes, I can find the place. * * * I told that big son of a bitch to throw that bag away, and he didn't do it. Those fellows treated me damned mean. They might have gone to a lawyer, and got me out for a few dollars." All this is pregnant with the implication that Cornwall participated in the burglary. The confession was indirect, rather than direct; but certainly this would not render it inadmissible.

5, 6. The court charged as set out in the headnotes 5 and 6. Applied to the facts and circumstances of the particular case, we consider these instructions as substantially correct. None of the witnesses were impeached by evidence introduced for that purpose. We think there is a prima facie presumption that all witnesses not impeached tell the truth, and that there is no presumption, one way or the other, respecting the truth of the prisoner's statement. Upon the truth of that the jury are to pass, unaided by any preliminary presumption for or against him. The charge was correct on direct and circumstantial evidence and on reasonable doubt.

7. It was not accurate to charge the jury as set out in the seventh headnote. It is never incumbent on the accused to show that he obtained stolen articles honestly and legally. A guilty mode of acquiring them will be as effectual as an innocent one. Their acquisition by any means whatever other than by participating in the offense involved in the trial will be a sufficient accounting for the possession to neutralize the effect of that possession as evidence tending to prove guilt. Furthermore, the proposition, "You would be authorized to find him guilty on that proof," should have been qualified by adding something to this effect: "provided, under all the circumstances in evidence, your minds are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt." In view, however, of instructions given in other parts of the charge, and as the evidence, taken as a whole, shows beyond any reasonable doubt that the verdict was correct, the inaccuracy in this part of the charge may be treated as affording no cause for a new trial. Why should a conviction which was undoubtedly right and proper in itself be set aside on a verbal criticism of the court's charge. The possession of the shot sack was not only unaccounted for, but the prisoner virtually admitted that he obtained it by reason of his connection with this burglary, and not otherwise.

8-12. The remaining points are left to stand on the headnotes. Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 2, 1893.)

APPEAL FROM COUNTY COURT—WHEN LIES.

Where the parties are at issue in a county court on the declaration and plea in an action involving more than $50, the losing party is entitled to appeal to the superior court from the final judgment rendered against him. Code, §§ 286, 3610a.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Elbert county; Hamilton McWhorter, Judge.

Action by J. T. Robinson against I. K. Brown. Plaintiff had judgment in the county court, and defendant appealed to the superior court. From a judgment dismissing the appeal, defendant brings error. Reversed.

H. J. Brewer and McCurry & Proffitt, for plaintiff in error. Jos. N. Worley, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. It would seem impossible to doubt that by the express terms of the Code, §§ 286, 3610a, the right of appeal existed in this case. The former section declares that, "If either party is dissatisfied with the judgment of the county judge, and the principal sum claimed, or damages claimed, exceeds fifty dollars, said party may enter an appeal from such judgment, within four days, under the same rules and regulations as are provided for appeals in this Code;" and the latter declares that "in all civil cases tried and determined by a county judge, or a justice of the peace, or a notary public who is ex officio a justice of the peace, and on all confessions of judgment before either of said officers, where the sum claimed is more than fifty dollars, either party may, as a matter of right, enter an appeal to the superior court." The principal sum claimed was more than $50. The case was tried and determined by a county judge, who rendered judgment for the plaintiff, and with that judgment the defendant was dissatisfied, his dissatisfaction being manifested by duly entering an appeal. The contention is that, as the plaintiff introduced evidence to prove his account, and the defendant introduced none to support his plea, or to raise a conflict of evidence, no question of fact was involved, but that the sole question was as to the legal sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence to establish the account. But the defendant did not concede the truth of this evidence. He did not demur to it, or move for a nonsuit, so as to narrow down the case to any mere legal question whatever. If, when the trial began, there was a question of fact to be decided, that question remained in the case until judgment was rendered, and it was decided by that judgment, if it was disposed of at all. If it was ever in, how else did it get out? And who can even imagine that it was not some time in, the suit being founded on an open account, and the plea being the general issue? But, were the contention we have mentioned sound, that would not defeat the right of appeal, though it might entitle the defendant to waive appeal, and have the judgment reviewed by the superior court on certiorari. In order to bring certiorari, he would have to eliminate questions of fact and reduce the case to one or more questions of law; but the right of appeal would not be lost by so doing, unless he elected not to appeal, but to proceed instead by certiorari. He could not have both remedies, but he might have either, at his election. He can appeal in any case provided for in the quotations made above from the Code, and he can do this irrespective of any classification of the question or questions which the case involves, and irrespective of whether certiorari could be brought or not. Questions of fact will restrict his remedy to appeal, but questions of law will not restrict his remedy to certiorari. By overlooking this distinction, the court erroneously dismissed the appeal. Judgment reversed.

MCDONALD v. McCALL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 27, 1893.)

CONSTRUCTION OF WILL—LIFE ESTATE—RIGHTS OF REMAINDER-MEN.

A devise made in 1858 to a named person, and to a married granddaughter of the testatrix, for equal division between them, "the share going to my said granddaughter to be held by her husband in trust for her sole and separate use during her life, and at her death to be equally divided between her children, which she may have," created a trust which extends to the life estate in the granddaughter, only, and does not embrace the remainder devised to her children. The remainder is a legal, not an equitable, estate in the children. Consequently, a conveyance in fee made by the trustee in 1860, under an order of the chancellor granted in vacation, passed no title, save as to the life estate of the granddaughter, and would be no obstacle to a recovery of the premises by her children after her death. She being still alive, they are not barred by the statute of prescription, although she and her trustee may be barred.

Error from superior court, Floyd county; John W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by D. T. McCall against Luke McDonald to rescind a contract for the purchase of land. From a verdict for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

McCall, by his petition, alleged: On February 27, 1891, he purchased of Luke McDonald the property described in a bond for title attached, and for the sum payable at time therein stated, giving McDonald his notes for the sums so stated as the purchase price, which notes McDonald now holds. Upon examination of the titles to the property, he finds that McDonald has not, and cannot convey to him, good and sufficient title to that portion of the property which is part of lot 208 in a certain district and section of Floyd county; and without the possession of this property the tract is valueless, owing to its size and shape; and the purchase was an entire contract, and, legally, not severable. The defect in the title mentioned is as follows: The portion of lot 208 is part of a 70-acre tract bequeathed in the fourth item of the will of Elizabeth Cabiness, by which item it appears that only an estate for the life of E. Louisa Anderson was bequeathed to John J. Anderson, trustee, and the remainder, after Mrs. Anderson's death, was bequeathed to her children, unincumbered with the trust. Elizabeth Cabiness died seised and possessed of these 70 acres, and McDonald, by direct claim, claims title to that portion of the lot 208 mentioned above, his claim for title being: By the will mentioned, to Anderson, trustee, one-half interest, and to Merritt, one-half interest; deed from Anderson, trustee, and Merritt, to Cothran, (Anderson, trustee, was authorized to make the sale by an order of the judge of the ——— circuit, sitting at chambers;) Cothran, by deed to Scanlan; and so on, by various conveyances, down to McDonald. By reference to the will, it appears that Anderson could and did only convey the life estate, which he held as trustee, and therefore those holding under said trustee having only a life estate, which expires upon Mrs. Anderson's death. Mrs. Anderson has three children now living, who will take said half interest at her death. Petitioner prayed that the sale might be set aside, that his note be delivered to him, and the bond for title canceled. The jury found for plaintiff, and, defendant's motion for new trial being overruled, he excepts. The motion was upon the grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, the principles of justice, and equity, contrary to the evidence, and without evidence to support it, and because the court erred in instructing the jury to find for plaintiff under the proof submitted. Upon the trial, plaintiff introduced the will of Elizabeth Cabiness, the item in question being as follows: "I will and bequeath to my granddaughter E. Louisa Anderson, wife of John Anderson, and James W. Merritt, all the balance of said lot, not heretofore and above disposed of, [portions of lot 208 had been devised by preceding items to others,] to be equally divided between them, the share going to my said granddaughter to be held by her said husband, John Anderson, in trust for her sole and separate use during her life, and at her death to be equally divided between her children, which she may have." Plaintiff also introduced deeds, as mentioned in his petition, showing how the title to the property in question came into McDonald, and further testimony to the effect that E. Louisa Anderson was still living, and has children living; that the land in dispute was part of the land mentioned in item fourth; and that Elizabeth Cabiness had possession of it up to her death. There was no evidence for defendant.

E. P. Treadaway, for plaintiff in error.
Dran & Smith, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The facts appear in the official report. From the briefs of counsel, and their arguments here, we understand the controversy between the parties to be confined to a construction of the fourth item in the will of Mrs. Cabiness, and to the effect of the sale and conveyance made by Anderson, as trustee, in 1860, by which he undertook to pass the fee, not merely Mrs. Anderson's life estate, in premises embraced both in the will and his deed. It does not appear whether the children of Mrs. Anderson were in being when the will took effect, or whether or when, if at all, they attained their majority. All we know of them is that they, as well as their mother, were living when the case was tried. Nor is there anything disclosed as to the possession of the premises by any person at any time, except that the testatrix, Mrs. Cabiness, had possession before and at the time of her death. The court below construed the will properly, and we have indicated and indorsed that construction in the headnote. Bull v. Walker, 71 Ga. 195; Carswell v. Lovett, 80 Ga. 36, 4 S. E. Rep. 866. There is nothing in the facts on which to predicate any direct decision as to the effect of prescription, but we have indicated at the conclusion of the headnote the general rule on that subject. Bagley v. Kennedy, 81 Ga. 721, 8 S. E. Rep. 742. Judgment affirmed.

SIMS et al. v. CLARK et al.

MISJOINDER OF PARTIES—VENUE—SEVERALTY OF CONTRACT—GUARANTY.

1. Debtors by open account are not subject to suit jointly with one who has guarantied, in writing, payment of the account. Residence of the latter in the county in which the suit is located gives the court no jurisdiction over the former.

2. Against one who has, before goods were sold and delivered, guarantied, in writing, payment therefor, on the faith of which guaranty the sale was made, a recovery may be had upon a declaration which sets forth the account, a copy of the contract of guaranty, and alleges refusal to pay the account, and notice by the creditor of acceptance of the guaranty, as follows: "Plaintiffs first stating to said V. B. McGinnis, (the guarantor,) that his guaranty would be accepted, and that it was accepted."

3. The court erred in overruling the demurrer of the primary debtors to the declaration, but did not err in overruling that of the guarantor. Let the action be dismissed as to the primary debtors, and the verdict stand as to the guarantor.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Cartersville; Shelby Attaway, Judge.

Action by R. G. Clark & Co. against Sims & Auchmuty and V. B. McGinnis. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendants Sims & Auchmuty bring error. Reversed in part.

M. R. Stansell, for plaintiffs in error. Akin & Harris, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The suit was in Bartow county, where McGinnis, the guarantor, resided, and the declaration showed on its face that Sims & Auchmuty, the debtors by account, resided in Polk county. The latter demurred because there was no jurisdiction as to them. This point was well taken. These debtors were entitled to be sued in the county of their residence, and there was no jurisdiction over them elsewhere. Code, §§ 5172, 3402, 3404. Debtors by mere account are not joint makers or promisors with one who has, by a separate contract, guarantied payment of the account. The two contracts are several, not joint, and the liability on each is several. Those who contracted the account are not liable at all on the guaranty, and he who made the guaranty is not liable at all on the account.

2. The facts necessary to recover of the guarantor, including acceptance of the guaranty, were sufficiently set forth; and, as there is no complaint of the finding, we must assume that they were duly proved.

3. The result is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer of Sims & Auchmuty, but correctly overruled the separate demurrer of McGinnis. As to the latter, the verdict should stand; but, as to the former, let the action be dismissed. Judgment reversed in part, and in part affirmed.

HUFBAUER et al. v. JACKSON.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 27, 1893.)

POWER OF TRUSTEE TO SELL LAND—RES JUDICATA—JURISDICTION OF COURT—DIRECTING VERDICT.

1. Unless expressly authorized by the instrument creating the trust, or by judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, a trustee of a married woman and minor children has no power to sell land, except by virtue of an order of a judge of the superior court. Code, § 2327.

2. Where a suit was brought by a trustee, in a county court, for the purchase money of land, and was appealed to the superior court, though the appeal was by consent of parties, the court had no jurisdiction to render a decree requiring a conveyance of the land to be made upon the payment of the purchase money; and the beneficiaries of the trust, not being parties to the decree, and not having assented to or ratified the same, are unaffected thereby.

3. Where the defense set up by plea and established by evidence is plainly an insufficient answer to the plaintiff's action, it is error for the court to direct a verdict for the defendant.

Error from superior court, Houston county; A. L. Miller, Judge.

Action by Juliette B. Hufbauer and others against E. W. Jackson to recover land. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiffs bring error. Reversed.

M. G. Bayne, for plaintiffs in error. C. C. Duncan, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. There can be no doubt that, unless expressly authorized by the instrument creating the trust, a trustee has no power, without the voluntary consent of all the beneficiaries, to sell and convey the corpus of the trust property. He must obtain an order of sale from a court of competent jurisdiction, or from the judge of the superior court, upon a proper application. Code, § 2327. The deed which constituted Goff trustee for his wife and children was silent as to any sale or power to sell; and there is no suggestion that any order of sale was applied for or granted, and no proof that the beneficiaries consented. The case turns, therefore, at its present stage, altogether upon the plea of former recovery.

2. That plea sets up a judgment or decree by the superior court in a case brought in the county court, and carried by appeal to the superior court, the appeal being founded on consent of parties. These parties were Goff, as trustee for his wife and children, on the one side, and Jackson on the other. The wife and children of Goff were not parties, and were not before the court. The purpose of the suit was to recover of Jackson a sum as purchase money of the land now in controversy. Pending the appeal in the superior court, Jackson filed an equitable plea, in which he offered to pay the amount claimed, upon good and sufficient title to the land being decreed to him as against the trustee and the beneficiaries of the trust, and prayed that the title be decreed to be in him on compliance with this offer. A verdict was rendered confirming the sale by Goff, as trustee, to Jackson, and declaring that on the payment of $250, with interest and costs, the title be decreed to be in Jackson, free from the trust deed, and from the title of the trustee and the beneficiaries. On this verdict a decree was entered and signed in substantial conformity to the terms of the verdict, and this is the decree pleaded as a former recovery. There was evidence that Jackson had complied, substantially, with the decree on his part, but none whatever showing that the beneficiaries of the trust had ever received or enjoyed any of the money, or had assented to the decree, or in any manner ratified it. So far as evidence went, it was directly to the contrary. We need not say whether this adjudication would have been binding upon the beneficiaries of the trust, had it been made in an action brought by the trustee originally in the superior court. We are clear that, as the suit went by appeal from the county court to the superior court, the jurisdiction of the latter over it, as to subject-matter, was no larger than was the jurisdiction of the former; and it is certain that a county court could not, upon an equitable plea, or upon any other pleading, determine and control the title to land, or confirm a sale made by a trustee, and fix title in the purchaser, by mere force of the adjudication. In trying an appeal from a county court, the superior court can deal with no question of merits, except such as could have been raised in the county court, and can render no final judgment, except such as the county court had jurisdiction to render. Greer v. Burnam, 69 Ga. 734.

3. The plea, construed in the light of the record attached to it as an exhibit, was obviously insufficient as an answer to the present action. This being so, whether the evidence sustained it or not, the court should not have directed a verdict for the defendant. Though the proper practice was for the plaintiffs to demur to the plea, and have it stricken, their failure to do this would not justify directing a verdict manifestly wrong, and finally disposing of the case on an issue which should not control it. Judgment reversed.

HARRIS v. CENTRAL RAILROAD & BANKING CO. OF GEORGIA.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 3, 1893.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—UNAUTHORIZED CONTRACT BY AGENT—LIABILITY OF PRINCIPAL FOR BREACH.

Where it affirmatively appears that, by a general rule of the railway company, demurrage and storage were chargeable to all patrons, and that the special contract declared upon was made, not with the authorities which promulgated the rule, but with subordinate agents, and for the express purpose of avoiding the application of the rule in the given instance, a breach of the contract by one of the same agents who co-operated in making it affords no cause of action against the company. Thus, where the rules of the company required payment of demurrage on goods not removed within 48 or 60 hours after their arrival, and also provided for the storage in warehouses of goods not removed within a certain time, the storage and drayage to be at the expense of the consignee, and these rules were known to the plaintiff, who contracted with the defendant's station agent and soliciting agent that, in consideration of a large shipment of freight over the defendant's railway, no demurrage, drayage, or storage would be charged against him, a breach of the contract as to storage gave the plaintiff no right of action against the company to recover the money paid, and it was not error to grant a nonsuit.

Error from city court of Macon; John P. Ross, Judge.

Action by Iverson L. Harris against the Central Railroad & Banking Company of Georgia for breach of contract. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Harris & Harris, for plaintiff in error. R. F. Lyon, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The railroad company had general rules declaring that, under certain circumstances, demurrage and storage would be chargeable to all patrons. These rules were known to Harris, who combined with two subordinate agents of the company—one of them a soliciting agent, the other a station agent—to shun the rules, and prevent their application to a large shipment of freight which Harris contemplated making. On account of the volume and magnitude of the shipment, these agents agreed that the rules should not be enforced against Harris as to that shipment; and, on account of the exemption thus granted him, he agreed to make, and did make, the shipment over the line of this railroad, instead of making it over the line of some other company. It is not to be presumed that soliciting and station agents have been invested with any suspending power over general rules which the company has adopted and promulgated, and the evidence affords no indication that any such power existed or had been conferred in this instance. The stipulations between the two subordinate agents and Mr. Harris did not bind the company, and for this reason he was properly nonsuited in the present action. Judgment affirmed.

NATIONAL BANK OF AUGUSTA v. RICHMOND FACTORY et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Feb. 27, 1893.)

RECEIVER OF CORPORATION—APPOINTMENT—SEPARATE PETITIONS FOR.

1. Where, upon a petition in the nature of a bill in equity, a receiver is appointed by the superior court to administer the assets of an insolvent corporation, and one of the creditors, not a party to the petition, but who has a right to make himself a party if he desire to do so, applies for equitable relief in an independent suit commenced by himself on his own petition in the same court after the other petition was filed, the relief should generally be denied, because, while a creditor having a legal lien may stand out and be allowed to prosecute his legal remedies against the assets, his claim for equitable remedies should be asserted in the original suit under which the seizure was made.

2. That a business corporation is not a trader will not prevent creditors from proceeding against it under section 3149a et seq. of the Code, these sections being applicable to all corporations not municipal, as well as to traders generally.

Error from superior court, Richmond county; H. C. Roney, Judge.

Action by the National Bank of Augusta against the Richmond Factory and others for the appointment of a receiver and other relief. From the judgment rendered, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

The National Bank of Augusta filed its petition against the Richmond Factory, and Coffin, trustee. Service was made of the petition and of a temporary restraining order upon the president of the factory May 11, 1892, and upon Coffin the same day. Before the cause was heard the factory filed a demurrer, and Coffin an answer, and petitioner amended the petition. On June 7th, when the case came on to be heard, the factory filed its answer. Plaintiff proceeded to introduce evidence, when, pending the discussions of the same, the court ordered the rule to be discharged, and relief prayed for refused. Thereupon petitioner tendered a bill of exceptions, and the question arose as to whether the court had passed upon the relief prayed for under the amendment, when petitioner applied for and obtained another rule requiring the original defendants, the Union Wadding Company, Lesser individually, and Young, Stearnes & Lesser, as receivers of the Richmond Factory, to show cause why the relief prayed for under the amended petition should not be granted. A hearing being had, the court refused the relief prayed for under the original and amended petitions. Plaintiff then filed a motion that the court pass an order to protect its rights pending the writ of error about to be sued out, which motion the court refused upon the grounds that the court in the case of the Union Wadding Company, hereafter to be mentioned, passed an order which fully protected petitioner. Petitioner excepts to the order of June 7th and to the order of June 25th. It also excepts to the refusal of the court to protect its rights pending the decision, and to the ruling of the court that the passage of the order of June 7th in the case of the Union Wadding Company et al. against the Richmond Factory et al. was a sufficient protection to plaintiff, not a party to the suit under which that order was passed.

The petition of the National Bank of Augusta, in its own behalf and that of all other bondholders of the Richmond Factory who should be made parties, etc., alleged in brief: In July, 1885, the stockholders of the factory authorized the president to issue 30 bonds of $1,000 each, dated September 1, 1885, running 20 years, and bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually on the 1st of April and October, for which coupons should be issued, with power to the president, at his election, to raise $30,000, or such part thereof as he might deem advisable, by sale of the bonds, or upon the note or notes of the corporation and hypothecation of the bonds as security, to be used as commercial capital. The president was also authorized to make a conveyance of the property of the corporation to two trustees, to be held as security for the payment of the bonds and coupons. The bonds were issued, and a deed of trust executed and duly recorded. After the issuing of the bonds the president borrowed from petitioner on demand $20,000, hypothecating 20 of the bonds. This indebtedness has been reduced from time to time until it now consists of a promissory note of the factory for $5,000, maturing May 9, 1892, and plaintiff holds as security therefor $6,000 of the bonds, upon which there are coupons which have matured since the bonds were deposited aggregating $1,080. Upon the maturing of said note the factory defaulted in payment. Demand was made by petitioner for payment, and for payment of the past-due coupons, upon Lesser, the president of the corporation, when he failed and refused to make payment either of the note or coupons. By the terms of the deed of trust it was provided that, in the event the bonds or any of the coupons should become due, and should, after demand, remain unpaid for three months, each of the bonds outstanding should become due and payable, and the trustees or their successors were authorized to advertise the property mentioned in the deed for sale at public outcry, and, if at the end of the advertisement the bonds or coupons which had matured, and upon which default had been made, should not have been paid, should sell the property, and proceed to pay the bonds and coupons, paying any excess to the factory or its assigns. One of the trustees named in the deed has died, and Coffin is the survivor, but has no power to act except in the manner provided for in the deed. On May 5, 1892, there was filed by the Union Wadding Company against the factory an equitable petition, alleging that the factory was insolvent, and that the value of its property did not exceed $50,000, which sum included the amount of bonds issued by it and outstanding, which petition prayed for receiver, etc. Under this petition a rule to show cause, returnable May 14th, had been granted, and in the interval the factory restrained from doing any act that would permit any creditor acquiring a preference by judgment or lien, or any suit or attachment, under proceedings commenced after the filing of the petition. The act under which the petition of the Union Wadding Company was filed, now embodied in Code, §§ 3149a-3149g, has been construed to give no jurisdiction to the court where all the realty is under mortgage which would be consumed in the payment of the mortgage debt. Under the laws of this state the holders of any bonds secured by mortgage can foreclose the mortgage in equity whenever default occurs in the payment of the principal or any part of the interest. No provision is made by the mortgage in question except action by the trustees when default has occurred, in the manner and for the period hereinbefore set forth. With the factory closed and not being operated to make this provision of the mortgage available, the property would have to stand idle for many months. If the receiver is appointed under the petition of the Union Wadding Company et al., he can make no sale except subject to the mortgage, unless the mortgage creditor should come in and make himself a party to said petition, and consent thereto, which the trustee has no power to do for the bondholders, so that they must act alone for their protection. It is to the interest of all the bondholders that the property should be operated, in order to make it available, and realize its full value. It is not in the power of the trustee to do this, nor can it be done except by leave of the court, by means of its own officer, appointed and authorized so as to bind all the bondholders when consented to by them, or it is made to appear to the court manifestly necessary that this action should be had for the protection of the property. Petitioner, the National Bank of Augusta, prayed for a receiver; for an injunction against any receiver who might be appointed under the proceedings instituted by the Union Wadding Company from taking possession, controlling, using, or operating any of the property passing under the mortgage deed; for foreclosure of its mortgage, and distribution of the proceeds among the bondholders, after payment of expenses, counsel fees, etc.; and for general relief. Attached as an exhibit to this petition was a copy of the mortgage deed; also a copy of the note held by petitioner, which stated that six bonds of $1,000 each had been pledged to the bank as collateral.

The Richmond Factory demurred to this petition of the national bank upon the ground that plaintiff had an adequate remedy at law; that plaintiff was a secured creditor, as appeared from its pleadings; that, if plaintiff's petition contemplated being made a party to that of the Union Wadding Company, then defendant says its liability to plaintiff is uncertain, if any, as it cannot be fixed until plaintiff exercises its right of selling the collateral in its hands and appropriating the proceeds to this debt, and then, if the collateral did not bring enough to satisfy the debt, for the balance remaining defendant would acknowledge a liability, and the national bank could be made a party plaintiff to the petition of the Union Wadding Company; and that the mortgage did not mature for 60 days, and therefore no rights thereunder could accrue to plaintiff. Coffin, trustee, answered that he had no interest in the suit other than as trustee; that a receiver for the factory and all its property, including that covered by the mortgage, had already been appointed in the cause of the Union Wadding Company, and the receivers were in possession of the property; that plaintiff was not entitled to foreclose the mortgage, because by its terms the default in payment of interest must continue at least 90 days, and then only this defendant is authorized to proceed by entering upon and selling the property; and defendant prayed that, if the mortgage was to be foreclosed, he be allowed to exercise the right therein given him of receiving and disbursing the money realized from the sale by himself or by the receivers, and be allowed such compensation as the court might deem just. The Richmond Factory answered that the note held by the bank matured May 9, 1892, and that the factory did default in its payment; that the coupons attached to the six bonds held by the bank are not the property of the bank, but belong to said factory, as the indebtedness was based upon a note with the bonds attached as collateral, and the note as it matured, was reduced and renewed and the interest always paid up to the date of the maturity, etc.; that the Union Wadding Company had filed its petition, under which receivers had been appointed and authorized to dispose of the assets of this defendant,—the petition of the Union Wadding Company having been filed May 5th, while that of the bank was not filed until May 10th; that the receivers mentioned were appointed May 14th, and this defendant had turned over all its assets to them.

The amendment to the petition of the bank alleged: At the time of the filing of its petition there had been filed the petition of the Union Wadding Company, which made perfect of the mortgage in question. No service had been made of this petition and order accompanying it at the filing of the petition of the bank, under which petition the factory and Coffin, trustee, were required to show cause on May 14, 1892,—the same day upon which the rule under the petition of the Wadding Company had been made returnable,—why the relief prayed for should not be granted. On May 14th the rule granted in the case of the bank was, on motion of Coffin, trustee, adjourned over to May 21st, and the court proceeded to hear the case of the Wadding Company, in which service had been made on the same day with that of the bank's petition, but second in order of time. In response to the rule granted in the case of the Wadding Company, the factory filed its answer, and Lesser filed an intervention, and an order was moved and granted to make Coffin, trustee, a party. Young, Stearns & Lesser were on said May 14th appointed receivers, with direction to take possession of the assets of defendant, and sell the property on the first Tuesday in July, "said sale to confer on the purchasers thereat a free and unincumbered title, free from all liens and incumbrances whatsoever, which said liens and incumbrances shall attach to the proceeds of said sale without prejudice; that said purchaser or purchasers shall have the option of paying for said property in bonds at their face value, or partly in bonds and partly in cash." On May 16th, a petition was presented by the receivers asking for authority to negotiate a loan in the nature of administration, to be a first lien upon the corporate assets. No notice was given to any one, nor was this petition sworn to, and the court granted the prayer of it. Thereafter the original petition of the bank came on to be heard, when it was adjourned over until June 4th. At this time the only cause shown by the factory was a demurrer, and by the trustee an answer not under oath, both taking the position that default in the payment of interest should continue at least 90 days, and then only was the trustee authorized to proceed, as in case of maturity of the debt. On May 26th petitioner had served upon the Wadding Company, Lesser, and the receivers a notice that upon the hearing of the case it would move if, in the opinion of the court it was necessary to grant the relief prayed for, to make parties defendant of the creditors individually and of the receivers, and to enjoin the receivers from so far acting under the order of their appointment as to make a sale as therein directed; and also from acting under the subsequent order of May 16th, to negotiate a loan, etc.; and also, if in the opinion of the court it was necessary, to consolidate the two cases, and place the case under the direction of the plaintiff and other bondholders. Thereafter there appeared in a newspaper an advertisement of the sale of the property of the factory. No objection will be urged to this sale as advertised by the trustee, who is cashier of the National Exchange Bank of Augusta, which bank is a creditor to the amount of $10,800, the holding of which position and his failing to take any action puts him in a position antagonistic to the true interest of the bondholders. By the terms of the advertisement itself it does not state that the sale is to be made either subject to or free from the lien of the mortgage, although it gives the option to the purchaser of paying part cash and the balance at par value, with past-due and unpaid coupons on the bonds, but does not specify what portion shall be paid in cash and what portion in bonds. The action of the court in the appointment of the receivers, with the authority specified in the orders mentioned, and the action of the receivers in the advertisement of the property, is illegal and void, because the act under which the creditors' bill is filed is one that is construed strictly, and no pre-existing lien is interfered with thereunder unless fraud or collusion is charged, or the parties holding the lien voluntarily come into the suit, and the action of the trustee was not such appearance as would give the court jurisdiction over the bondholders; because the court has no jurisdiction to pass an interlocutory order in vacation to sell realty free from liens and under any circumstances for anything other than cash, save by consent of all the parties in interest, and no such consent was given by the bondholders, or even by the trustee; because the factory and the trustee were each restrained, under the provisions of the original order in this case, from changing the status of the property while said order continued of force, and the taking possession of the property by the receivers and advertising the same for sale was a violation of this order; because the order appointing the receivers does not define what bonds of the corporation could be accepted in part payment for the property, and does not limit the authority of the receivers to such bonds as are secured by the mortgage; because the order authorizing the issuing of receivers' certificates was granted without notice to or consent by any one, was passed in vacation, and established a lien prior even to that of the mortgage. As evidence that the mortgage covers the entire assets, petitioner calls attention to the averment of the receivers that the corporation has no assets available from which said sum could be secured. Petitioner prayed that the receivers, the Wadding Company, and Lesser be made parties defendant; that the sale be restrained, and that the receivers be enjoined from paying the certificates, except out of the assets of the corporation other than those upon which the lien of the mortgage rested. Attached as an exhibit to this amendment was the petition of the Wadding Company. Among other things, this petition alleged that the assets of the corporation would not exceed in value $50,000. That, in addition to the $30,000 in bonds, the factory was indebted to various creditors, who held no security therefor, $20,342; making a total indebtedness of $50,342, as by an exhibit attached; and that petitioner, besides being a stockholder in the factory to the extent of $20,500, was its creditor in the sum of $8,000, evidenced by promissory note, due and unpaid, etc. That the stockholders had found it necessary to shut down the mill and suspend operations for want of funds. That the machinery was idle, and likely to deteriorate. That there was no prospect whatever of the corporation being able to resume operations, and the creditors, especially those whose debts were unsecured, would lose their debts wholly or in a great part unless protected. The petition prayed for the appointment of receiver to collect the assets; that the assets be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the indebtedness in order of respective lien and priority; that parties might be made from time to time of such persons as might be interested, etc. Also the answer made by the factory to this petition of the Wadding Company. Also of petition and order thereunder making Lesser a party to the cause of the Union Wadding Company against the factory, Lesser claiming to be a creditor in the sum of $7,728.75. Also of an order making Coffin, trustee, a party. Also of the order appointing the receivers, dated May 14, 1892, of the petition of the receivers for an order to negotiate a loan to the extent of $1,500, and of the order authorizing the negotiation of such loan. Also of the newspaper advertisement of the sale of the property.

To this amendment the Union Wadding Company answered: At the time of the filing of its petition the unsecured indebtedness of the factory amounted to $20,342.40, and the secured indebtedness to $30,000. The factory then owed and now owes it $8,000, with interest, unsecured, which constitutes more than one-third in amount of the unsecured debts, and its petition charged that the factory was insolvent. On May 5th the judge sanctioned the petition, and issued the rule returnable May 14th, to show cause why the relief prayed for should not be granted, which rule was duly served May 11th. On May 14th, Lesser, an unsecured creditor, was made party plaintiff, making the amount of unsecured indebtedness represented by petitioners $15,728.75. On the same day Coffin, trustee, was made party defendant and acknowledged service, etc.; and on the same day the factory filed its answer, in which, while denying the alleged causes leading to insolvency, it admitted the fact of such insolvency; and on the same day, after full consideration and argument, the court adjudged the corporation to be insolvent, appointed receivers, and instructed them to sell the property. The selection and appointment of the persons named as receivers was made by the court at the earnest solicitation and request of creditors representing a large proportion of claims, secured and unsecured, including bondholders to the amount of $22,000, and stockholders to the amount of $70,000, as would appear by reference to the written request attached. In pursuance of the order, the receivers advertised the property for sale, and in the terms of the order. The judge, with a view of protecting all parties in interest and preventing a sacrifice of the property, subsequently fixed a reserved bid on the same of $45,000. The only liens on the property are the $30,000 of bonds. The National Bank of Augusta refused, and now refuses, to become a party to the petition of the Union Wadding Company, and, subsequently to the filing and sanctioning and service of said petition, filed a separate petition, in which the same relief, and none other, is prayed, and served respondent with notice that it would move the court to revoke the appointment of the receivers, etc. All the jurisdictional facts under the pleadings in the case of the Union Wadding Company are res adjudicata, so far as the parties thereto are concerned, and such jurisdiction cannot be attacked by one who refuses to become a party to the record, especially where the party making such attack is a bondholder represented by the trustee, who is a party to the petition first filed. Equity, having acquired and taken jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties interested in the litigation, will not revoke its appointment of receivers at the instance of a creditor filing a second petition, but will retain such jurisdiction, and make necessary parties to do complete equity. Wherefore respondent prayed that the National Bank of Augusta be made a party to the petition of the Union Wadding Company, etc. Among the exhibits attached to this answer was an order of June 7, 1892, modifying the order appointing the receivers and directing the sale so as to place a reserve bid of $45,000 on the property as a whole, and directing the receivers not to sell the property for a less sum.

The amendment was also answered by the receivers, who stated, in addition to matters already hereinbefore mentioned, they are discharging their duties faithfully, and to the satisfaction of all the parties to the record, including bondholders to the amount of $22,000. They have taken no action by which the debt of plaintiff is imperiled, but, on the contrary, the payment of plaintiff's debt is rendered absolutely sure from proceeds of sale under pending advertisement. They know of no reason why their appointment should be revoked, and others appointed in their place, or they themselves reappointed under the petition of plaintiff. Plaintiff, by attorney, was present at the hearing resulting in their appointment, and, although requested by counsel for the Wadding Company to do so, refused to become a party to said petition, or to intervene or show cause why they should not be appointed. Thirty thousand dollars of insurance on the property has been canceled by direction of the insurance companies, since their appointment, and such insurance as they have been able to continue is conditioned upon the sale of the property July 5th, and the vesting of the title in the purchaser relieved of pending litigation, and the entire insurance will be canceled should the property for any cause not be sold as now advertised, and thus irreparable loss may result. Respondents are officers of court, acting solely under its instruction, and, while so acting, cannot be made parties to an independent bill covering the same subject-matters and none other. Their acts complained of by plaintiff are the acts of the court itself, and cannot be attacked collaterally. At the hearing there was put in evidence the originals of exhibits and notes as above indicated.

Frank H. Miller, for plaintiff in error. J. R. Lamar, C. H. Cohen, and Harper & Bro., for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. From the statement of facts in the official report it will be seen that the petition under which the receiver was appointed was filed before that which the National Bank of Augusta brought against the Richmond Factory, the common debtor, and the principal defendant in both petitions. The receivership covered all the assets of the factory company, that company being an insolvent corporation. As one of its creditors, the National Bank of Augusta had a right to make itself a party to the cause in which the receiver was appointed, and thereby obtain all the equitable relief to which it was entitled. Instead of so doing, it sought that relief in an independent suit, commenced by itself in the same court, urging the appointment of another receiver. The application for this relief and for the new receivership was passed upon and denied after a receiver in the first suit had been appointed, and a judicial seizure of all of the assets of the insolvent corporation had thus been made. The present writ of error deals alone with equitable elements and with the proper procedure applicable to the same. It is a "fast" writ, based on interlocutory rulings. Why should the same court, after having seized all the assets by one receiver, make another seizure of part of the assets by another receiver? Or why should it administer a part of them in a second suit, when it can administer the whole in the first? Why should matters be thus complicated? We are clear that, as a general, if not a universal, rule, all creditors seeking to assert equitable remedies against assets of which the court has taken charge by a receiver should become parties by intervention or otherwise to the cause in which the receiver was appointed, and prosecute their remedies in that cause alone. Creditors who stand out may be allowed to prosecute their legal remedies against the assets, if they can make them available; but, if they have to invoke the exercise of equitable powers by the same court, their legal remedies are not available, and they are in no condition to proceed by separate and independent actions.

2. It is not a sound construction of section 3149a of the Code that a corporation, not municipal, must be a trader as well as insolvent in order for its assets to be subject to seizure under a creditors' bill, (or a petition in the nature of a creditors' bill,) as provided for by that and succeeding sections. The language is: "In case any corporation, not municipal, or any trader, or firm of traders, shall fail to pay," etc. It is evident that all business corporations are comprehended, whether their business be trading or not, though natural persons who are not traders, and partnerships which are not traders, are excluded. Traders, in general, as a class, and corporations, not municipal, as another class, are within the scheme and the words of the statute. There was no error calling for reversal. Judgment affirmed.

BRITISH & AMERICAN MORTG. CO. v. LONG et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

DESCRIPTION IN DEED—REFORMATION—ADVERSE CLAIM TO LAND—INJUNCTION PENDENTE LITE.

1. The fact that the former owners of a large body of land have sold two small parcels thereof so as to divide it into three separate tracts will not vitiate a description of the land in a subsequent deed as "those tracts or parcels of land lying in one body," where the specific boundaries, following such description, clearly show the intention of the parties to include in the deed the three tracts remaining unsold.

2. The reformation of a deed to correct an alleged misdescription therein will be denied, where the true construction of the description gives plaintiff all the land to which he claims title.

3. In an action under Acts 1893, c. 6, to determine adverse claims to land, plaintiff is entitled to an injunction, pending the action, to restrain defendant from selling the land under a judgment asserted by him to be a lien thereon.

Appeal from superior court, Halifax county; Whitaker, Judge.

Action by the British & American Mortgage Company against W. W. Long and others for a reformation of a deed, and to determine adverse claims to land. From an order continuing an injunction, pending the action, restraining defendants from selling a portion of the land claimed by them to be subject to the lien of a judgment in their favor, they appeal. Affirmed.

The plaintiff complained that in February, 1890, the defendants Long and wife made a deed of trust to secure plaintiff for money loaned, conveying certain lands in Halifax and Warren counties by the following description: "All the following described real estate lying in the counties of Warren and Halifax and state of N. C., to wit, all those tracts or parcels of land lying in one body in the counties of Warren and Halifax, of which the late Samuel A. Williams was seized and possessed at the time of his death, bounded on the north by the lands of Henry Wallelt and G. Branch Alston; on the west by the lands of John Neal, Dudley Neal, Transberry Neal, and Lafayette Williams; on the south by the lands of W. H. Shearin, W. G. Shearin, Mrs. Ruina T. Alston, and S. W. Hamlet; and on the east by Big Fishing creek and the land of T. C. Williams,—containing, in all, 7,000 acres, more or less." That plaintiff has recently discovered, by an actual survey of the land, that the same does not lie in one body, as described in said deed of trust, but, by reason of the sale by former owners of two small tracts off of the said body, it is now divided into three separate tracts, about 4,506 acres in one, about 1,344 acres in another, and about 82 acres in the third. Plaintiff further complains that the misdescription above named occurred by the mutual mistake of all the parties to the deed of trust; that certain judgment creditors of defendant Long, who are also defendants in this action, and whose judgments had been docketed since the registration of said deed of trust, were making efforts to sell said lands under execution upon their judgments, and thereby to cast a cloud upon plaintiff's title to the land. Some of the answers admit that judgment creditors are making efforts to sell the 1,344 and 82 acre tracts, and deny that they are covered by the deed of trust to plaintiff, or subject to the same. The prayer is for a reformation of the deed, if in the opinion of the court it is necessary to be done, and for other relief, and for an injunction to prevent further proceeding on the part of judgment creditors, parties defendant, until the determination of this action. This, in brief, is the contention of the parties.

R. O. Burton, for appellants. Thos. N. Hill and E. W. Timberlake, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. We see no necessity for a reformation of the deed of trust in the manner desired by the plaintiff, because in our opinion the description of the land in the deed of trust will cover all of the land which belonged to the said Long and wife within the boundaries set out in the deed, although it should turn out that there were three tracts instead of one body of land. The rules laid down by Chief Justice Taylor in Cherry v. Slade, 3 Murp. 82, have been frequently quoted and approved, as will be seen by reference to the above case in Womack's Digest, par. 1597: "(1) That, whenever a natural boundary is called for in a patent or deed, the line is to terminate at it, however wide of the course called for it may be, or however short or beyond the distance specified." "(3) Where the lines or corners of an adjoining tract are called for in a deed or patent, the lines shall be extended to them without regard to distance, provided those lines and corners be sufficiently established, and that no other departure be permitted from the words of the patent or deed than such as necessity enforces, or a true construction renders necessary." According to the contention of the plaintiff, all of the land—formerly in one body; now separated into three tracts by the sale of a small portion thereof—is bounded as described in the deed of trust. The lines of the adjoining tracts called for will not fit either of the three tracts, apart from the other two, but the said lines will bound the three tracts together, except as to the small tract which was sold. Here there are two descriptions, or rather a qualification of one description: "All those tracts or parcels of land * * * in the counties of Warren and Halifax of which the late Samuel A. Williams was seized and possessed at the time of his death, bounded," etc. There would be no trouble in the description embracing the three tracts, for they are described as "tracts," (plural;) but the words of qualification "lying in one body," have given rise to this contention. When a deed or will once sufficiently identifies the thing by its known name or other means, and then superadds, unnecessarily, to the description, such further description, though inaccurate, will not vitiate the previous and perfect description. Simpson v. King, 1 Ired. Eq. 11. But it is also a general rule that the deed shall be supported, if possible, and if, by any means, different descriptions can be reconciled, they shall be; or if they be irreconcilable, yet one of them sufficiently points out the thing so as to render it certain that it was the one intended, a false or mistaken reference to another particular shall not overrule that which is already rendered certain. Proctor v. Pool, 4 Dev. 370. Upon any other principle we should be at a loss to determine which tract of the three was that intended to be conveyed, for a part of the boundaries will take in either of the tracts, while all of them, if plaintiff is right in its contention, are necessary to fill the space between the different boundaries. This being the case, there being no necessity for a reformation of the deed, if plaintiff's contention be correct that all three tracts are comprehended within the boundaries set out in the deed of trust, it will be unnecessary for us to consider the effect upon subsequent judgment creditors of a reformation of the deed and correction of mistakes therein. While the action would not lie to remove a cloud upon plaintiff's title, the trustee being in possession and having adequate relief at law, (Peacock v. Scott, 104 N. C. 154, 10 S. E. Rep. 456, and cases there cited,) the act of 1893, c. 6, entitled "An act to determine conflicting claims to real property," provides that an action may be brought by any person against another who claims an estate or interest in real property adverse to him, for the purpose of determining such adverse claims. The purpose of the present action, which was begun since the passage of the act above referred to, being to determine the conflicting claims of plaintiff and the defendant judgment creditors, there is no reason why the plaintiff is not entitled to the ancillary remedy of injunction pending the action; the irreparable damage being the sale of part of the land under execution, and the consequent effect upon the sale by the trustee, and prevention of the land selling for its value at said trustee's sale. Affirmed.

STATE v. DRAKE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 31, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—CONFESSION.

Where an officer holds out a hope to a prisoner, whom he is taking before the examining magistrate, that a confession may lighten the punishment, and the magistrate, after committing the prisoner, admonishes him to tell the truth, if he tells anything, a confession made by the prisoner while being conveyed from the magistrate's office to the jail by the same officer is inadmissible in evidence, though no inducement was then held out to him, in the absence of any showing that the influence previously exerted had been removed.

Appeal from superior court, Wilson county; Shuford, Judge.

Will Drake was convicted of burglary, and appeals. Reversed.

Aycock & Daniels, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

BURWELL, J. "Thus much is certain: That no confession by the prisoner is admissible, which is made in consequence of any inducement of a temporal nature, having reference to the charge against the prisoner, held out by a person in authority." 1 Rose. Crim. Ev. p. 42. A witness for the state testified that while he was conveying the prisoner from the place where he and others had arrested him, to Elm City, where he was taken before a justice, he said to the prisoner, then in his charge: "If you are guilty, I would advise you to make an honest confession. It might be easier for you. It is plain against you." It seems to be conceded that this remark of the acting officer to his prisoner held out to him such an inducement to confess, that, if a confession had then been made to the officer, immediately, in response to the suggestion, such confession would have been clearly inadmissible. There was in what was then said to the prisoner a hope held out to him that a confession would make his punishment the lighter, and confessions thus induced by hope "are, of all kinds of evidence, the least to be relied on, and are therefore to be entirely rejected." State v. Roberts, 1 Dev. 259. But no confession came from the lips of the prisoner in answer to this advice tendered to him by his keeper, but, in its stead, an assertion of his innocence. "He said, 'I am not guilty.'" are the words of the witness. Omitting, now, any recital of what occurred during the day of this occurrence, except that the prisoner was carried before the magistrate, and was committed to jail upon evidence adduced at the examination, we find it stated in the case that his honor, over the defendant's objection, allowed this same witness to testify to a confession made to him by the prisoner while he was conveying him from the justice's office to the jail. There was no evidence of any withdrawal by the acting officer of the inducement to confess that he had held out to the prisoner while on the way to the magistrate's office, and we now consider the admissibility of this confession as if no other inducement had been used. Viewing the matter in this way, we think there was error in admitting this confession, for the law, always most careful to ascertain if hope or fear, in any degree, influenced the prisoner, will attribute the making of the confession to the inducement held out to him by his keeper. And the fact that the inducement seemed at the time to have no effect, and only elicited the reply, "I am not guilty," makes no difference in the rule. If the inducement had been held out to him by one person, and the confession had been made to another, nothing else appearing, the confession might have been admissible, for in that case there might have appeared no connection between the two. But here we have a confession made to him who had held out the hope, and while he was in fact exercising the same authority over the prisoner. The assertion of his innocence, in reply to the proposition that he should confess, and thus make it easier for him, does not at all prove that the offer of benefit from the officer who had him in charge did not find a lodgment in his mind. If so, what could be more reasonable than that, when he found himself on the way to prison, in charge of the author of this hope that a confession would alleviate his condition, he should be tempted to act then upon a suggestion that he had rejected when the prospect did not seem to him so dark, and make a confession? It may have proceeded from this cause,—from this hope so held out to him. If it may have proceeded from that cause, there is no guaranty of its truth, and it must be rejected. State v. Lowhorne, 66 N. C. 638; State v. George, 5 Jones, (N. C.) 233.

But there appears in this case, we think, another, and perhaps a more cogent, reason for the exclusion of this confession. It seems that "quite a crowd had come to the place where the investigation of the matter was had, and after the hearing of the evidence, and the decision of the magistrate to commit the prisoner to jail, he was told by the magistrate, Bailey, that, "if he was going to tell anything, to tell the truth; that there was evidence enough against him to jail him, anyway;" and the record proceeds as follows: "He looked as if he was going to tell something, and we took him upstairs, in the store, to get clear of the crowd. This was after the decision of the justice committing him to jail. The same four who arrested him were upstairs, and also Mr. Bailey. (The defendant objected to what was said upstairs. Objection sustained.) In about an hour, we started to Wilson with him." And no inducement being held out to him while on the way to the jail, nor any caution being given him, he made the confession which was admitted in evidence. Now, if it be conceded that we are wrong in our conclusion stated above,—that the inducement held out by the officer to the prisoner, which elicited the reply, "I am not guilty," was sufficient to exclude the subsequent confession, as heretofore stated,—still it seems very clear that that inducement, coupled with what the committing magistrate said to him after he had directed that he should be sent to jail, fully warranted his honor in excluding the confession said to have been made "upstairs." There was certainly enough said to the prisoner by the officer, when he arrested him, and by the justice, just after he committed him to jail, if considered together, to justify the conclusion that the confession then made was brought about by an influence that rendered it unfit for the consideration of the jury. His honor, therefore, was right in excluding it. It is a well-settled rule that, if promises or threats have been used, it must be made to appear that their influence has been entirely done away with before subsequent confessions can be deemed voluntary, and therefore admissible; and hence, it having been found that an improper influence was used to obtain the confession that was excluded, and it not having been made to appear that that influence had been in any way removed, the confession made on the journey to the jail, to one of the crowd, should also have been excluded. State v. Drake, 82 N. C. 592. The defendant is entitled to a new trial.

SPENCER v. HAMILTON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 31, 1893.)

MEASURE OF DAMAGES—BREACH OF CONTRACT.

For breach of a lessor's covenant in a lease to clean out certain ditches on the leased premises, failure to do which caused the land to be flooded, and prevented the lessee from making a full crop, the lessee's measure of damages is not merely what it would have cost him to put the ditches in good order, but he is entitled to recover for the decrease in the net yield of his land, caused by the lessor's failure to put it in the condition he had covenanted to do.

Appeal from superior court, Hyde county; Bynum, Judge.

Action by Samuel G. Spencer against George W. Hamilton for rent. The defendant interposed a counterclaim for damages caused by plaintiff's failure to clean out certain ditches, as he had covenanted to do in the lease. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The issues submitted to the jury, and their answers, are as follows: "(1) What is the value of the crop of corn, cotton, and potatoes raised on the land leased by defendant from plaintiff for the year 1889? Answer. $125. (2) What damage, if any, has plaintiff sustained by the wrongful detention of the property described in the complaint? A. $100, with interest. (3) Did plaintiff perform his contract in regard to the ditches and canal? A. No. (4) What damage has defendant sustained by reason of plaintiff's failure to perform his contract? A. $25."

The court, among other things, charged the jury as follows: "If the jury should find that the plaintiff contracted with defendant to put the ditches and canal in order, or to furnish money to have such work done, and that he failed to do so, then the measure of damages would be what it would have cost defendant to have done the work, and would not be the difference in value of the crop raised upon the land as it was, and the crop which would have been raised had such ditches and canal been put in order." To this charge the defendant excepted.

Chas. F. Warren, for appellant. W. B. Rodman, for appellee.

CLARK, J. "Where one violates his contract, he is liable only for such damages as are caused by the breach, or such as, being incidental to the act of omission or commission, as a natural consequence thereof, may reasonably be presumed to have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. This rule of law is well settled, but the difficulty arises in making its application." Pearson, J., in Ashe v. De Rossett, 50 N. C. 209. There was evidence that defendant leased the land for $100, and as a part of the contract of leasing the lessor was to have certain ditches cleaned out, and by his failure to do so the land was flooded, and the crop lessened. Here it was in contemplation of both parties that the cleaning out of the ditches was essential to the making a full crop, and that the failure to do so would lessen the production. The question, therefore, what effect the failure to clean out the ditches and canal had upon the crop, and to what extent it was damaged thereby, was competent as giving some light to the jury in measuring the damages sustained by defendant by breach of the contract by lessor. The difference between the crop made and what would have been made if the ditches had been cleaned out does not exactly measure the loss, as it would have cost something to house the additional yield. The true test is, how much was the net yield of defendant's cropping for the year lessened by the failure to put the land in the condition stipulated for by the lessor? The decreased production was an important factor in arriving at that conclusion. The difference in profit and yield between land drained and not drained was clearly in contemplation of the parties in making the contract. In telling the jury that the difference was what it would have cost defendant himself to have cleaned out the ditches, the court below erred. It is true, the defendant might have put the ditches and canal in order, and, if so, he could have charged the lessor with the cost thereof. This would have been the better course. But perhaps he was not able. At any rate, he was not legally called upon to do this. It was the lessor who contracted to rent a drained farm, and the defendant's loss by having to work an undrained farm, instead, is the measure of damages. The case of Sledge v. Reid, 73 N. C. 440, is not analogous. That was a case of tort for wrongfully taking a mule. The primary loss was the value of the mule, and that the taking him hindered the plaintiff in making a crop was purely incidental, and the damage to the crop was too remote. This case is more like Mace v. Ramsey, 74 N. C. 11, but differs from it in that here the farm was rented and the enterprise proceeded with, but its profitability was impaired by the failure of the lessor to do the draining after the lessee had proceeded with his farming operations, relying upon the lessor's stipulation. As in Mace v. Ramsey, we may say: "This case is easily distinguishable from Foard v. Railroad Co., 8 Jones, (N. C.) 235; Ashe v. De Rossett, Id. 240; Boyle v. Reeder, 1 Ired. 607; and Sledge v. Reid, 73 N. C. 440, and similar cases,—in that in those cases the damage was incidental and unforeseen, or merely vague, uncertain, and conjectural, and in this they are immediate, necessary, and reasonably certain, and such as were in the contemplation of the parties to the contract." Error.

STATE v. RILEY.

CRIMINAL LAW—POWER OF COURT TO DIRECT VERDICT.

Though the evidence for the state in a criminal case is uncontradicted, the court can only instruct the jury to return a verdict of guilty if they believe the state's evidence; and it is error for it to direct the clerk to enter a verdict of guilty.

Appeal from superior court, Orange county; H. R. Bryan, Judge.

W. J. Riley was convicted of a criminal offense, and he appeals. Reversed.

C. D. Turner, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. The evidence for the state being uncontradicted, the court told the jury,

If they believed the evidence, to return a verdict of guilty. This was correct upon the evidence set out, and if the jury had returned a verdict there would be no ground for exception. State v. Burke, 82 N. C. 551. But the case further states: "After pausing for a moment or two, and the jury manifesting no disposition to retire, the court told the clerk to enter the verdict of guilty." It was not necessary that the jury should retire, but it was indispensable that the jury should agree upon and render the verdict. The court cannot direct a verdict in a criminal case. State v. Dixon, 75 N. C. 275; State v. Shule, 32 N. C. 153. In the latter case, Pearson, J., thus draws the distinction in this respect between civil and criminal actions: "When a plaintiff fails to make out a case, the judge may say to the jury, 'If all the evidence offered be true, the plaintiff has not made out a case,' and direct a verdict to be entered for the defendant, unless the plaintiff chooses to submit to a nonsuit. It is, in effect, a demurrer to the evidence. The plaintiff has no right to complain, for in reviewing the question of law he has the benefit of the supposition that the evidence offered by him and the inferences of fact are all true. So, when the plaintiff's case is admitted, the whole question turns upon the defense attempted to be set up. If, taking the facts to be as contended for by the defendant, the court is of opinion that he has made out no answer to the action, it is proper, and saves time, for the court to direct the verdict to be entered for the plaintiff. The defendant is not prejudiced because, upon appeal, the question will be presented in the most favorable point of view for him. But the present case is not like either of these, for the state had not made out a case unless the state's witness was believed, and the credibility of witness must be passed on exclusively by the jury. It is true, from the case as made out, there could be but little room to doubt that both defendants were guilty, and the wonder is why the jury should have hesitated about convicting both. Still that was a matter for the jury, and its being a plain case, although it accounts for, does not legalize, this novel mode in entering a verdict." The rule is also laid down by Mr. Circuit Judge McCrary (Mr. Justice Miller of the United States supreme court concurring) in U. S. v. Taylor, 3 McCrary, 500, 505, 11 Fed. Rep. 470: "In civil cases, where the facts are undisputed, and the case turns upon questions of law, the court may direct a verdict in accordance with its opinion of the law; but the authorities which settle this rule have no application to criminal cases. In a civil case the court may set aside the verdict, whether it be for the plaintiff or defendant, upon the ground that it is contrary to the law as given by the court; but in a criminal case, if the verdict is one of acquittal, the court has no power to set it aside. It would be a useless form for a court to submit a civil case involving only questions of law to the consideration of a jury, where the verdict, when found, if not in accordance with the court's view of the law, would be set aside. The same result is accomplished by an instruction given in advance to find a verdict in accordance with the court's opinion of the law. But not so in criminal cases. A verdict of acquittal cannot be set aside, and therefore, if the court can direct a verdict of guilty, it can do indirectly that which it has no power to do directly." This is cited in 2 Thomp. Trials, § 2149. In short, when the court holds that the evidence, if true, fails to make out a case, it can direct a verdict against the state in criminal actions as against the plaintiff in a civil action, though usually, if a serious question is involved, a special verdict is rendered in the former and a nonsuit taken in the latter case, that the action of the court may be reviewed. In a civil case the court can direct a verdict against the defendant when the plaintiff's cause of action is admitted, and the evidence or matter set up in defense, if true, would be no defense. This cannot possibly happen in a criminal action, since to admit the state's cause of action (the indictment) is to plead guilty. In a civil case the court may direct a verdict also when "the facts are undisputed, and the case turns upon questions of law solely," (U. S. v. Taylor, supra;) but in a criminal case this can only happen upon a special verdict. The plea of not guilty disputes the credibility of the evidence, even when uncontradicted, since there is the presumption of innocence, which can only be overcome by the verdict of a jury. The furthest the court can go in a criminal action is to charge the jury that if they believe the evidence the defendant is guilty. Upon the evidence set out in the record there was a plain case against the defendant, and also against his principal as well, (who, for some unknown reason, is not on trial,) if the evidence is to be believed; but of that a jury and a jury alone can judge. By reason of his honor's inadvertence at the moment to the above essential distinction between civil and criminal actions, we must direct a new trial.

STATE v. DE KING.

GAMES OF CHANCE—TENPINS.

The game of "tenpins" is not a "game of chance," within the meaning of Acts 1891, c. 29, which makes it a misdemeanor for any person to play a "game of chance at which money, property or other thing of value is bet." State v. Gupton, 8 Ired. 271, followed.

Appeal from superior court, Person county; G. H. Brown, Judge.

Defendant, De King, was indicted for playing and betting at a game of chance, and was acquitted. The state appeals. Affirmed.

The Attorney General, for the State. Boone & Parker, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The defendant is indicted for a violation of chapter 29 of the Acts of 1891, which provides "that it shall be unlawful for any person to play at a game of chance at which money, property or other thing of value is bet, whether the same be in stake or not, and those who play and bet therein shall be guilty of a misdemeanor." The defendant both played and bet at a game known as "tenpins," and the manner in which such game is played is particularly described in the special verdict. The only question to be decided is whether such a game is a game of chance, and that it is not we have direct authority in the case of State v. Gupton, 8 Ired. 271. After an interesting discussion as to what constitutes a game of chance, Ruffin, C. J., concludes that "we take this game to be one species of the game known in England, and spoken of in her statutes, under the general term of 'Bowls;' and, if it be, there is legal authority for holding it not to be a game of chance." The attorney general, with his usual and commendable candor, yields the case under the above decision. Affirmed.

CUMMINGS v. HUFFMAN et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 31, 1893.)

CASE ON APPEAL—SERVICE—OBJECTIONS—ADMISSION IN PLEADING—EFFECT.

1. A case on appeal must be served by an officer, unless appellee's attorneys accept service otherwise.

2. An appellant has a right to disregard an objection to the case on appeal, not served on him within five days after the service of such case on appellee, as required by statute; and appellant's failure to send the case to the judge for settlement after the service of such an objection is not an admission of the facts therein stated.

3. An appeal will not be dismissed simply because there is no case on appeal before the supreme court, but the judgment will be affirmed, unless error appears on the face of the record proper.

4. Where an answer to an amended complaint denies any indebtedness from defendant to plaintiff, the fact that the original answer admitted part of the debt sued for is not conclusive, but is a mere admission against interest, to be passed on by the jury; and it is error for the judge to enter judgment for the amount admitted in the original answer, where the jury has found against any indebtedness whatever.

Appeal from superior court, Alamance county; Whitaker, Judge.

Action by J. T. F. Cummings against D. W. M. Huffman and others, as executors of Rachel Graham, deceased, for services rendered deceased as a physician. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendants appeal. Reversed.

The case on appeal served by defendants on plaintiff was returned to defendants indorsed as follows: "The plaintiff returns the statement of the case on appeal to the defendants with the following objections: That the action was tried at March term, 1892, which term ended on Saturday, the 19th day of March, 1892; that the defendants' case of appeal was served on the plaintiff by the sheriff of Alamance county, by copy, on the 4th day of April, 1892, being more than ten days after the adjournment of said court and the end of said term; and the plaintiff insists that the defendants have lost their right of appeal by failing to serve their case on appeal within the time prescribed by law, and he therefore returns the copy of the case served on them to defendants, and objects to the said case for the reasons aforesaid. W. P. Bynum, L. M. Scott, Attorneys for Plaintiff. April 7, 1892."

Busbee & Busbee, for appellants. J. E. Boyd, for appellee.

CLARK, J. There being a disputed question whether there was service, in time, of the case on appeal, if properly raised, it should have been submitted to the court below to find the facts. Walker v. Scott, 102 N. C. 487, 9 S. E. Rep. 488. The appellee contends that his objection indorsed on the case, that the service was on the 4th of April, (after expiration of the 10 days,) was admitted by the appellants' not sending the case to the judge to settle. Owens v. Phelps, 92 N. C. 231; Jones v. Call, 93 N. C. 170. Unfortunately for appellee, the exception was not served till April 11th, after the expiration of the five days allowed by statute, and therefore goes for naught. There is however, no evidence of the service of the appellants' case within the time prescribed, and it, also, must be disregarded. Peebles v. Braswell, 107 N. C. 68, 12 S. E. Rep. 44; Manufacturing Co. v. Simmons, 97 N. C. 89, 1 S. E. Rep. 923. It is true a certiorari was sent down to which the clerk returns that there is indorsed on the original case deposited in his office by appellants, "Copy served on plaintiff by W. H. Carroll, atty. for defendants, April 1, 1892." Without in any way recognizing as valid this attempt to settle the disputed question of fact by copying a written declaration of a party in his own interest instead of submitting the question to the judge, (Walker v. Scott, supra,) it is sufficient to say that the return does not help the appellants. Unless service is accepted, it must be made by an officer. Any other mode is invalid, and a nullity. Allen v. Strickland, 100 N. C. 225, 6 S. E. Rep. 780; State v. Johnson, 109 N. C. 852, 13 S. E. Rep. 843; State v. Price, 110 N. C. 599, 15 S. E. Rep. 116. There being no legal case on appeal before us, it does not follow that the appeal should be dismissed. The proper course is to affirm the judgment unless error appears upon the face of the record proper. McCoy v. Lassiter, 94 N. C. 131, and other cases cited in Clark's Code, (2d Ed.) p. 580.

Upon inspection of the record it appears that by the original answer and amended answer the defendants admitted an indebtedness of one dollar; but, an amended complaint being filed, the defendants were permitted to file an amended answer thereto, in which they denied any indebtedness whatever. An issue based upon these final pleadings was submitted to the jury: "Is the plaintiff entitled to recover of the defendants? If so, how much?" to which the jury responded, "No." Thereupon his honor rendered judgment as follows: "It appearing to the court from the admission of the answer that the defendants were indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of one dollar, it is adjudged that the plaintiff recover the sum of one dollar and the costs of the action." The record shows an entry of appeal and service of notice within legal time. The appeal itself is an exception to the judgment.

There is error upon the face of the record. The indebtedness was denied in the final pleadings of the parties, and, upon the issue thus made, the jury found that the defendants were not indebted. The admission in the first two answers of an indebtedness of one dollar was simply an admission against interest, like any other. It was competent to introduce the first two answers as evidence, (Adams v. Utley, 87 N. C. 356); but the admission was not conclusive. It might be shown that it was made under a misapprehension, or by mistake or inadvertence. Smith v. Nimocks, 94 N. C. 243. The jury passed upon the issue, and upon this evidence of an admission, if plaintiff saw fit to offer it. Upon the verdict, judgment should have been rendered in favor of defendants against the plaintiff and sureties to the bond for costs. The case is remanded, that it may be so entered. Reversed.

HILL et al. v. GLENDON & GULF MIN. & MANUF'G CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 31, 1893.)

CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS—PARTIES—RIGHTS OF TENANT IN COMMON—FAILURE TO AGREE ON COMPENSATION.

1. Where a petition by a tenant in common for the assessment of damages for a right of way taken by a railroad company enumerates all persons who have any interest in the land, as required by Code, § 1944, and such persons voluntarily come into court, and make themselves parties, a demurrer to the petition for defect of parties will not be sustained, though such persons were not joined in the petition either as parties plaintiff or defendant.

2. A grant of a railroad right of way by the owner of an undivided interest in land will not prevent his cotenant from instituting proceedings against the railroad for the assessment of the damages he has sustained.

3. Where the grantor of such a right of way joins in the proceedings to obtain a forfeiture of the grant and the assessment of his damages, the fact that the right of forfeiture had not accrued when the grantor's cotenant originally filed his petition is immaterial, since Code, §§ 1947, 1949, require the rights of all the parties to be ascertained and adjusted in the one proceeding.

4. Code, §§ 1698, 1699, 1943, which require a petition by a railroad company for the condemnation of land to allege that the parties are unable to agree as to the value of the land, do not apply where the landowner institutes proceedings for the assessment of damages caused by the taking of his property for a right of way by the railroad.

Appeal from superior court, Chatham county; H. R. Bryan, Judge.

Petition by T. N. Hill and others against the Glendon & Gulf Mining & Manufacturing Company for the assessment of damages caused by the taking of petitioners' land for a right of way. The clerk of the court sustained defendant's demurrer to the petition, and petitioners appealed to the superior court, where the demurrer was overruled. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

This was a special proceeding instituted before the clerk of Chatham superior court by Thomas N. Hill and his infant children, owners of one-fourth of the tract of land in said county known as "La Grange," to have damages assessed for the petitioners against the defendant for the taking of their interest in the part of said land by defendant for right of way for its railroad, and heard at chambers in Durham, on March 31, 1893, before Bryan, J. John Manning and wife and M. A. Southerland, who together own three-fourths of the land, came into court, and made themselves parties to the proceeding, and claimed that they also were entitled to damages or compensation from the defendant, for the reason, as they allege, that the grant of a right of way over the land which they had made to the defendant had become null and void, the defendant having agreed that it should be void if the road was not constructed within two years from the date of the grant, and this had not been done. The period of two years had not elapsed when the original petition was filed, but had elapsed when they made themselves parties. The defendant filed a demurrer, which was sustained by the clerk. An appeal was taken. His honor heard the appeal, and overruled the demurrer, and the defendant appealed. The demurrer was as follows:

"The defendant demurs to the original complaint (or petition) filed in this proceeding by the petitioner Thos. N. Hill, and his children and copetitioners with him, and specifies the following objections thereto, to wit: (1) For that it appears from the face of said complaint (or petition) that there is a defect of parties in that John Manning and his wife, Louisa J. Manning, M. A. Southerland, and A. P. Gilbert are not joined, either as plaintiffs or defendants. (2) For that the said complaint (or petition) does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that the said complaint alleges a conveyance by petitioners' cotenants in common, to the defendant of the right of way for its railroad through the land described in the complaint, and does set forth therein and thereby a legal justification for the alleged action of the defendant. (3) For that said complaint (or petition) does not set forth, as is provided in sections 1698 and 1699, c. 38, and in sections 1943 and 1944, c. 49, Code of North Carolina, inability of plaintiffs (or petitioners) to 'agree' with defendant for the purchase of the right of way in question, nor any effort to 'agree' about it.

"And the defendant, excepting to all orders of the court allowing interpleading prior to service of process or return day for defendants' appearance in this proceeding, demurs to the aforesaid complaint (or petition) as adopted by A. P. Gilbert on the grounds: (1) For that at the date of said A. P. Gilbert's interplea there was still a defect of parties, in that said John Manning and wife, Louisa J. Manning, and M. A. Southerland were not joined as parties, either plaintiff or defendant. (2) For that as to said A. P. Gilbert the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in his favor, in that said complaint (or petition) alleges a conveyance to the defendant by the lessors of said Gilbert of the right of way for its railroad through the land described in the complaint, and does set forth therein and thereby a legal justification for the alleged action of the defendant. (3) For that it is a misjoinder of causes of action to unite in the same proceeding the alleged cause of action of said A. P. Gilbert with that of his coplaintiffs as against this defendant. (4) For that the complaint does not state the unexpired term of said Gilbert's alleged lease. (5) For that the said Gilbert's interplea adopting the original complaint does not state inability to 'agree,' or any effort to 'agree,' with defendant about the values of his alleged interest in the right of way in question, as is provided in sections 1698 and 1699, 1943 and 1944, Code of North Carolina. And the defendant, excepting to all orders of the court allowing interpleading by John Manning and wife and M. A. Southerland, demurs to the original complaint (or petition) as affected by the interplea of said John Manning and wife and M. A. Southerland as a misjoinder of causes of action in this: That the alleged cause of action of the original petitioners, Thomas N. Hill and his children, accrued prior to December 23, 1892, (the date of the commencement of this proceeding,) and the alleged cause of action of said John Manning and his wife, Louisa J. Manning, and M. A. Southerland accrued (if at all) subsequent to said December 23, 1892, viz. not until after March 7, 1893. (2) For that the alleged grounds of the interplea of said John Manning and his wife, Louisa J. Manning, and M. A. Southerland constitute (if at all) a new cause of action arising or accruing since December 23, 1892, the date of the commencement of this action. (3) For this: That it appears from the face of the interplea of said John Manning and his wife, Louisa J. Manning, and M. A. Southerland that under the deeds set forth as exhibits, and annexed thereto, the entry on the lands therein described, and excavations made and embankments erected, etc., therein prior to March 7, 1893, were justified thereby, and said John Manning and wife, Louisa J. Manning, and M. A. Southerland are thereby estopped to claim damages therefor, and article 5 of said interplea does not allege an entry, etc., subsequent to March 7, 1893, or after an alleged failure of the 'conditions,' as it is termed, of said deeds, and said article 5 is ambiguous and indefinite as to when plaintiffs intended to allege said entry, excavations, and embankments were made; and in this said interplea of said John Manning and wife, Louisa J. Manning, and M. A. Southerland fails to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (4) For this: That said John Manning and wife, Louisa J. Manning, and M. A. Southerland cannot maintain this proceeding against this defendant, under the provision of chapters 49 and 38, Code of North Carolina, as is shown upon the face of said interplea, and a proper construction of the said deeds, this not being such a case as is provided for by statute as falling within the class of cases in sections 1943 and 1944 and 1699 and 1698, Code of North Carolina, where parties are 'unable to agree,' etc. Wherefore defendant demands judgment that this proceeding be dismissed, and for judgment against all the petitioners and interpleaders and the surety on the prosecution bond for costs."

W. A. Guthrie, for appellant. T. B. Womack, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The provisions of section 1944 of the Code seem clearly to indicate that in a proceeding under that section all parties "who own or have, or claim to own or have, estates or interests" in the land over which a right of way is sought to be condemned, shall be brought before the court to the end that all the persons interested in the assessment of the damages may be bound by the action of the commissioners, who will find what gross sum, if any, is due to the owners, and that they may all be heard when the court comes to apportion the sums between the several owners according to their respective interests or estates in the land. The petition, whether filed by an owner or by the railroad company, should state the names of all persons interested, and all of them should be in court before the commissioners are appointed. The petition filed by the original petitioners, Thomas N. Hill and his children, alleged that these children were the owners in fee of one undivided fourth part of the land described in the said petition, the father having a life estate in that part; that Mrs. L. J. Manning, wife of John Manning, owned one undivided fourth part in fee, and that M. A. Southerland owned an undivided half in fee, and that A. P. Gilbert had a lease for five years on all of the tract. Here we have a careful compliance with the provisions of the statute,—a full enumeration of all those who owned any interest or estate in the premises. And this enumeration of the owners of the land was accompanied by the statement of the petitioners, made on information and belief, that Mrs. Manning and M. A. Southerland, who together owned three-fourths of the land, had conveyed to the railroad company a right of way through the premises. It thus became evident that, in order to have a complete determination of the matter, it would be necessary to bring into court not only the defendant company, from whom alone the plaintiffs sought damages, but those other owners. They might well have been made defendants originally, but they have come in and been made petitioners, and thus all parties interested are present, and will be bound by what is done in the proceeding. The position taken by the defendant company that there was a defect of parties when the petition was first filed is untenable. What the petitioners wished was to have their damages assessed and paid. It was not their concern to inquire whether or not the company had come to an agreement with their cotenants and the tenant for years, and had settled with those parties. In their petition they gave to the court and to the defendant information about the other persons who had an interest in the premises, as, under the statute, they were required to do. If the defendant had settled the matter with those other parties, it had but to say so in its answer, and ask that the commissioners should only report the sum due the petitioners; or, if it had not settled the matter with those parties, it was its privilege to ask the court to have them brought in, that a complete determination of the matter might be had. But, whatever may be thought about the propriety or necessity of their being original parties, it is surely sufficient that, before defendant's demurrer was filed, they all voluntarily came into court, and made themselves parties. No suggestion is made that there is any one who claims any estate or interest in the land that is not now, and was not when the demurrer was filed, a party. Therefore there can be no defect of parties. What the rights of the respective individuals are is another matter, that will be hereafter determined.

The position of the defendant that the petition does not state a cause of action is equally untenable. If, as petitioners say they are informed, the defendant has acquired by agreement with the other parties a right to use and occupy for its purposes their shares (three-fourths) of the land covered by the "right of way," it will not be required by the final judgment in the cause to pay any damages to those persons. Under the ample provisions of sections 1947 and 1949 of the Code,¹ the rights of all the parties can be ascertained and adjusted in this one proceeding. The whole damage to the land may be estimated, and it may then be determined, by reference or otherwise, how much of the gross sum the defendant owes; or what proportion of the right of way has been acquired, if any, by contract, may be first ascertained, and the damages or compensation due to the parties who have not been paid may be found and reported by the commissioners.

It was argued before us that the legal effect of the deeds from John Manning and wife and M. A. Southerland to the defendant is such that the original petitioners cannot maintain this proceeding under section 1944 of the Code, and that at any rate Mrs. Manning and M. A. Southerland cannot join in this petition for the assessment of damages for the reason that at the date of the filing of the original petition, according to the statement of those parties contained in their interpleas, the defendant had not lost its title to the right of way acquired from them by it. It cannot, we think, be seriously contended that the owners of one undivided fourth of a tract of land, through which a railroad is constructed, can be deprived of their right to have the damages due to them assessed under the provisions of section 1944 by the purchase by the railroad company of the right of one of the other tenants in common. And the rights of all the parties in the damages for the taking of the land, whether those rights continue as they were at the time the petition was filed or are changed and modified by subsequent events, can all be adjusted under the provisions of sections 1947 and 1949.

As another cause of demurrer the defendant insists that the petition does not state (as it says it should) that the petitioners were unable to come to an agreement with the defendant as to the sum to be paid by it to them for the taking of their land. This was not necessary. The statute requires the railroad company, when it becomes the actor in such a proceeding, as it may be, to state that fact as its justification for summoning to court a citizen whose land it wishes to take by condemnation. But when the citizen merely seeks pay for his property that has been taken from him under a license from the state, the law does not impose upon him the necessity of asserting that he and the taker of his property have not agreed. His proceeding is in itself an emphatic asseveration to that effect. What has been said seems to us sufficient to cover all the grounds of demurrer. We find no error in the rulings of his honor, and the cause is remanded to be proceeded with according to law. No error.

ISLEY v. BOON et ux.

JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—RETURN OF SERVICE.

1. A sheriff's return that a summons was "executed by delivering a copy to J. and his wife, R." is sufficient to show that a copy was delivered to each of them, which was the only method of service provided by law when the proceedings were instituted; and the judgment in such proceedings is not subject to collateral attack by the wife on the ground that the return does not show that a copy of the summons was personally delivered to her.

2. In a collateral attack on a judgment in a special proceeding ordering the sale of an intestate's land, the sheriff's return, showing a proper service on the heirs, is conclusive; and parol evidence is not admissible, as against a purchaser at such sale, to show that in fact no proper service was made.

Appeal from superior court, Alamance county; Bryan, Judge.

Action by Christian Isley against Rowena Boon and John Boon for the recovery of real estate. From a judgment in defendants' favor, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

L. M. Scott, J. E. Boyd, and C. E. McLean, for appellant. J. T. Morehead and W. P. Bynum, Jr., for appellees.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The plaintiff claims the land in controversy through one John Ireland, who purchased the same at a sale made by E. S. Parker, administrator of Samuel Adams, pursuant to a decree in a special proceeding granting to the said administrator license to sell the land of said Adams for the purpose of creating assets to pay the indebtedness of his intestate. The plaintiff introduced a part of the record in the said proceeding, and, under a ruling in this case on a former appeal, (109 N. C. 555, 13 S. E. Rep. 795,) was permitted to prove by parol evidence such other parts thereof as were lost, and could not, after proper and diligent search, be found in their legal depository. That part of the record which had not been lost consisted of a summons dated November 27, 1875, which was returned, under the signature of the sheriff, in these words: "Executed by delivering a copy to John Boon and wife, Rowena. Fees, 60 cents." The docket of the clerk was also introduced, which showed the following entries: "Summons issued November 27, 1875. Summons executed." The defendant Rowena, who is an heir of the said Samuel Adams, contends that it does not appear from said return that she was properly served, and she insists that she can, in this action, collaterally attack the decree in the special proceeding, and thus defeat the title of the plaintiff, who, as we have stated, claims under John Ireland, who was not a party to the said proceeding, and does not appear to have had any notice of the alleged absence of service on the said Rowena.

It was undoubtedly necessary, in order to confer jurisdiction, that the summons should have been served, and, at the time of the commencement of the above-mentioned proceeding, the method of service was by the delivery of a copy of the summons to the defendant, personally. Battle, Revisal, c. 17, § 82. The courts have been very liberal in construing the returns of sheriffs, and in Alabama it was held that the word "Executed" was sufficient; the court saying that the word itself implies that the writ has been executed according to law. Mayfield v. Allen, 1 Minor, 274. The like ruling has been made in Virginia and Kentucky, the courts holding "that the word 'Executed,' ex vi termini, carries with it the idea of a full performance of all that the law requires. Com. v. Murray, 2 Va. Cas. 504; Bridges v. Ridgley, 2 Litt. 395. This principle is of very general application, except in those states where, by statute, alternative modes of serving process have been adopted, in which instances a much more stringent doctrine is held, and it is required that the return must show, not only that the process has been served, but which one of two or more statutory modes of bringing a defendant before the court has been adopted by the officer. It was in reference to provisions of this nature that some of the cases cited by defendants' counsel were decided. In this state, there was but one mode of service provided by law, and the principle referred to has been explicitly recognized by the court in Strayhorn v. Blalock, 92 N. C. 292. At that time the statute required that the summons should be served by reading the same to the defendant, (Code, § 214,) and the court held that the return of the summons, with the indorsement "Served," implied that the officer had fully discharged his official duty, by reading the summons to the defendant. Of course, where the officer undertakes to set forth the manner of service, and it appears that he has not complied with the requirements of the law, the force of such implication is entirely destroyed; but, unless the return shows a repugnancy that cannot be harmonized, the principle applies with unimpaired vigor. The return before us states that the summons was executed by delivering a copy to the said Boon and wife, and we see nothing unreasonable in holding that this language is not inconsistent with the idea that he delivered to each of them a copy. None of the cases cited by counsel, so far as we have been able to examine them, go to the extent of deciding that such a return is void, and therefore may be attacked collaterally. The returns in those cases were either set aside upon direct proceedings, or were attacked in proceedings to enforce the judgment against the parties, or upon plea in abatement. Thus, in the case of Versepuy v. Watson, 12 R. I. 342, the defendants in an action of assumpsit pleaded in abatement that in fact but one copy was left at the "usual place of abode," and that the officer said it was a copy for one of the defendants, only. The court held that such a plea would be good, if established. So, in Bugbee v. Thompson, 41 N. H. 183, the plea was also in abatement, and it will appear, upon examination, that in none of the cases cited, either from this or other states, has language similar to this received the construction contended for by the defendants. Certainly, the fact that the sheriff received only 60 cents for making the service cannot be permitted to overcome the legal implication of the word "Executed," when, as we have seen, it is entirely consistent with the words that follow. Whatever doubt, however, that might exist upon the construction of the return, must vanish before the authority of McDonald v. Carson, 94 N. C. 498. In that case a notice was issued to three parties, and the return was, "Executed by delivering a copy." The language is identically the same as that in the present return, except the latter is perhaps stronger, by the addition of the "to John Boon and wife, Rowena." The court said that the "term used in the return, 'Executed by delivering a copy,'" necessarily implies a delivery to each of those to whom the notice is addressed, as otherwise it would be but a partial and uncompleted service. Such, also, seems to have been the view of his honor, but he committed an error in holding that the return was, in this action, only prima facie evidence of service, and could be rebutted by showing that in fact no such service was made. Even if the service had been apparently irregular, the judgment could not be collaterally attacked in this action. Sumner v. Sessoms, 94 N. C. 371; Doyle

v. Brown, 72 N. C. 393; and numerous other decisions in our Reports. See, also, 1 Black, Judgm. 263, and 1 Freem. Judgm. 126. Seeing the force of this position, the intelligent counsel of the defendants insisted that the decree in the special proceeding was absolutely void by reason of the insufficiency of the service, as indicated by the return of the sheriff. This is untenable, in view of our conclusion that the construction contended for should not be placed upon the said return.

It is unnecessary to review in detail the great number of cases cited on the argument. It is sufficient to say that we can find nothing in them which conflicts with the views we have taken in arriving at the conclusion that there should be a new trial.

TRINITY COLLEGE v. TRAVELERS' INS. CO. OF HARTFORD.

LIFE INSURANCE—INSURABLE INTEREST.

Where no ties of blood or marriage exist, one can have an insurable interest in the life of another only when he is a creditor of or surety for such other; and a policy of life insurance procured by a religious society, supported largely by voluntary contributions, on the life of one of its members, is void as a wagering contract.

Appeal from superior court, Durham county; G. H. Brown, Judge.

Action by Trinity College against the Travelers' Insurance Company of Hartford, Conn., to recover the surrender value of a policy of insurance on the life of Edward Samuel Sheppe, in which plaintiff is the beneficiary. From a judgment sustaining defendant's demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The materials facts of the complaint are as follows:

"(3) That on August 23, 1893, Edward Samuel Sheppe, of Durham, county of Durham, state of North Carolina, applied to said defendant for a policy of life insurance for twelve hundred and fifty dollars upon his own life, for the benefit, as in said application expressed, of 'Trinity College, Durham, N. C., a religious corporation sustained and controlled by the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of North Carolina, of which church applicant is a member;' and that thereafter, to wit, on September 5, 1893, said plaintiff having paid the premium demanded therefor by said defendant, said defendant, in consideration of such premium and the application therefor by said Sheppe, issued and delivered to plaintiff its policy No. 75,658, by which it insured the life of said Sheppe for the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars, payable upon acceptance by said company of satisfactory proof of his death, as therein expressed, to 'Trinity College of Durham, N. C., a religious corporation sustained and controlled by the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of North Carolina, of which church the said E. S. Sheppe is a member.' (4) That in and by said policy said defendant promised and agreed that at the time of its issue, and every subsequent year from date of issue, the cash value specified in table 'cash surrender values,' indorsed thereon, would be paid for it, provided it should be in force under its original conditions, and was legally surrendered therefor to the home office of said defendant within thirty days from the close of such period. * * * (5) That before bringing this action, and within thirty days from the date of issue of said policy, and while it was still in force under its original conditions, said plaintiff surrendered said policy to the home office of said defendant at Hartford, Connecticut, and demanded of said defendant the payment to it of the sum of two hundred and seventy-five dollars, its cash surrender value according to said table of 'cash surrender values,' which was refused by said defendant. (6) That at the time of said application, and at the date of issue of said policy, said Sheppe was, and he is now, a member of said Methodist Episcopal Church South, of North Carolina, in good and regular standing. (7) That said plaintiff is supported and maintained by voluntary contributions, gifts, bequests, and devises from members of said church, and by yearly assessments levied by the conferences of said church upon the various churches composing such conferences, which are paid by the members of said churches; and that but for such contributions, gifts, bequests, devises and assessments said plaintiff would fail of that support which is necessary to its useful existence."

The defendant demurred to the complaint on the following grounds: "(1) For that it appears in said complaint that the plaintiff corporation, Trinity College, has no insurable interest in the life of the assured E. S. Sheppe, and that the said corporation has paid to the defendant all the premiums that have been paid on said policy of insurance. (2) For that it appears in said complaint that the contract of insurance sued upon was but a wagering contract, entered into by the said plaintiff and defendant; the said plaintiff having at the time the said contract was entered into, and still having, no interest in the continuance of the life of the assured E. S. Sheppe, and said contract, being such a wagering contract, is against public policy, and cannot be enforced. (3) For that while it appears in said complaint that the assured, E. S. Sheppe, filed application for the policy of insurance, it appears that the plaintiff paid the premiums, and was the real party in making said wagering contract, and therefore cannot be permitted to recover on it. (4) For that it appears in the complaint that the contract of insurance provided for the payment of the cash surrender value upon the legal surrender of the policy, and it appears that the attempted and alleged surrender was made by the plaintiff only, and during the lifetime of the assured, which attempted and alleged surrender was not legal, the assured not joining in it."

Fuller & Fuller, for appellant. Boone & Parker, for appellee.

BURWELL, J. It is said in Mr. May's work on Insurance (section 102a) that "to have an insurable interest in the life of another one must be a creditor or surety, or be so related by ties of blood or marriage as to have reasonable anticipation of advantage from his life," and that an insurable interest in the life of another is "such an interest, arising from the relation of the party obtaining the insurance, either as creditor of or surety for the assured, or from ties of blood or marriage to him, as will justify a reasonable expectation of advantage or benefit from the continuance of his life." Accepting these definitions as those which are to be deduced from all the adjudged cases, and leaving out of consideration those cases in which the fact that there was an insurable interest was dependent upon the existence of ties of blood or marriage, we find that this author asserts substantially that, in cases where there exists no ties of blood or marriage, one can have an insurable interest in the life of another only when he is the creditor of or the surety for the assured. Under certain conditions a partner has an insurable interest in the life of his copartner. Insurance Co. v. Luchs, 106 U. S. 498, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 949. So, one who is interested peculiarly in the future earnings of another under a contract with him has an insurable interest in his life. Bevin v. Insurance Co., 23 Conn. 244. These instances, and others that might be mentioned, seem to show that, except in cases where there are ties of blood or marriage, the expectation of advantage from the continuance of the life insured, in order to be reasonable, as the law counts reasonableness, must be founded in the existence of some contracts between the person whose life is insured and the beneficiary, the fulfillment of which the death will prevent; it must appear that by the death there may come damage which can be estimated under some rule of law, for which loss or damage the insurance company has undertaken to indemnify the beneficiary under its policy. When this contractual relation does not exist, and there are no ties of blood or marriage, an insurance policy becomes what the law denominates a "wagering contract," and under its rules, made and enforced in the interest of the best public policy, all such contracts must be declared illegal and void, no matter what good object the parties may really have in view. The end will not, in the eye of the law, justify the means. No error. Affirmed.

THACKSTON v. PORT ROYAL & W. C. RY. CO.

NEGLECT—PROXIMATE CAUSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. An instruction that if deceased died from injuries received by defendant's negligence, and said negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries, plaintiff should recover, but, if deceased died from some other cause, the verdict should be for defendant, is not erroneous as ignoring plaintiff's burden of proof, this having been already fully explained to the jury.

2. The judge refused an instruction that if deceased was as likely to have died from any other disease than one arising from his leap, (to escape a peril caused by defendant's negligence,) the verdict should be for defendant, and charged, "I cannot charge this request, but will say, before you can find for plaintiff, you must be satisfied" that deceased died from injuries caused proximately by defendant's negligence; but, if deceased died from other causes, not the direct result of injuries received through defendant's negligence, the verdict should be for "defendant. Said request ignores the evidence as to the cause of death." Held no ground for exception.

3. An instruction that, while the court has felt it is his duty to say so much as to the law of the case, he is persuaded that the case must turn in great measure on a question of fact, is not erroneous as permitting the jury to disregard the law as laid down, there being in the case a cardinal question of fact as to the proximate cause of the injury.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by T. B. Thackston, administrator of the estate of W. N. Boon, deceased, against the Port Royal & Western Carolina Railway Company, for damages for injuries resulting in death of intestate. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The judge charged:

"The plaintiff, T. B. Thackston, as administrator of W. N. Boon, brings this action against the Port Royal and Western Carolina Railway Company, to recover damages for an alleged injury to W. N. Boon while serving the defendant company in the capacity of an engineer. The complaint alleges the following facts as constituting the plaintiff's cause of action: That on or about the 4th day of October, W. N. Boon was in the employment of the defendant company as an engineer, and was running a locomotive engine belonging to the company between the cities of Spartanburg, S. C., and Augusta, Ga.; that while in the discharge of this duty, at a point near Waterloo, in Laurens county, in this state, the locomotive engine operated by W. N. Boon as engineer was run into by another locomotive and train of cars belonging to the defendant company, and a collision took place; that W. N. Boon was in no way responsible for said collision, but the same was directly attributable to the gross negligence and carelessness and the wanton recklessness of the defendant company; that at the time of the collision, and on account of the same, W. N. Boon was forced to jump from the locomotive run by him to save his life, and that in doing so he was severely bruised and injured, and on the 22d day of October thereafter he died from said bruises and injuries; that his death was directly attributable to the negligence and carelessness of the defendant company; that he left surviving him as his only heirs at law his wife, Eliza C. Boon, and two minor children; that plaintiff duly administered on his estate; and that the death of W. N. Boon, so caused, has resulted in great damage and loss to his wife and children, and has taken from them the aid, comfort, happiness, and support which he had furnished while living, and which he would have continued to furnish to them. Judgment is demanded in the complaint for $25,000. The defendant company, in its answer to the allegations of the complaint which I have just recited, admits that the collision occurred on the line of road of the defendant, about the time stated in the complaint, but denies that the collision was caused by the gross negligence and carelessness and the wanton recklessness of the defendant; but, on the contrary, alleges that the collision was caused by the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate, W. N. Boon, and his fellow servants. The defendant company further denies that W. N. Boon, in jumping from his locomotive, was in any way bruised or injured, and alleges that W. N. Boon did not jump from his engine until it had come to a full stop, and that he did so before the collision occurred, and that in so jumping he escaped all injury and evil consequence, and was able to assist in removing the wreckage caused by said collision, and that he was after the collision a perfectly sound and able-bodied man. The defendant company further denies that the death of W. N. Boon was caused by the recklessness, carelessness, or negligence of the defendant, or was in any wise connected with or attributable to any act whatever of the defendant, but, on the contrary, alleges that the death of W. N. Boon was due to a congestive chill, or to malarial dysentery and congestion, or some other similar disease, the result of natural causes, and in no way connected with the collision; and denies that the defendant company is in any wise responsible for the loss or affliction which may have fallen upon the family of W. N. Boon, caused by his death, and that any legal damage has been upon them. So the issues which you are to consider and decide are clearly defined by the pleadings. You are to determine from the testimony whether there has been any negligence in the case on the part of the plaintiff or the defendant. You are made the sole judges of the facts. I am not allowed to invade your province by intimating even an opinion as to the facts, and I shall endeavor not to do so. The law, however, you are to take from the court. I will say here, in the outset, that the burden of the proof is on the plaintiff. He must satisfy you by the preponderance of the evidence on all the material issues involved, before he can ask a verdict at your hands, and if he fails to do so, he cannot recover. My duty, therefore, is to explain to you what negligence is, and then leave you to say whether or not the facts which may be found by you from the evidence constitute negligence in the light of the law; in other words, whether the facts proven constitute negligence.

v.18s.E.no.8—12

"Now, what is negligence? Negligence is sometimes defined to be the absence of due care; that is, the absence of that care which men ordinarily bestow in the management of their own business and affairs. It is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or the doing what such person—that is, a reasonable and prudent person—would not have done under the circumstances of the situation. The existence of negligence depends upon the requirements of the occasion. To recover damages for an injury done by the defendant company in a case like the present, the plaintiff must prove to your satisfaction, by the preponderance of the evidence, two things: (1) Negligence on the part of the defendant company; and (2) that the injury complained of was the result of such negligence. The negligence complained of must be shown to have been the proximate cause of the injury. By 'proximate cause,' I mean the first direct cause producing the injury. An act is said to be the proximate cause of an event when, in the natural order of things, and under the existing circumstances, it would necessarily produce the result or event. Contributory negligence is such an act or omission on the part of the plaintiff as amounts to want of ordinary care, which, concurring or co-operating with the negligent act of the defendant, is the proximate cause or occasion of the injury complained of. To constitute contributory negligence, there must, as I have already said, be a want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, and a proximate connection between the want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff and the injury sustained. Where contributory negligence is the issue, there are two questions to be determined: First, was there an exercise of ordinary care under the circumstances? and, secondly, was there a proximate connection between the act or omission complained of and the injury? If the testimony satisfies you that the deceased did not, under the circumstances of the situation, exercise ordinary care, and that this want of ordinary care on his part was the direct and proximate cause of the injury complained of, then a case of contributory negligence would be made out, and the plaintiff could not recover. For the rule, as I understand it, in a case like the present, is that if the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate contributed in any degree to the cause or occasion of the injury there can be no recovery. It would be different, however, if the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate was the remote cause of the injury. In such case there would be no contributory negligence, and he might recover. And here I may say that it is wholly immaterial when the negligence of the plaintiff's intestate operated to produce the injury, if his negligence was the proximate cause of the injury complained of. When this is the case, there is no cause of action, and there can be no recovery.

"I have frequently used the term 'ordinary care,' and it may be necessary that I should explain to you what is meant by the term 'ordinary care.' Now, ordinary care is that measure of prudence and carefulness which the average prudent man might be expected to exercise under the circumstances of the situation. The failure to exercise ordinary care amounts in law to ordinary negligence. And in this connection I would say that, even should the testimony satisfy you that there was negligence on the part of the defendant, if the deceased, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the injury, and failed to do so, he would be regarded in law as the author of his own injury, and could not recover. While, as I have said, negligence is the want of due care, gross negligence has been defined to be the want of even slight care and diligence. It is a greater want of care than is to be understood by the term 'ordinary care.' The negligence charged against the defendant is gross negligence and carelessness. You are to determine from the evidence if there was a want of that care and diligence on the part of the defendant on the occasion of the collision which was requisite under the circumstances of the situation. If you should find there was, and that this negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, then the plaintiff would be entitled to recover.

"Now, it is the duty of the court to instruct you what in law constitutes a fellow servant, and what constitutes a representative of the master. Whether or not the person in question is one or the other is a question of fact to be solved by you. Fellow servants are those who are in the same common employment, serving the same master or employer, and under the control of the master or employer. If the person is employed to do any of the duties of the master or employer, he is in law a representative of the master or employer, and not a fellow servant. A conductor in charge of a train has been held in this state to be a representative of the company. Now, if there was in this case negligence on the part of the conductor who was in charge of the train which collided with the train operated by W. N. Boon, and that negligence was the direct and proximate cause of the injury from which W. N. Boon died, the defendant company would be responsible. If, however, it was only the remote cause of the injury, the defendant company would not be liable. As a general rule, the master or employer is not liable for damages resulting from the negligence of fellow servants in the course of their common employment. Coemployees are held in law to assume the risk of the negligence of one another. In assuming the risk incident to the common employment, a fellow servant assumes the risk of negligence by his coemployees. While I have felt it my duty to say this much in relation to the law bearing upon the issues raised by the pleadings in this case, I am persuaded that the case must turn in a very great measure upon a question of fact. Both in the testimony and in the arguments to which you have listened much has been said in regard to the cause of the death of W. N. Boon. On the part of the plaintiff it is contended that W. N. Boon died from injuries received in the collision, while on the part of the company it is contended with equal zeal and earnestness that he died from the effects of malarial fever. The main and most important question, then, for your determination is, what caused the death of W. N. Boon? It is a grave and serious question, and much depends upon the answer. In answering this question you must look to the testimony,—the whole testimony. You must reconcile it where it is conflicting, and determine its weight, truth, and sufficiency. And in the performance of this duty you should be actuated by but one motive, governed by but one desire, and have but one object in view, namely, that of arriving at the truth. The chart by which you are to be guided is contained in the oath which you, and each of you, have taken. You shall well and truly try all issues, and a true verdict give according to the evidence. Your verdict, when rendered, must be the truth, as shown by the facts presented in evidence. Outside influences, plausible inferences, eloquent appeals, personal likes and dislikes, should not enter into your deliberations or shape your conclusion. If you should conclude from the evidence that the deceased came to his death from injuries received in the collision through the negligence of the defendant, and that this negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries, then your verdict shall be for the plaintiff. If, on the other hand, you should conclude from the evidence that the deceased came to his death from the effects of malarial fever, and not from the effect of any injury received in the collision, then your verdict should be for the defendant, no matter how negligent the defendant may have been on that occasion. Should you conclude that the plaintiff is entitled to recover, you will have to fix the amount of the recovery. In an action like the present it is not necessary that the plaintiff should prove in dollars and cents the damages which the beneficiaries under the act have sustained. And in passing upon the question of damages you are not to take into consideration the sorrow and distress caused by the death of the husband and father. Damages in cases of this kind are for the injury,—pecuniary injury, as I understand it,—and must be in proportion to the injury resulting from the death to the wife and children. The plaintiff is entitled, in the language of the act, to recover 'such damages as the jury may think proportioned to the injury resulting from the death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit the action is brought.' The damages, as you will observe, are to be estimated for the injury, and must be in proportion to the injury resulting from the death to the beneficiaries.

"I have been requested to charge you by defendant's counsel as follows: '(1) The burden of proof is on the plaintiff and before he can recover in this action he must satisfy the jury by the preponderance of the testimony that the death of W. N. Boon was the result of injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant company.' I have already so charged you, and so charge you now. '(2) If the testimony is evenly balanced as to the cause of the death of W. N. Boon, then the verdict must be for the defendant.' I have, in effect, charged you this, because, if the evidence is equally balanced, there can be no preponderance, and you must decide all material issues by the preponderance of the evidence. '(3) If the jury find that W. N. Boon was as likely to have died from any other disease than one arising from his leap, then their verdict should be for the defendant.' I cannot charge this request, but will say that before you can find a verdict for the plaintiff you must be satisfied by the preponderance of the evidence—that is, the weight of the evidence—that W. N. Boon died from the effect of injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant, and that this negligence was the direct or proximate cause of injury. But should you be satisfied by the weight of the evidence that W. N. Boon died from other causes, not the direct result of injuries received through the negligence of the defendant, your verdict would have to be for the defendant. This request, as I understand, ignores the evidence submitted, tending to show the cause of the death."

Joseph Ganahl and Nicholls & Moore, for appellant. Stanyarne Wilson and Bomar & Simpson, for respondent.

POPE, J. This action for damages came on to be heard before Judge Izlar and a jury at the October, 1892, term of the court of common pleas for Spartanburg county, when a verdict for the plaintiff was rendered, and a motion for a new trial on the minutes was refused. Judgment being entered, a notice of appeal was given. The following are the grounds of appeal: "The judge erred in charging the jury: '(1) If you should conclude from the evidence that the deceased came to his death from injuries received in the collision through the negligence of the defendant, and that this negligence was the proximate cause of the injuries, then your verdict should be for the plaintiff. If, on the other hand, you should conclude from the evidence that the deceased came to his death from the effects of malarial fever, and not from the effect of any injury received in the collision, then your verdict should be for the defendant,' etc. The error being that the causes of Mr. Boon's death, whether directly from the injury, or from the effects of disease, are in this statement placed on the same equal basis of proof, his honor ignoring and contradicting herein other portions of the charge, in which the law is stated to be that the preponderance of evidence must be that Mr. Boon died from an injury received in the collision. This charge, then, in connection with the next grounds manifestly misled the jury. (2) In refusing to charge, as requested by defendant: 'If the jury find that W. N. Boon was as likely to have died from any other disease than one arising from his leap, then their verdict should be for the defendant.' (3) In adding to his refusal to charge as above the words: 'I cannot charge this request, but will say that before you can find a verdict for the plaintiff you must be satisfied from the preponderance of the evidence that W. N. Boon died from the effect of injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant, and that this negligence was the direct or proximate cause of the injury. But if you should be satisfied by the weight of the evidence that W. N. Boon died from other causes, not the direct result of injuries received through the negligence of the defendant, your verdict would have to be for the defendant.' The error being, as with the first exception herein, of placing the cause of death, whether from injury received from his leap or whether from other causes, on the same ground of proof; his honor defining 'preponderance of evidence' to mean 'weight of evidence' when speaking of the cause as from the injury, and then stating, if the jury should be satisfied by 'the weight of evidence' that Boon died from other causes, then the verdict should be for the defendant. (4) In further adding to his refusal to charge as requested above, the following words: 'This request, as I understand it, ignores the evidence submitted tending to show the cause of the death,' when it is respectfully submitted there is nothing in the request which ignores the evidence submitted in general, or of that which showed the cause of death. (5) In refusing to grant a new trial when there is not a scintilla of evidence that Mr. Boon was injured at all by the leap which he took to avoid the collision, and not a particle of evidence that this leap was the proximate cause of his death. (6) In charging, in substance, that the defendant must show of what disease the intestate died. (7) In charging: 'While I felt it my duty to say this much in relation to the law bearing upon the issues raised by the pleadings in this case, I am persuaded that the case must turn in a great measure upon a question of fact;' intimating that while he gave the law they were not to consider it, but simply decide a question of fact. (8) In charging the main and most important question is, 'What caused the death of W. N. Boon?' and saying nothing of their duty to consider the question of contributory negligence. (9) In charging, in substance, in several places, that if plaintiff proved his intestate came to his death from injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant, he was entitled to recover, ignoring the defense of the defendant that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, even if he came to his death by its act, which defendant denies."

W. N. Boon was the engineer of a train owned and operated by the defendant railroad, the Port Royal & Western Carolina Railway Company, on about the 4th day of October, 1890, and while making a trip from Spartanburg to Augusta, at about 10 and 32 minutes o'clock at night of that date, at a point on the railway near Waterloo, in Laurens county, in this state, while running strictly on the schedule prepared by defendant, another train coming from Augusta, on its way to Spartanburg, which latter train, according to the testimony of its conductor in this cause, collided with the train under the charge of Engineer Boon, because the conductor, in charge of the train from Augusta, having fallen asleep, thereby neglected to take a side track that the train under Engineer Boon might pass by in safety. To avoid the effect of a collision, the engineer, Boon, after reversing his engine, leaped from his engine. At first it was thought he was uninjured, but the next morning he limped, and on carrying his engine to Laurens he complained to a coemployee "of his heel and his back when he stood up." He lay over in Spartanburg, and then went to a small place in North Carolina, about 100 miles from Charlotte, to attend to some private business of his own, but was suffering while he was there. He returned to his work as engineer on defendant's road about 10th or 11th October, 1890, running three nights in succession. On the 17th October, 1890, while in Augusta, he had what was thought a congestive chill, and had medical advice, but on the next day returned to Spartanburg, when he took his bed, from which he never arose alive, for he died on the 22d of October, 1890. At the trial, by reason of the issues raised by the pleadings,—for the plaintiff claimed that Boon came to his death by reason of injuries received while he was forced to jump from his engine to avoid the collision that resulted from defendant's negligence, and the defendant claimed that Boon emerged from that collision "a perfectly sound and able-bodied man," and that his death "was due to a congestive chill, or to malarial dysentery and congestion, or some other similar disease, the result of natural causes, and in no way connected with the aforesaid collision,"—much testimony was given on all these matters, and a sharp contest between medical experts was had as to the cause of Boon's death. The judge's charge is unusually clear, and, inasmuch as appellant has inserted blocks of it in his ground of appeal, we desire the charge, in its entirety, reproduced in the report of this case. We will now examine the questions raised by appellant.

1. In its fifth ground of appeal it complains that the circuit judge denied its motion for a new trial, and the points upon which it relies relate to the testimony, its weight and effect. We have too often laid down the well-recognized rule that the circuit judge, in considering the force and effect of the testimony adduced at the trial, will not be interfered with by this court. It is only on questions of law wherein the circuit judge may have erred will this court interfere. Let this ground of appeal be dismissed.

2. The first ground of appeal is mainly made up of a quotation from the judge's charge to the jury. Before further consideration of this ground of appeal, we deem it proper to state that this mode of raising an objection to a judge's charge is very objectionable. This court is always pleased to have counsel to assist them by calling attention to the specific errors alleged against the court below; but surely some better method should be adopted by them than embodying a block of the judge's charge in a ground of appeal, and then associate with such quotation counsel's argument to show the judge's error. However, we will proceed to consider it. We have read the judge's charge with special care. When it is construed as a whole, it betokens unusual care on the part of the judge to have the jury apply the law governing this class of cases correctly. Of course, the propositions of law must be stated clearly, and to do this such propositions must be orderly presented. Sometimes an apparent repetition is required to do this. These propositions proceed step by step. Having once or twice made a statement of the law, the circuit judge then goes a step further, and need not repeat what he has already made clear. So it was in the case at bar. The judge had already instructed the jury that "to recover damages for an injury done by the defendant company in a case like the present the plaintiff must prove to your satisfaction, by the preponderance of the evidence, two things: (1) Negligence on the part of the defendant company; (2) that the injury complained of was the result of such negligence." The circuit judge immediately afterwards explains that the negligence must be the proximate cause of the injury, and explains what proximate cause means. He then carefully calls the jury's attention to the effect of contributory negligence by the plaintiff, and shows how it will operate to discharge the defendant company from any negligence on their part. We might go on, and pile up the evidence as to the fidelity of the judge in this charge to the jury in refutation of this criticism, but we will not do so. We cannot sustain this ground of appeal.

3. The next error may be considered as embodied in the second, third, and fourth grounds of appeal. The defendant requested the circuit judge to charge: "If the jury find that W. N. Boon was as likely to have died from any other disease than one arising from his leap, then their verdict should be for the defendant." Although the judge declined to charge in the language prayed for, he met their issue, for he immediately instructed the jury: "I cannot charge this request, but will say, before you can find a verdict for the plaintiff, you must be satisfied from the preponderance of the evidence—that is, the weight of the evidence—that W. N. Boon died from the effect of injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant, and that this negligence was the direct or proximate cause of injury. But if you should be satisfied from the weight of the evidence that W. N. Boon died from other causes, not the direct result of injuries received through the negligence of the defendant, your verdict would have to be for the defendant. [Italics ours.] This request, as I understand, ignores the evidence submitted tending to show the cause of death." The sentence in this extract immediately preceding the last sentence therein virtually gives the defendant the benefit of the charge he sought, though not exactly in the form submitted in the request to charge. This right of selection by the judge must be allowed. It was not a captious or hypercritical act on his part, but, on the contrary, was intended to keep before the minds of the jury the issues raised by the pleadings and the testimony given in the cause. Let these exceptions be overruled.

4. The appellant's sixth ground of error is very general,—too much so under the rules of this court; but in overruling it we will say we fail to find any evidence in the charge of the circuit judge upon which to predicate this attack upon it.

5. In the seventh exception we fail to find any objection to the language complained of. There is no doubt that the law he had laid down would be remembered by the jury, but all the judge meant by the language used was that the case, so far as the jury was concerned, would turn upon the view they might be led to adopt after having heard the testimony of a fact in the case, namely, the cause of Boon's death. If appellant had reproduced the language of the judge immediately succeeding that he quoted, all difficulty in his mind would have been removed.

6. As to the eighth exception, we must say that the judge was right, for the main question in the case was, "What caused the death of W. N. Boon?" It was distinctly raised in the pleadings as the pivotal question, and it was so treated in the testimony offered. Let this exception be overruled.

7. The ninth exception is not sustained by the case. The judge clearly set forth the defense of contributory negligence. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McIVER, C. J., and McGOWAN, J., concur.

JENKINS v. RICHMOND & D. R. CO.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 8, 1893.)

INJURY TO RAILWAY EMPLOYE—FELLOW SERVANTS—"SAFE PLACE."

1. An assistant fireman of one train is a fellow servant of the conductor of another train, both being in the employ of the same company.

2. Neglect of the servant in charge of a train, part of which was standing on the track, detached from the engine, to warn an approaching train, is not a breach of the master's duty to furnish a "safe place," entitling an injured employe to recover.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Richland county; W. H. Wallace, Judge.

Action by John H. Jenkins against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Andrew Crawford and Alston & Patton, for appellant. B. L. Abney, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff, an employe of the defendant, for the recovery of damages sustained by him through the negligence of the defendant company. The case came on for trial before his honor, Judge Wallace, and the defendant company interposed an oral demurrer that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendant. The judge, without stating his reasons, sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the complaint. From this order the plaintiff appeals to this court upon one general ground,—that the judge erred in sustaining the demurrer. Upon this state of the pleadings, the facts well alleged must be assumed to be true, and therefore it is necessary to set out the important allegations made. He complains substantially as follows: "That the plaintiff, John H. Jenkins, on March 3, 1890, at the time of the committing of the grievances hereinafter complained of, was in the employment of the defendant as an assistant fireman upon a locomotive engine, No. 135, the property of the said defendant, driven by steam upon its road, and it was the duty of the defendant to provide an unobstructed track for said engine running upon its track, and to give warning of any obstructions thereon by placing torpedoes on the track, and signaling said engine at a distance therefrom remote enough to enable the engineer to avoid a collision therewith by the employment of the appliances used in stopping engines, trains, etc. That on the said March 3, 1890, while the plaintiff, in the performance of his duty as aforesaid, on the locomotive engine No. 135, was going north from Columbia over the defendant's road, and at a point thereon about 2½ miles from said city, there were standing on defendant's track, on the line of the Columbia & Greenville Railroad, several cars in charge of the conductor of the train from which they had broken loose, and which had preceded, by fifteen or twenty minutes, said engine No. 135, in its progress up the road as aforesaid. That the defendant, its agents and servants in charge of the loose cars as aforesaid, not regarding their duty, conducted themselves so carelessly, negligently and unskillfully that they failed to make said obstruction known to those in charge of the approaching engine No. 135, in time to stop the same, either by placing torpedoes on the track, or by signaling the engineer running said engine, at a point sufficiently removed from said obstruction wherein it was possible to stop said engine, as is required by the rules and regulations governing the running of engines on the road of the above named defendant. That for the want of due care and attention to the duty devolving upon the said defendant, its agents and servants, as aforesaid, at the time and place aforesaid, and while the said loose cars were in the use and service of said defendant, and in charge of one of its conductors, as aforesaid, on the track of the said railroad, and while the plaintiff was in the performance of his duty in the capacity as aforesaid in the service of said defendant, by reason of the carelessness, negligence, and recklessness of the said defendant, its agents and servants, in failing to give proper signals which would have stopped the approaching engine in time to avoid all possibility of a collision, this plaintiff, to save his life, was forced to leap from said engine while it was running rapidly over said track, just before it reached said obstruction, whereby his arm was broken at the wrist, causing a permanent injury, and he was for days and weeks unable to work at all, and can never perform a man's full share of manual labor, owing to said permanent injury; and his sufferings both mental and physical were intense, and continued until his wound healed; all to his damage $1,950.00."

The principles upon which a railroad company is responsible to a stranger or to passengers transported for a consideration are reasonably well defined and understood by the profession. But a corporation must of necessity act through agents, and the relations between the ideal existence known as the corporation and its own employees for him are not at all so clear or well defined. On the contrary, there is some confusion and much difference of opinion on the subject; so much so that the doctrines as to "fellow servants" and responsibility for their acts have been characterized by a learned judge "as a perplexing and tangled subject." Since the case of Murray v. Railroad Co., 1 McM. 385, decided by our then court of errors in 1841,—the first of our cases on the subject, if not the first on the American continent,—the general rule has been considered as established on principle and policy "that a railroad company is not liable to one of its agents for an injury arising from the negligence of another competent agent." And in one of the latest and fullest publications which treats of the subject the principle is stated thus: "The general rule, resulting from considerations of justice as of policy, is that he who engages in the employment of another for the performance of specified duties and services for compensation takes upon himself the natural and ordinary risks and perils incident to the performance of such services. The perils arising from the carelessness and negligence of those who are in the same employment are no exception to this rule; and where a master uses due diligence in the selection of competent and trusty servants, and furnishes them with suitable means to perform the services in which he employs them, he is not answerable to one of them for an injury received by him in consequence of the carelessness of another, while both are engaged in the same service. * * * The rule thus established was almost universally followed, and the labor of the courts since has been in properly applying it, and determining its principal limitations," etc. See 7 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 823, and numerous cases cited. The plaintiff here was an assistant fireman on train No. 2, injured, as alleged, by the negligence of "the agents and servants" (without indicating which) of the defendant company on another train (No. 1) in not giving timely notice of certain "loose cars" being on the track of the company; and he (the plaintiff) claims that the judge committed error in holding that the conductor on train No. 1 and the assistant fireman on train No. 2 were fellow servants, in the sense of the rule. The employees of a railroad are generally numerous, and necessarily divided into classes, according to the work assigned them. But all of the persons thus employed under one principal in the conduct of one common enterprise, such as operating a railroad, are, according to the ordinary meaning of the word, servants or employees of one principal, and, as it would seem, "fellow servants" of each other. But it is said that by successive decisions of the courts the rule has been modified, and, according to the limitations imposed, the parties here were not technically "fellow servants." After some conflict, we suppose it may be regarded as settled that whether parties are "fellow servants" in the sense of the rule does not depend upon the grade, rank, or authority of the two servants. A fireman and engineer or conductor are "fellow servants." Judge Cooley states that persons are "fellow servants when they engage in the same common pursuit under the same general control." Cooley, Torts, 541. Judge Thompson, in his work on Negligence, announces as a general rule that all who serve the same master work under the same control, derive authority and compensation from the same common source, are engaged in the same general business, though it may be in different grades or departments of it, are fellow servants, who take the risk of each other's negligence. Or, in the forcible view of Judge Brewer, lately appointed associate justice of the supreme court or the United States, in the case of Howard v. Railroad Co., (1886,) 26 Fed. Rep. 837: "Neither can it be said that Ryan and decedent were engaged in a different class of work. * * * True, they were on different trains, and at the time of the accident had no opportunity of noticing the conduct of each other until too late to prevent the collision. But, being engaged in the same kind of service, they must naturally have been often thrown into contact, and had ample opportunities for mutual supervision. * * * He who engages in train service knows that other trains besides his will be running, and may fairly be considered as contracting to take the risk of the negligence of the employees managing such trains. He must expect to be employed now on one train and now on another, to be thus thrown into contact with the other employees in that service, to know himself what is proper care in such work, and be able to detect any evidence of carelessness on the part of those in like service." See Howard v. Railroad Co., 26 Fed. Rep. 837; Newport News & M. V. Co. v. Howe, 3 O. O. A. 121, 52 Fed. Rep. 362; Railroad Co. v. Donnelly, (Va., 1892,) 14 S. E. Rep. 692. But it is said that there is one limitation to the general rule which has been well established, and that it is this: That, while the question as to whether parties are fellow servants is not to be determined by the rank or grade of the offending or injured servant, "it is to be determined by the character of the act being performed by the offending servant. If it is an act that the law implies a contract duty on the part of the employer to perform, then the offending employee is not a servant, but an agent, but as to all other acts they are fellow servants." As we understand it, this is the rule which has been adopted in this state. See Gunter v. Manufacturing Co., 18 S. C. 270, and Calvo v. Railroad Co., 23 S. C. 529. In these cases the chief justice announced the doctrine as follows: "The true question is whether the person in question is employed to do any of the duties of the master. If so, then he cannot be regarded as the fellow servant or co-laborer of the operatives, but is the representative of the master, and any negligence on his part in the performance of the duty of the master thus delegated to him must be regarded as the negligence of the master." This we have held to be the true test, and the only question now is whether it is applicable to and must rule this case. Let us see what is the proper construction of this limitation. As we have seen, the employees of a railroad company are necessarily divided into classes, to each of which, in the division of labor, certain specific ordinary duties are assigned, as to which each servant, within the compass of his employment, in one sense, is the representative of the company. Is it the intention that "the duties of the master" referred to as changing the character of an employee into that of master should include those matters of ordinary regulation and management, or only those original and essential duties implied by the contract of service; such, for instance, as the duty of keeping a safe and sound track, furnishing all proper appliances, competent servants, etc.? But, be this as it may, competent authority has indicated the following as "the duties of the master" referred to, viz. to furnish suitable machinery and appliances, and keep them in repair, the selection and retention of sufficient and competent servants, and the establishment of proper rules and regulations, etc. Under the head of "appliances" is understood to be included a proper roadway, or, as it has come to be phrased, "a safe track and a safe place to work." Did the company directly or indirectly violate any of these fundamental contract duties in this case? It will be observed that there is no allegation in the complaint that the cars were "loose" on the track from any fault or negligence on the part of the servants in train No. 1, nor any distinct allegation as to the time when they were detached, or, indeed, in what manner the accident occurred; nor is there any allegation that the track was not safe or sufficient, or there was wanting suitable appliances or competent servants. As we read it, the only allegation of fact made by the complaint was one, not of commission, but of omission,—that the servants on train No. 1 did not give proper signals, which would have stopped the train approaching in time to avoid the collision. This is entirely a different case from that of Calvo v. Railroad Co., supra, where one Wooten, a section master and supervisor of the track-laying force, disregarding the signal carried by a preceding train, which indicated that it was to be followed by another, did not wait for that other train, but at once took up the track, making a gap in the road which derailed the engine, and inflicted the injury complained of. It thus appears that there was not only a failure to furnish a safe track, but really the destruction of it. The facts of this case are essentially different, and we may adopt as applicable to this the statement of a learned judge, lately made in one of the numerous cases on the subject: "So far as the place and machinery, both were safe. There is no pretense that the track was not in good order, or that the engines and other implements for the movement or control of the train were not sufficient. It will not do to say that because Ryan's engine was in the way, and collided with decedent's train, the track was not clear, and therefore the master had failed in his duty of providing a 'safe place' for the employees to work in and upon. The negligent use by one employee of perfectly safe machinery will seldom be adjudged a breach of the master's duty of providing a safe place for the employees. Such a construction would make any negligent misplacement of a switch, any collision of trains, even any negligent dropping of tools about a factory, a breach of the duty of providing a 'safe place.' The true idea is that the place and the instruments must in themselves be safe, for this is what the master's duty fairly compels, and not that the master must see that negligent handling by an employee of the machinery shall not create danger," etc. We cannot doubt that the employees of train No. 1 and the plaintiff on No. 2 were fellow servants when the plaintiff jumped and broke his arm, without such fault or negligence on the part of the company as to make them liable for damages; and therefore we think the circuit judge committed no error of law in dismissing the complaint. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McIVER, C. J., and POPE, J., concur.

STATE ex rel. MORSE v. CORNWELL et al., County Com'rs.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 13, 1893.)

TOWNS—LIMIT ON BONDED DEBT.

Const. art. 9, § 17, providing that no bonded debt incurred by a county or municipality shall exceed 8 per cent. of the assessed value of the taxable property therein, appoints as standard the last tax assessment before the bond issue, and no subsequent assessment is material.

Mandamus on relation of R. M. Morse against J. D. Cornwell and others, as commissioners of York county, to levy a tax on Broad River township to pay coupons on bonds of said township. Writ denied.

Lord & Burke, for petitioner. D. E. Finley and Wm. B. McCaul, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. This is an application addressed to this court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction for a mandamus to compel the respondents, as the corporate agents of Broad River township, in York county, to levy a tax upon the taxable property of said township sufficient to pay certain past-due coupons on bonds issued by respondents as such corporate agents, of which the relator is the bona fide holder. Inasmuch as there is but a single question presented for the determination of the court, we need not go into any detailed statement of the pleadings, but it will be sufficient for us to state the conceded facts and admitted propositions of law out of which the question arises which we are called upon to decide. It is conceded that the amount of the bonds here in question is the sum of $24,000, and, if the same is a valid debt of Broad River township, then such debt was incurred on the 22d day of December, 1888, on which day the act was passed purporting to fix such debt upon said township. It is likewise conceded that said township "is a municipal corporation or a political division of the said state, within the provisions of section 17, art. 9, of the constitution of the state of South Carolina." That constitutional provision, as may be seen by reference to the Acts of 1884, (18 St. 690,) reads as follows: "Any bonded debt hereafter incurred by any county, municipal corporation, or political division of this state shall never exceed eight per centum of the assessed value of all the taxable property therein." It is very obvious that the legislature had no power to fix upon this township any debt in excess of the limit prescribed by the constitutional provision just quoted; and hence, if the amount of $24,000, purporting to be fixed upon Broad River township by the act of 1888, above cited, was in excess of 8 per centum of "the assessed value of all the taxable property therein" at the time the act was passed, it follows necessarily that said act, in so far as it purported to fix such debt upon said township, was unconstitutional and void; for it is admitted in the argument—and properly admitted—that the time when the debt purports to have been contracted is the time to which reference must be had in ascertaining whether the constitutional limit has been exceeded. The inquiry, then, is, was the sum of $24,000 in excess of 8 per centum of the assessed value of all the taxable property in Broad River township on the 22d December, 1888? It being conceded that the assessed value of all the taxable property in said township, as ascertained by the next preceding assessment which had been made in the early part of the year 1888, for the fiscal year of 1887-88, before the act purporting to create the debt was passed, amounted to $271,350, while the assessed value of all such property as ascertained by an assessment made in February, 1889, for the fiscal year 1888-89, after the passage of said act, amounted to $314,400, it is quite clear that, if the former assessment be taken as one of the elements of the calculation, the proposed debt exceeded the constitutional limit, while, if the latter assessment be adopted as one of the elements of the calculation, then there was no such excess. The real question, therefore, and the only one discussed in the argument, and the only one which we propose to decide, is, which of these two assessments should be properly taken as the basis of the calculation? In the first place, it seems to us that there is an insuperable practical obstacle in the way of adopting the assessment made after the debt purports to have been contracted, as contended for by the counsel for petitioner in this case; for, if so, it would be impossible for persons desiring to purchase the bonds, as well as for the taxpayers of the township, to know whether the bonds were valid or not, as they would have no means of ascertaining what would be the assessed value of all the taxable property in the township until after the next assessment should be made and finally completed, and it might be, and probably would be, months before one of the essential facts necessary to the determination of the question of the validity of the bonds could possibly be ascertained. Again, the construction contended for by the relator would open the door to fraud and oppression, for a majority desirous of fixing a burdensome debt upon the township might exert the power which majorities always possess to increase unduly the assessments for the fiscal year, in order to bring the amount of the debt proposed to be contracted within the constitutional limit, relying upon the same power to reduce subsequent assessments, and thus practically defeat the wise purpose of the constitutional provision; for, as was said in State v. Tolly, (S. C.) 16 S. E. Rep. 196: "The manifest object of this provision was to limit the power of these subordinate branches of the government to contract debts, and, like most constitutional limitations, its purpose was to protect minorities by depriving a mere majority of the power to impose what might prove to be grievous burdens upon the property of such taxpayers as might be in the minority." Indeed, the reasoning in that case goes far to support the construction contended for by respondents in this case, though we do not claim that the point there decided is conclusive of the question here presented. As was further said in that case: "The language used in the constitutional provision is not 'eight per centum of the actual or real or market value of the taxable property,' but the language is, 'of the assessed value of all the taxable property therein.' This word 'assessed' has, and had at the time of the adoption of the constitutional provision now under consideration, a well-defined meaning when applied to taxable property, and the framers of that provision must be assumed to have used it in the same sense in which it was used in the various acts of the legislature relating to the subject of taxation. It must be regarded as meaning the value placed upon property for the purpose of taxation by officials appointed for that purpose." In all this, reference is had to the past and not to the future,—to an assessment already made and completed, and entered upon the proper record. The word "assessed," in the constitutional provision, being in the past tense, implies the same thing. But what seems to be absolutely conclusive is this: It must be assumed that the legislature, or any subordinate agency of the government invested with power to contract a debt, would be careful, in exercising such power, not to go beyond the limits prescribed by the constitution; and if the body, when contracting the debt, has no means of ascertaining whether the amount is within the prescribed limit, which could not be done until another assessment has been made, it is very obvious that such care could not be exercised, in issuing the bonds or contracting the debt, before such new assessment is made. It seems to us clear, therefore, that the words "assessed value," as used in the constitutional provision now under consideration, must be regarded as meaning the assessed value as ascertained by the next preceding assessment appearing on the tax books of the county, and cannot mean any assessment to be made subsequent to the time when the debt in question purports to be contracted. This view is directly and fully sustained by the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina in the case of Massachusetts & S. Const. Co. v. Cane Creek Tp., 45 Fed. Rep. 336, where the identical question here presented was distinctly decided in accordance with the view which we have adopted, as appears by a certified copy of the decree of Judges Bond and Simonton, left with us at the hearing. It seems to us, also, that our view is supported by the case of Dixon Co. v. Field, 111 U. S. 95, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 315, where the late Mr. Justice Matthews used the following language, quoted with approval by Mr. Justice Gray in Sutliff v. Board, 147 U. S. 236, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 318: "In the present case there was no power at all conferred to issue the bonds in excess of an amount equal to ten per cent. upon the assessed valuation of the taxable property in the county. In determining the limit of power there were necessarily two factors,—the amount of the bonds to be issued, and the amount of the assessed value of the property for purposes of taxation. The amount of the bonds issued was known. It was stated in the recital itself. It was $87,000. The holder of each bond was apprised of that fact. The amount of the assessed value of the taxable property in the county is not stated; but ex vi termini it was ascertainable in one way only, and that was by reference to the assessment itself, a public record equally accessible to all intending purchasers of bonds, as well as to the county officers. This being known, the ratio between the two amounts was fixed by an arithmetical calculation. No recital involving the amount of the assessed taxable valuation of the property to be taxed for the payment of the bonds can take the place of the assessment itself, for it is the amount as fixed by reference to that record that is made by the constitution the standard for measuring the limit of the municipal power. Nothing in the way of inquiry, ascertainment, or determination as to that fact is submitted to the county officers. They are bound, it is true, to learn from the assessment what the limit upon their authority is, as a necessary preliminary in the exercise of their functions, and the performance of their duty; but the information is for themselves alone. All the world besides must have it from the same source, and for themselves. The fact, as it is recorded in the assessment itself, is extrinsic, and proves itself by inspection, and concludes all determinations that contradict it." Now, while the question considered in that case was not the question presented here, but was rather a question of the force and effect of the recitals in the bonds, yet it is impossible to read the language which we have quoted without perceiving that it was assumed throughout that the assessed valuation to which reference must be had was the next preceding assessment to the issue of the bonds; and when to this is added the fact appearing in the case that, although the bonds were not issued until July, 1876, and that the assessed valuation referred to in that case was made in the spring of 1875, which continued in force until the spring of 1876, we think we are justified in citing that case in support of our view. The judgment of this court is that the petition be dismissed.

McGOWAN and POPE, JJ., concur.

BELL v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 10, 1893.)
KEEPING GAMBLING HOUSE—INDICTMENT—LIABILITY OF WIFE.

1. Where the indictment covered not only the keeping of a gaming house, but knowingly permitting persons to come together and play for money at prohibited games in a house or room occupied by the accused, and where the evidence disclosed a single instance of gaming, but no more than one, a conviction could be had, whether this constituted the house a gaming house or not. Consequently that question is immaterial, and it was not error for the court to decline a request to decide it in charging the jury.

2. Under the Penal Code of Georgia, (Code, § 4300,) a wife is not excused by the mere presence of the husband for any criminal act done voluntarily by her. In order for her to stand excused, it must appear that "violent threats, command, and coercion were used" by him.

3. When husband and wife reside together, he is the head of the house, whether it be owned by or be rented to the one or the other. When both are present, it is his duty, not hers, to prevent unlawful gaming therein, and, in order to hold her liable criminally for permitting such gaming, it must appear affirmatively that she was active in the granting of permission, not merely that she was passive in the matter, and took no measures to hinder or prevent the game.

4. While the evidence in the record seems insufficient to establish satisfactorily that the accused was a married woman, yet, as the court below appears to have so treated her in charging the jury, and the counsel for the state in the argument here having acquiesced in that view, this court is not called upon to decide upon the effect of the evidence on that question.

Error from city court of Columbus; J. L. Willis, Judge.

Hattie Bell was convicted of keeping a place for gambling, and brings error. Reversed.

Blandford & Grimes and H. C. Cameron, for plaintiff in error. Tol. Y. Crawford, for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. While a single act or instance of gaming in a house or room will not constitute the place a gaming house or room, yet such an act, together with all the attendant circumstances and surrounding indications, may be sufficient evidence to show that the house or room is really one of that character. In this case the indictment was as broad as section 4538 of the Code. It charged not only that the accused kept a gaming house and room, but that she knowingly permitted persons to come together and play and bet for money at the enumerated games and other games played with cards, in a house and room occupied by her. On such an indictment the question embraced in the request to charge as to a single instance was immaterial, and for this reason the court was not bound to comply with the request.

2. Section 4300 of the Code is in these words: "A feme covert, or married woman, acting under the threats, command or coercion of her husband, shall not be found guilty of any crime or misdemeanor not punishable by death or perpetual imprisonment, and, with this exception, the husband shall be prosecuted as principal, and, if convicted, shall receive the punishment which would otherwise have been inflicted on the wife, if she had been found guilty; provided, it appears, from all the facts and circumstances of the case, that violent threats command and coercion were used." Whatever may have been the common law on the subject, it is evident from this language that as to any offense, however small, in order for the wife to stand excused under the Code on the ground of the presence of her husband, it must appear that she was in fact coerced, or that he used violent threats, command, or some equivalent means of coercion calculated to overpower her will, and render her a passive instrument, rather than a voluntary agent of crime.

3. If the accused, Hattie Bell, and Harry Dillard, were husband and wife, and resided together in the house where the gaming took place, no matter which of them owned or had rented the house, he was the head of the family. It appeared that both were present when the gaming was being carried on. If so, it was his duty, not hers, to prevent it. To hold her liable criminally for permitting it while he was present, it should appear affirmatively that she was active in granting permission. If she was merely passive in the matter, although she took no measures to hinder or prevent the game, she could not be convicted. The evidence discloses nothing but passive acquiescence on her part. By whose means the gamblers were brought together, or by whose permission they engaged in and carried on the game, does not appear.

4. The only evidence of marriage was that of three witnesses, who testified that they had heard that Hattie Bell and Harry Dillard were married, and that they knew they were living together at this house as man and wife. We should be inclined to doubt whether this evidence would be sufficient to establish the marriage, but in charging the jury the court appears to have treated the accused as a married woman, and in the argument here the counsel for the state acquiesced in that view. Under these circumstances, we do not feel it incumbent upon us to decide upon the effect of the evidence as to the proof of marriage. Taking it for granted that Harry Dillard was the husband of the accused, the verdict was without sufficient evidence to justify it, and the court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

CENTRAL RAILROAD & BANKING CO. v. WIGGINS.

NEW TRIAL — MISCONDUCT OF JUROR — INSTRUCTIONS — PERSONAL INJURIES — DAMAGES.

1. It is no cause for a new trial that one of the jurors took the plaintiff by the arm, and assisted him down stairs, in the courthouse, during a recess of the court, after the trial was commenced, and before it was concluded. It is not apparent or probable that this act of civility on the part of the juror was or might have been prejudicial to the defendant, although the cause of action on trial was an injury to the plaintiff's spine and nerves, which, as he contended, disabled him from walking without crutches or other assistance.

2. Construed in connection with the whole charge, as set out in the record, there was no error in instructing the jury thus: "Certain tables are before you. You can use them, or not, in passing on the amount to be allowed the plaintiff, if you find for him; or you may employ any method known to you, as upright and intelligent men, which is just and fair, in estimating the damages."

3. There was a verbal inaccuracy in instructing the jury on the subject of reducing to present value the probable earnings of the plaintiff during the remainder of his life, in case he had not been injured, in these terms: "You will then consult the tables, and ascertain as to the number of years and thousandth parts of years put opposite his age. You will then multiply that by the sum you find he is entitled to per year." The inaccuracy consisted in denominating the figures in the annuity table opposite the plaintiff's age as "the number of years and parts of years." But there is no indication in the verdict, as compared with the evidence, that the jury used either the wrong table or the wrong figures. The decided probability is that they used the right ones, if they calculated present value by any table. This being so, it is of no consequence that the words, "number of years and parts of years," were substituted by the court for the word "numbers" or "figures," or for the words, "present value of an annuity of one dollar, expressed in dollars and thousandth parts of a dollar." The table which the jury ought to have used was the only one of several before them which represented thousandth parts of anything.

4. The verdict, though large, is not manifestly excessive, and there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial.

Error from city court of Atlanta; I. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action by J. S. Wiggins against the Central Railroad & Banking Company for personal injuries. There was a verdict for plaintiff, assessing his damages at $14,375, and, from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Barrow & Jackson, I. J. Pendleton, and Dorsey, Brewster & Howell, for plaintiff in error. Hoke Smith, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. In the headnotes, we have developed fully the views of the court upon the whole case, and no further discussion seems necessary. There was no error in denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

HAAS v. OLD NAT. BANK OF EVANSVILLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 3, 1893.)

EQUITABLE ASSIGNMENT — WHAT CONSTITUTES — RIGHTS OF ASSIGNEE AS AGAINST ASSIGNOR'S CREDITORS.

1. A regular customer of a bank in the state of Indiana having consigned goods by railway to a point in Georgia, and taken a bill of lading showing on its face that he was the consignor and another person the consignee, and having drawn a negotiable bill of exchange payable to the cashier of the bank of which he was a customer,—the bill being drawn on the consignee of the goods, for the purchase price thereof,—and having deposited with the bank this bill, with the bill of lading attached, and procured the bank to enter the amount to his credit, under circumstances which would entitle him to draw upon the bank at once for the proceeds, from these facts a jury would be legally authorized to infer that the intention was to make an equitable assignment, from the consignor to the bank, of the fund representing the price of the goods, and it was not error to refer to the jury the question as to whether such was the intention or not.

2. The real owner of a fund, deriving his title through an equitable assignment, may assert his right thereto by claim, under section 3541 of the Code, against an attaching creditor of the assignor, whose attachment has been served by summons of garnishment.

Error from city court of Savannah; A. H. MacDonnell, Judge.

Action by Isaac G. Haas, in which summons in garnishment was served on Ehrlich & Bro. and another. The Old National Bank of Evansville appeared, and claimed the funds in the hands of the garnishees. A trial of the issues resulted in a verdict for the bank. From an order overruling his motion for a new trial, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Garrard, Meldrim & Newman, for plaintiff in error. Charlton, Mackall & Anderson, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. According to reason and justice, as well as the spirit of the best authorities on the subject, what transpired in Indiana between the Indiana bank and its customer would amount to an equitable assignment from the latter to the former, if these parties mutually intended that the bank should thereby become the substantial and beneficial owner of the particular fund which represented the price of the goods for which the bill of exchange was drawn. There was much more to indicate such an intention than the mere drawing, delivery, and discounting of the bill. Had this been all, no assignment of the fund, legal or equitable, would have resulted. But from this, together with the attachment of the bill of lading, and the entry of the amount to the credit of the consignor,—he being a regular customer of the bank, and the circumstances being apparently such as that he had a right to draw at once upon the bank for this amount, without waiting for the bill to be collected,—it could well be inferred that the intention was to make the bank the substantial owner of the fund, not only from the time it should be realized by collection, but from the time the bill was deposited, and credit for it given on the books of the bank to the depositor. Although the bill was not drawn expressly on any particular fund, but was an ordinary negotiable bill of exchange, a consideration of prime importance is that the attachment to it of the bill of lading—the latter specifying a particular consignment of goods, and the former being drawn for the price of these goods—might serve, as matter of evidence, to specialize and identify the particular fund as the one really drawn upon according to the mutual intention of the drawer and the payee. The bill of lading could well be treated as a supplement or appendix restricting and qualifying, equitably, though not legally, the general terms of the bill of exchange, and pointing out informally the fund from which the drawee was requested and expected to make payment. Certainly, the drawee would be at no loss to understand what fund was in contemplation. Altogether, there was ample evidence to warrant the jury in finding that the intention was to establish a substantial ownership of the fund in the bank, and, consequently, to make to the bank an equitable assignment of that particular fund; and it was not error to refer the question to the jury for determination.

2. In a proceeding by garnishment, a mere formal legal title to the fund in controversy in the debtor of the garnishing creditor will not prevail over a substantial equitable title, which a third person acquired from such debtor before the garnishment was served. If the debtor himself could not hold or recover the fund, as against such third person, his creditor ought not to be allowed to do so. Whatever is not rightfully and justly the property of a debtor, though he may have the formal legal title to it, ought not to be applied to the payment of his debts. He ought, rather, to be treated as holding such title as he had in trust for the real owner, and not for the benefit of himself or of his own creditors. On the facts in evidence, this case had a right result, and is now finally disposed of. Two bills of exchange and two garnishments were involved in the litigation, but what has been said of one bill and garnishment applies equally to the other. Judgment affirmed.

MANCHESTER PAPER-MILLS CO. v. HETH.¹

APPEAL—JURISDICTIONAL AMOUNT.

The defendant was sued for $150, rent for a certain water privilege for which it had agreed to pay $50 per annum, and pleaded the general issue and a set-off of $550, for rents paid in previous years, through mistake, as it alleged. Held that, as the set-off was a mere specious pretense, the appellate court had no jurisdiction of the matter, the amount involved being only the $150, and the minimum amount for which an appeal can be taken being $500.

Error to hustings court of Manchester; John H. Ingram, Judge.

Action of covenant by Heth, trustee, against the Manchester Paper-Mills Company, for rent for water privilege. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Dismissed.

J. Saml. Parrish, for appellant. Geo. K. Macon, for appellee.

RICHARDSON, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the hustings court of the city of Manchester, rendered on the 27th day of January, 1892, in an action of covenant therein then pending, wherein Henry Heth, surviving trustee of himself and Walter K. Martin and C. C. McRae, trustees, was plaintiff, and the Manchester Paper-Mills Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of the state of Virginia, was defendant. This case, briefly stated, is this: In November, 1865, Thomas Vaden, Jr., of the first part, and S. C. Robinson, E. T. Robinson, and Samuel Fairbanks, partners under the style of the Manchester Paper-Mills Company, parties of the second part, entered into an agreement, under seal, wherein it was set forth that "whereas the parties of the second part are engaged in the manufacture of paper at a mill on the James river, in the town of Manchester, and are desirous of procuring pure spring water for the purposes of their business aforesaid, it is mutually agreed that the parties of the second part shall enter upon a certain tract of land in Chesterfield county, known as 'Buck Hill,' and owned by the party of the first part, and construct thereon, at a point to be selected by the parties of the second part, on or near the south side of the old abandoned railroad track, a pool not exceeding 10 feet square, the said pool to be supplied by a certain spring branch flowing thereto;" and the said parties of the second part were to have the right to lay pipes from the said pool through the lands of the said party of the first part, for the purpose of conducting water to their said mill, and the pool and pipes, when once located, were to remain fixed. The parties of the second part were to have the right of ingress and egress to keep their pool and pipes in proper condition, but were not to interfere with the agricultural or domestic use of the land. And the party of the first part received so much of the said water as might be necessary for domestic purposes; and the parties of the second part agreed to pay $50 per annum to the parties of the second part, always payable in gold or silver, as rent; the agreement to continue in force so long as said mill is operated as a paper mill. By virtue of this agreement, the said parties of the second part entered upon the said land, located and constructed the pool, conducted the water thereto, and laid their pipes, and for a number of years used the water, and regularly paid the rent. The mill referred to in this agreement, with all its rights, privileges, easements, appurtenances, buildings, and improvements, was afterwards, to wit, on the 26th of August, 1879, sold to the plaintiffs in error by commissioners appointed in the suit of Fairbanks v. Wortendike, then pending in the chancery court of Richmond, and on the 9th of November, 1880, the sale was confirmed by a decree in said chancery cause; and, in obedience to a decree entered therein on the 5th of February, 1881, a deed was made to said purchasers, and in the deed thus made to said purchasers the plaintiff in error specially enumerates as a part of the property purchased the lease from Thomas Vaden, Jr., to the Robinsons and Fairbanks, as aforesaid. By a deed dated 4th day of January, 1873, the said Thomas Vaden, Jr., and E. H. Vaden, his wife, conveyed said Buck Hill property to Henry Heth, Walter K. Martin, and Christopher C. McRae, trustees, in trust for certain purposes in said deed set forth. The right to enforce said agreement of lease became vested in said trustees, and, two of them having died, this suit was brought by Henry Heth, the survivor of them, against the plaintiff in error, the said Manchester Paper-Mills Company, to recover, under and by virtue of said agreement, three years' water rent, at $50 per year, which said company owed and refused to pay. At a term of the said hustings court, the defendant demurred to the plaintiff's declaration and to each count thereof, and at a subsequent day of the same term the demurrer was fully argued both by counsel for the plaintiff and the defendant, and the court took time until a later day of the term to consider of its judgment, when, on the 7th day of November, 1891, the court, having maturely considered the same, overruled the defendant's said demurrer, and the cause was continued until the January term, next thereafter, for trial. At the said January term, to wit, on the 27th day of January, 1892, the defendant, by its attorney, pleaded conditions performed and conditions not broken, payment and set-off, to the plaintiff's demands, and filed an itemized account, stating the nature of the payment and set-off which the defendant desired to prove; and to the defendant's several pleas the plaintiff replied generally, and by consent of all parties, by their attorneys, a jury was waived, and the whole matter of law and fact was submitted to the court for decision, and the court, after mature consideration, adjudged and ordered that "the plaintiff recover against the defendant the sum of $150, the amount in the declaration mentioned, with interest at the rate of six per centum per annum upon $50, one part thereof, from the 1st day of November, 1888, until paid, and on $50, another part thereof, from the 1st day of November, 1889, until paid, and on $50, the balance thereof, from the 1st day of November, 1890, until paid, and his costs," etc.; and the case is here on a writ of error to this judgment.

It is insisted on behalf of the defendant in error that, inasmuch as the real sum in this case is less than $500, this court is without jurisdiction, and that the writ of error should be dismissed as having been improvidently allowed. We think the objection is well taken. The action was on a money demand for three years' water rent, at $50 per year, with interest on the several annual sums from the time they respectively became due; the aggregate of said sums, with interest to the date of the judgment, being for less than the minimum jurisdictional amount prescribed by the constitution. The action was founded on the agreement under seal, the substance of which is above set out. By that agreement the lessees therein named acquired and enjoyed the rights therein specified, and were entitled, by express stipulation, to enjoy the same so long as the mill in the said agreement mentioned should be operated as a paper mill; and by said agreement they bound themselves to pay to the lessor $50 per year so long as said mill should be so operated. It is conceded that said mill has continued to be and is now operated as a paper mill. The plaintiff in error, the Manchester Paper-Mill Company, as successor of the original lessees, and as owner of said mill, became the complete owner of said water right, to the full extent of the stipulations contained in said agreement. That agreement is specific and certain in all its points, being in no respect of doubtful import. The plaintiff in error for many years paid the rent, but, for the three years the rent for which was the subject of this suit, payment was refused, upon the shallow pretext that it had never used the water right in question, and was therefore exonerated from payment. It is, it is true, a fact agreed, that the plaintiff in error, during its ownership and occupancy of said mill, has not used said water right; but that is irrelevant, as by said agreement it is bound to pay, whether it uses the water or not.

The plaintiff below (defendant in error here) claimed in his declaration $150, with interest, as aforesaid, and for that sum he recovered judgment, with interest on $50, a part thereof, from the 1st day of November, 1888, and on $50, another part thereof, from the 1st day of November, 1889, and on $50, the balance thereof, from the 1st day of November, 1890; the principal sum and interest to the date of the judgment being less than $500. But the plaintiff in error, (defendant below,) in addition to the general issue, pleaded payment and set-off, and filed itemized account of set-offs, the items being $50 per year for the rents, respectively, paid for the years from 1871 to 1887, inclusive, amounting—principal—to $850, and gave notice that the defendant claimed to set off said amount, with interest on said annual items, on the ground that said payments were through mistake. The claim thus to set off the plaintiff's demand is not only a mere colorable claim, but is obviously nothing other than a specious pretense of a claim that has no foundation either in law or conscience. To permit a party to acquire jurisdiction in this court under such circumstances would open wide the door to fraud upon the jurisdiction of the court, and would largely tend to abrogate the constitutional provision limiting the minimum jurisdictional amount of this court. While with a plaintiff in actions of tort the rule is otherwise, in actions on money demands the amount is, in general, the claim made in the declaration. In Gray v. Blanchard, 97 U. S. 564, Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "This is a writ of error sued out by the defendant below, when the judgment against him upon a money demand was for only $1,118.71. Prima facie, this is the measure of our jurisdiction in favor of the present plaintiff in error; but he still thinks we must retain the cause, as the record shows that, having pleaded the general issue, he gave notice of set-off, claiming $10,000. It is true that such notice was given, but it is shown affirmatively by the record that the only dispute upon the trial under the notice was as to a single item of the amount of $446. In short, the bill of exceptions shows distinctly that the only controversy between the parties was in respect to a claim by the plaintiff below of about $2,000, and by the defendant (plaintiff in error) as to this item of set-off." Jurisdiction was denied. In the present case there was no controversy in the court below as to any item of the amount of set-off. The entire controversy was as to the $150 demanded in the plaintiff's declaration. Looking to the entire record, there could, in the nature of things, have been no other controversy. It follows, therefore, that this court is without jurisdiction, and the writ of error must be dismissed, as having been improvidently awarded.

VIRGINIA FIRE & MARINE INS. CO. v. MORGAN.¹

CONDITIONS OF POLICY — IRON SAFE CLAUSE — PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. A policy of fire insurance contained a clause that it was based upon a written application, the statements in which should be treated as warranties. In the application the insured was asked whether he would keep his books of account in an iron safe or secure in another building, to which the answer was, "Yes." Held, that this statement was a warranty, and, unless the books were kept as stated, there could be no recovery under the policy.

2. A policy of fire insurance recited that the same "shall be void if the assured has concealed or misrepresented in writing or otherwise any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance, or the subject thereof," and also, "This policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions." Held, that this clause would not permit the court to inquire into the materiality of a warranty.

3. An insured, who cannot read the English language, will not be allowed, in the absence of fraud, to testify that when he signed an application for insurance, agreeing to keep his books in an iron safe, that he was not questioned on the subject, and that it was filled up by the agent of the company, who did not read the answers and questions to him.

Error to judgment of the circuit court of Tazewell county, rendered at the August term, 1892, in an action on a policy of fire insurance, wherein Samuel Morgan was plaintiff and the Virginia Fire & Marine Insurance Company was defendant. The policy was for $1,500 on a stock of goods. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $1,090.90, and there was judgment accordingly, to which judgment the defendant obtained a writ of error and supersedeas. Reversed.

Opinion states the case.

Chapman & Gillespie and W. W. & B. T. Crump, for plaintiff in error. Henry & Graham, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, P. This was an action on a policy of fire insurance issued by the defendant company on the plaintiff's stock of goods in his storehouse at Cedar Bluff, in Tazewell county, Va. The policy recites that it is based upon the written application signed by the assured, and that "the said application shall be treated as a part of and be incorporated in the policy, and that the statements thereof shall be treated as warranties by the assured that the facts therein stated are true." In the application the assured was asked the following, among other, questions, viz.: "State what books of account you keep. Will you keep them in an iron safe, or secure in another building?" To which the answer was: "Day book and ledger. Yes." The goods having been destroyed by fire, the company refused payment on the ground that the assured had not kept his books in an iron safe, or secure in another building, but had kept them in a wooden desk in the storehouse, where they were destroyed in the fire. This defense was also set up in bar of the action under the plea of nonassumpsit; and at the trial the court was asked in effect to instruct the jury that the answer in the application in regard to the place of keeping the books amounted to a continuing warranty, which, if broken, avoided the policy. But the court refused to so charge, and on motion of the plaintiff told the jury in effect that before they could consider the agreement in regard to the books they must believe it was material, and, further, that the company was injured by its nonobservance. This ruling was seemingly based on the idea that the agreement was not a warranty, but a representation, which is a mistaken view. The stipulation is undoubtedly a warranty, made so by the express contract of the parties, and the jury ought to have been instructed that a literal compliance with it was essential to a recovery by the plaintiff. "An express warranty," says May, "is a stipulation inserted in writing on the face of the policy, on the literal truth or fulfillment of which the validity of the entire contract depends. By a warranty the insured stipulates for the absolute truth of the statement made and the strict compliance with some promised line of conduct upon penalty of forfeiture of his right to recover in case of loss should the statement prove untrue, or the course of conduct promised be unfulfilled. A warranty is an agreement in the nature of a condition precedent, and, like that, must be strictly complied with." May, Ins. § 156. This is the language of the decided cases and of this court in Insurance Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575. And the author correctly adds that whether the fact stated or the act stipulated for be material to the risk or not is of no consequence, the contract being that the matter is as represented, or shall be as promised, and unless it prove so, whether from fraud, mistake, negligence, or other cause, not proceeding from the insurer or the intervention of the law or the act of God, the insured can have no claim. "One of the very objects of the warranty," he continues, "is to preclude all controversy about the materiality or immateriality of the statement. The only question is, has the warranty been kept? There is no room for construction; no latitude; no equity. If the warranty be a statement of facts, it must be literally true; if a stipulation that a certain act shall or shall not be done, it must be literally performed." Whether a statement is a warranty or not depends upon the intention of the parties, as does the nature and effect of the warranty, when there is one which is to be gathered from the language used and the subject-matter to which it relates. Parties have the right to make their own contracts, and, when the meaning of the contract is ascertained, effect must be given to it. It is not for the courts to add to or detract from it, but the contract must be enforced without regard to any hardship, real or supposed, to either party, or whether it is wise or unwise, provident or improvident. Thus in Jeffries v. Insurance Co., 22 Wall. 47, where the insured was asked in the application whether he was married or single, and falsely answered that he was single, it was held that the falsity of the answer defeated the recovery, as one of the express conditions of the policy was that the statements in the application were in all respects true. And in the course of the opinion it was said: "There is no place for the argument either that the false statement was not material to the risk, or that it was a positive advantage to the company to be deceived by it. It is the distinct agreement of the parties that the company shall not be deceived to its injury or to its benefit. The right of an individual or a corporation to make an unwise bargain is as complete as that to make a wise one."

According to the authorities, warranties are of two kinds, viz.: (1) Affirmative, or warranties in praesenti, as they are sometimes called, which affirm the existence of certain facts pertaining to the risk at the time of the insurance; and (2) continuing or promissory. An instance of the first class is Insurance Co. v. Buck, 88 Va. 517, 13 S. E. Rep. 973. There the insured, in answer to a question in the application, stated that a watchman slept on the premises at night. On the night of the fire the watchman was absent, but it was held that the policy was not thereby avoided, because the answer related to the present, and not to the future; in other words, that the statement was manifestly intended merely as affirmative of the usual and existing state of things, and had nothing promissory as to the future. But, as was said in the same case, a promissory warranty, i. e. one which requires something to be done or omitted after the insurance takes effect and during its continuance, avoids the contract if not complied with according to its terms. The present case falls within the latter category, certainly as regards the promise to keep the books in an iron safe, or secure in another building. It is quite probable, in the nature of the case, that this stipulation was regarded as material, but whether it was or not—for with that we have nothing to do—the contract is express that the books would be thus safely kept; and if, as is conceded, the promise has not been fulfilled, there can be no recovery. A warranty may be in part affirmative and in part promissory. Thus, in an Iowa case, the building was described as "occupied for stores below, the upper portion to remain unoccupied during the continuance of this policy." In an action on the policy it was held that so much of the statement as related to the lower portion of the building was an affirmative warranty merely, but that what related to the upper portion was a promissory warranty, which was broken if at any time during the life of the policy that portion of the building was occupied. Stout v. Insurance Co., 12 Iowa, 371.

The main ground upon which the plaintiff relies in support of the judgment is a provision in the policy that the same "shall be void if the assured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof;" and further, that "this policy is made and accepted subject to the foregoing stipulations and conditions." This language, it is contended, is inconsistent with an idea of a warranty, and shows that the answers in the application were intended as representations, none of which would avoid the policy unless false and material to the risk. The answer to this is that just as a policy may contain both affirmative and promissory warranties, so it may contain both warranties and representations, and the present is a case of that sort.

in the application wherein the applicant affirms and warrants his answers to be true, and agrees that the same shall constitute the basis of the insurance, he was asked as to the dimensions of the storehouse, when it was built, etc. Now, as to the answers to these questions and the like, it would be absurd to say that they were anything more than representations, because they are merely descriptive, and were evidently so intended by the parties. Wood, Ins. § 138. On the other hand, looking, as we must, to the whole contract, it is equally clear that the answer in regard to safely keeping the books was intended as a warranty. It is not descriptive of anything, and related not to matters depending upon opinions or judgment, as in Insurance Co. v. West, 76 Va. 575, and National Bank v. Hartford Fire Ins. Co., 35 U. S. 673, in which cases the assured was asked as to the value of the property, but it constituted an undertaking to do a certain thing in the future, and is therefore not within the operation of the provision just quoted. To call such a stipulation a representation, or anything less than a warranty, is a misuse of terms. This being so, the only remaining question necessary to be considered arises on a bill of exceptions taken by the plaintiff, defendant in error here. At the trial the plaintiff offered, but was not allowed, to testify that the application, which he admits he signed, was filled up by the agent of the company; that he was not questioned as to his books, and did not tell the agent he would keep them in an iron safe, or secure in another building; that, being a foreigner, he could not read the English language, and that the questions and answers were not read to him. We are of opinion that in this particular the circuit court ruled rightly. There is no pretension of fraud, and to have admitted the evidence would have been an infringement of the rule which excludes parol contemporaneous evidence to contradict or vary the terms of a valid written contract. This, according to Insurance Co. v. Yates, 28 Grat. 585, is so clear that we need only refer to that case. There the insured in answer to a question stated that the premises were unincumbered, whereas they were in fact subject to a deed of trust. He was allowed, however, to testify at the trial that he had never read the application, and was not interrogated by the agent of the company as to incumbrances. But on appeal this court, in an able opinion by Judge Staples, in which the authorities were reviewed, held the evidence inadmissible. The plaintiff, it was said, was bound not only to answer the questions put to him correctly, but to use due diligence to see that the answers were correctly written, and that, if he signed the application without reading it, or having it read to him, that of itself was inexcusable negligence. It was also said that if the evidence were admissible it would be difficult to imagine a case in which the legal import of a deed might not be varied by parol testimony. The only difference between that case and this is that here the plaintiff offered to prove his inability to read the language in which the application was filled up. But that is immaterial, as he could have easily ascertained the contents of the paper, and the law presumes, under the circumstances of the present case, that when he signed the paper he understood and assented to all it contained. If the rule were otherwise, there would be no certainty or safety in written contracts. For the errors, however, in regard to the instructions, the judgment must be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 9, 1893.)

DIVORCE—CRUELTY.

1. Where the husband beat his wife with a stick, inflicting a serious wound, struck her in the face with his fist, brutally assaulted her, taking her by the hair, and cursing her, drew a pistol, and so terrified her that she and her children fled, and sought refuge with a neighbor, the court is justified in decreeing a divorce, and granting to the wife the custody of the children.

2. The husband's property consisted of two farms, of 3,296 acres, only a comparatively small portion of which was cleared, the residue being unimproved, much of it wild mountain land. The value of the property and the husband's income were not shown with certainty, one of the wife's witnesses putting the income at $800, others less, and the commissioner valuing the property at $30,000. Held, that an allowance of $1,000 alimony annually for wife's maintenance and support and education of children will not be confirmed.

3. In ascertaining the amount of alimony to which a wife is entitled, where she is granted a divorce and the custody of the children, it is proper to take into consideration the education of the children as an item of expense.

4. Under Code 1897, § 2263, providing that the court shall make "such further decree as it shall deem expedient concerning the estate and maintenance of the parties or either of them and the care and custody and maintenance of their minor children," the court may allow for alimony a sum to educate the husband's children.

Appeal from circuit court, Tazewell county.

Bill for divorce by Catherine V. Heninger against Samuel T. Heninger. From a decree in her favor granting divorce, and several decrees granting alimony, he appeals. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

The facts appear in the following statement by LEWIS, P.:

The bill charges that while the defendant's treatment of the complainant has at no time during their married life been pleasant or agreeable, he has of late treated both her and their children harshly and cruelly; that for some time he has continually quarreled with her, although she has at all times tried to be to him a dutiful and faithful wife, and that he finally resorted to blows; that about two weeks before the commencement of the suit, he beat her with a large stick, inflicting a serious and painful wound, and at the same time struck her violently in the face with his fist; that he subsequently again brutally assaulted her, taking her by the hair of her head, and cursing and abusing her; that he also drew his pistol, and so terrified the complainant and her children that they fled from home, and sought shelter and protection at the house of a neighbor, where they have since remained. The circuit court, after evidence had been taken, granted a divorce, and awarded the care and custody of the children to the complainant, and, by several subsequent decrees, it made provision for the maintenance of the wife and for the support and education of the children.

Chapman & Gillespie, for appellant. Henry & Graham, for appellee.

LEWIS, P. This was a suit for a divorce from bed and board, on the ground of cruelty on the part of the husband, the defendant below and appellant here. The circuit court decreed a divorce, and gave the custody of the five infant children to the wife. It also, by a subsequent decree, ordered the defendant to provide for them a suitable home, and to pay, for permanent alimony and the support and education of the children until the further order of the court, $1,000 a year, in two equal semiannual installments.

The evidence in support of the charges of cruelty is ample and conclusive, and there is no doubt that a divorce and the custody of the children were rightly granted to the wife. The defense set up in the answer that the complainant was persuaded by certain of her relatives, hostile to the defendant, to bring the suit merely to harass him, and get possession of his property, and that the charge of cruelty is false, is not only not sustained, but is clearly disproven.

Unfortunately, however, the record, while full enough on these points, does not contain sufficient to enable this court to satisfactorily determine what is a proper allowance for permanent alimony and the support and benefit of the children. The appellant is a farmer, and the owner of two tracts of land, one containing 596 acres, the other 2,700 acres, situate in Tazewell, only a comparatively small portion of which is cleared. The residue is unimproved, much of it being "wild mountain land." The cleared portion, however, is valuable, but what is its value, or what ought to be taken as a fair estimate of the appellant's income, is not shown with any degree of certainty or precision. One of the complainant's most intelligent witnesses, a farmer who lives in the immediate neighborhood, estimates the annual value of both tracts at $1,100, from which sum he deducts $300 for taxes, repairs, etc., leaving $800, in his judgment, the net annual value. Other witnesses put it lower, the estimate of one or more of them not exceeding five or six hundred dollars. It appears that, shortly before the commencement of the suit, the appellant sold the greater part of his personalty, for the purpose, as he says, of paying his debts. The value of the residue does not appear. The commissioner who was directed to make certain inquiries in the cause reported, in general terms, that the property now owned by the appellant is worth $30,000; but he says nothing specially as to the income. In 1890, before the suit was commenced, the appellant contracted to sell the land for $45,000, but the purchaser has refused to take it, and the matters in controversy between them in regard to the sale have not yet been settled. The case has been argued for the appellee largely on the assumption that the appellant is worth $60,000, and that the annual value of his estate ought to be put at 4 per cent. on that sum, or $2,400; but this assumption, whatever the fact may be, is not warranted by the record.

In respect to alimony, the general rule is that the income of the husband, however derived or derivable, is the fund from which the allowance is made. 2 Bish. Mar. & Div. (5th Ed.) § 447; Bailey v. Bailey, 21 Grat. 43; Cralle v. Cralle, 84 Va. 198, 6 S. E. Rep. 12. In his recent work on Marriage, Divorce, and Separation, (section 1006,) Bishop, in treating of the facts upon which the amount of permanent alimony is determined, amplifies the rule thus: "In exercising," he says, "the judicial discretion which regulates the amount of the permanent alimony, the judge should take into contemplation the past conduct of the parties, respectively, the source of the husband's property, what persons, if any, each is under a legal duty to support, the earnings and acquiring capabilities of each, the wife's pecuniary means equally with the husband's, the health of each, and their respective ages, and especially, but not exclusively, he should consider what sum, chargeable upon the faculties of the erring husband, will leave the financial condition of the innocent wife not inferior to what it would be if his conduct had been correct." And he adds that, as every injury is in law entitled to its pecuniary compensation, the wife should have, in addition to the maintenance thus appearing, something for her physical and mental sufferings and the loss of her husband's society. So, also, the amount for maintenance of the minor children of the parties, when, as in the present case, they are assigned to the wife, depends, not only on their needs, but on the husband's future and station in life, and all the circumstances of the particular case. As to this matter, as in case of alimony, the court, with all the attainable lights before it, must exercise a sound discretion. Harris v. Harris, 31 Grat. 13; Bailey v. Bailey, supra.

The same considerations apply in regard to the education of the children. This, however, is denied by the appellant, on the ground that parents are not compellable to educate their children. It is true that, while the elementary writers include among the duties of parents to their children that of education, it is a duty of imperfect obligation. Nevertheless, as Blackstone observes, it is a duty pointed out by reason, and of far the greatest importance of any. Chancellor Kent takes the same view, and adds the remark that "a parent who sends his son into the world uneducated does a great injury to mankind, as well as to his own family, for he defrauds the community of a useful citizen, and bequeaths to it a nuisance." 2 Kent, Comm. 195. It would be strange, then, if the effect of a decree granting a divorce, and assigning the custody of the infant children to a suitable person, were held to relieve the offending parent of a duty he owes both to his offspring and to society, when he has the means to fulfill it. If this were the effect of the decree, the offender would take advantage of his own wrong, and the interference of the law, intended for the benefit of the children, might work an entirely different result. The statute now carried into section 2263 of the Code authorizes a court granting a divorce to make "such further decree as it shall deem expedient, concerning the estate and maintenance of the parties or either of them and the care, custody and maintenance of their minor children," etc. It is true nothing is said in express terms about education, but the evident purpose of the legislature was to give to the court the largest discretion in respect of the estates of the parties, and not to relieve the offending parent of any duty, moral, social, or otherwise. Under a statute authorizing the court to "make such disposition of and provision for the children as shall appear most expedient," the jurisdiction of the court to provide for their education in a manner suitable to the parents' means and station in life is unquestionable, and the language of our statute is little, if any, less comprehensive. 2 Bish. Mar., Div. & Sep. § 1214.

For the reasons, however, already stated, the case must be sent back for a further reference to a commissioner, in order that the court may be put in possession of all the facts and circumstances essential to an equitable determination of the rights of the parties. Meanwhile, the decree of the 9th of December, 1891, making temporary provision for the wife and children,—i. e. requiring the appellant, among other things, to pay $80 monthly for their maintenance,—will remain in force; and, when the case shall have been thus developed, it will be time enough to finally pass upon the question, raised here by the appellee, as to an additional allowance in the way of counsel fees. The appellant will pay the costs of this appeal. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

WYTHEVILLE INSURANCE & BANKING CO. v. TEIGER.¹

(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 9, 1893.)

FIRE INSURANCE — PAYMENT OF PREMIUM — APPOINTMENT OF AGENT—DEPOSITIONS—NOTICE.

1. The defendant company insured the plaintiff against loss by fire, and delivered the policy to brokers who had placed many policies before for the company, remitting the premiums monthly, and sometimes at longer intervals. The brokers delivered the policy to the plaintiff's agent the day after its issuance, without collecting the premium. Subsequently, and before the loss occurred, the plaintiff paid the premium of $6 to his agent, and the latter sent to the brokers $80, taking a receipt "on account of miscellaneous companies." The agent testified that plaintiff's premium was included in the remittance, which defendant denied. The policy contained a clause that the company should not be liable "until the premium be actually paid." The court instructed the jury that, if the plaintiff's premium was included in the $80, they should find that the same had been paid to the brokers. Held not error.

2. The court also instructed that, if the defendant delivered the policy to the brokers, who delivered it to the agent, who delivered it to the plaintiff, and at no time after the policy was so delivered, and before the fire occurred, did the defendant give the plaintiff notice that it wished to cancel the policy, then they must find for the plaintiff. Held correct.

3. Delivery of a policy without requiring payment of the premiums is a waiver of the condition of prepayment.

4. Where the premium is charged to the agent personally by the company, and the former credits the insured, it is equivalent to payment.

5. When an insurance company clothes a person with apparent authority to deliver policies and receive the premiums, it is estopped after delivery of the policy to set up the defense that the agent acted without written authority, as required by statute.

6. The fact that the plaintiff's attorneys notified the defendant that they would take depositions in Georgia on the same day as other depositions were taken by them in New York will not vitiate either deposition, where the plaintiff is connected with only one of the causes, and the objection is not made until the calling of the case.

7. A motion for continuance is addressed to the discretion of the court, and will not be reversed unless plainly erroneous.

Error to circuit court, Wythe county.

An action of trespass on the case in assumpsit, wherein Samuel Teiger was plaintiff, and the Wytheville Insurance & Banking Company, a Virginia corporation, was defendant. The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for $798, which the court refused to set aside, and there was judgment accordingly, to which judgment the defendant company obtained a writ of error and supersedeas. Affirmed.

F. S. Blair, for plaintiff in error. Walker & Caldwell, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, P. By the policy sued on, the defendant company insured the plaintiff against loss or damage by fire to the amount of $800 on a stock of goods in a store, at 175 Attorney street, in New York. The company sent the policy for delivery and collection of the premium to Milch, Fleisner & Co., insurance brokers of that city. This firm had placed many policies of the defendant company and received the premiums. Their custom, according to the evidence, was to remit to the company "sometimes once a month, sometimes twice a month, and sometimes once in sixty days, depending upon the amount of premiums collected." The policy sued on was issued on the 1st of December, 1891, and was delivered to the plaintiff's agent a day or two afterwards without payment of the premium. This agent was one Adler, an insurance agent, to whom the plaintiff paid the premium, and who on the 23d of December, 1891, paid to Milch, Fleisner & Co. $80, for which he took their receipt, as follows: "Received from Edward Adler eighty dollars on account of miscellaneous companies." The premium on the plaintiff's policy was $6, which Adler says was included in the payment above mentioned. The goods were destroyed by fire on the 13th of February, 1892. The policy recites that it is issued "subject to the stipulations and conditions of the New York standard form of policy," and, further, that "this company shall not be liable by virtue of this policy, or any renewal thereof, until the premium therefor be actually paid." In this state of things the main ground upon which the company denies liability is that the premium was not paid.

Upon the question whether the premium was paid to Milch, Fleisner & Co. the circuit court instructed the jury as follows: "If the jury believe that the sum of eighty dollars paid by Adler to Milch, Fleisner & Co., on the 23d December, 1891, embraced the premium in the plaintiff's policy, and that said premium formed part of the said eighty dollars, then the jury will find that the said premium was paid to Milch, Fleisner & Co. on the 23d of December, 1891." Another instruction given at the instance of the plaintiff was as follows: "The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant company delivered the policy sued on to Milch, Fleisner & Co., who delivered it to Adler, who delivered it to plaintiff, and further believe that at no time after the policy was so delivered, and before the fire occurred, did the defendant company give the plaintiff notice that it wished to cancel the policy, then they must find for the plaintiff." The first of these instructions, although both were excepted to, was clearly right. The defendant denied that the payment of $80 to Milch, Fleisner & Co. embraced the premium on the plaintiff's policy, and the question was therefore properly submitted to the jury. Nor is there anything in the second instruction to the injury of the defendant, although it may be open to some criticism. Its meaning is clear, and the jury could not fail to understand it correctly. The evidence on both sides shows that the policy was sent to Milch, Fleisner & Co. as the defendant's agents, so that, if there was an assumption in the fact by the instruction that Milch, Fleisner & Co. were agents of the defendant, it assumed as a fact what the defendant itself had proved.

The case, on the merits, turns upon the effect of the delivery of the policy by Milch, Fleisner & Co. This firm were not only brokers, but, as just said, they were agents of the defendant. Policies were sent to them directly from the home office, the premiums on which they were authorized to receive, and they were ostensibly authorized to waive a cash payment; hence, when they delivered the policy in the present case without requiring payment of the premium, the presumption is a credit was intended, and that was a waiver of the condition of prepayment. If in such a case a waiver were not implied, the delivery of the policy would be not only an unmeaning, but a deceptive and fraudulent, ceremony. 2 May, Ins. (3d Ed.) § 360; Miller v. Insurance Co., 12 Wall. 285; Boehen v. Insurance Co., 35 N. Y. 131; Insurance Co. v. Booker, 9 Heisk. 606, 613; Farnum v. Insurance Co., 83 Cal. 246, 23 Pac. Rep. 869, and cases cited. Moreover, it is fair to infer from the fact of giving credit in the present case, and the custom of these agents to remit to the company only once or twice a month, and sometimes not oftener than once in two months, that they were in the habit of delivering policies on credit, and that this was known and assented to by the company. Insurance Co. v. Hoover, 113 Pa. St. 591, 8 Atl. Rep. 163; Insurance Co. v. Norton, 96 U. S. 234. It would seem, also, from what was brought out in the cross-examination of the vice president of the company, as a witness in the case, although he does not say so in so many words, that the practice of the company was to charge these agents personally with the premiums on policies sent to them. He says they still owe for a number of policies, some of which have expired, and if they were in fact charged with the premium on the plaintiff's policy when the policy was sent, then, as between the plaintiff and the company, the premium was paid when the policy was delivered; for the rule is well settled that where the agent gives credit, and the amount is charged to him by the insurer, the transaction is equivalent to payment. Miller v. Insurance Co., 12 Wall. 285; White v. Insurance Co., 120

Mass. 330; Train v. Insurance Co., 62 N. Y. 598; Bang v. Banking Co., 1 Hughes, (U. S.) 290. It is immaterial, therefore, so far as the validity of the policy is concerned, whether the $80 paid by Adler embraced the plaintiff's policy or not. The policy having been delivered as a valid, executed contract, the only way the company could terminate its liability thereon for nonpayment of the premium, if the premium was not paid, was by exercising the reserved right to cancel it after "giving five days' notice of such cancellation," which was not done. 2 May, Ins. (3d Ed.) § 260b.

Complaint, however, is made of the refusal of the circuit court to instruct the jury that, if there was no application of any part of the $80 to the plaintiff's premium at the time of such payment, then that the premium was not discharged; and further, that, after the fire occurred, no valid application of any part of the premium could be made for that purpose by any agreement between the plaintiff and Adler and Milch, Fleisner & Co." This instruction was rightfully refused. The latter part of it was not relevant to any evidence in the case, and, as to the first part, it is enough to say that it is virtually covered by the first instruction given for the plaintiff. Ferguson's Adm'r v. Wills, 58 Va. 136, 13 S. E. Rep. 392. Adler testified emphatically that the payment embraced the plaintiff's premium, and upon that question the jury found against the defendant.

The court was also asked, but rightly refused, to instruct the jury that, if they believed from the evidence that the brokers who delivered the policy were not appointed as agents by the defendant company in conformity with the New York standard form of policy, then it was their duty to have retained the policy until the premium was paid, and that, if they failed to pay over the premium to the company before the fire occurred, the policy was vitiated. The New York standard form of policy, subject to the stipulations and conditions of which the policy was issued, provides that, "In any matter relating to this insurance, no person, unless duly authorized in writing, shall be deemed the agent of this company." But, without going more fully into the questions sought to be raised by the instruction, it is enough to say that when an insurance company clothes a person with apparent authority to deliver policies and receive the premiums, as was done in this case, it is estopped, after a policy is delivered as a valid contract, to an innocent holder, to set up the defense that the agent acted without written authority from the company. Such a defense, if sustained, would operate as a gross fraud, and can receive no continuance in a court of justice. Insurance Co. v. Wilkison, 13 Wall. 222, 235; Farnum v. Insurance Co., 83 Cal. 246, 257, 23 Pac. Rep. 860.

There are two questions of less importance which remain to be considered. The first relates to the overruling of the defendant's motion to suppress certain depositions for the plaintiff taken in New York on the 14th December, 1892. The ground of the motion was that the defendant had been notified in another suit of the taking of depositions, in the state of Georgia, on the same day, and that the counsel who gave the notice were the attorneys for the plaintiff in this suit. The latter, however, was in no way interested in or connected with the other suit, and, besides, no objection was raised until the calling of the present case for trial, which was several months after the depositions had been taken. The motion was without merit, and was rightly overruled.

Nor was there error in overruling the defendant's motion for a continuance, on the ground of the absence of an alleged material witness. The witness formerly did business at 150 Nassau street, New York, from which place he addressed a letter to the defendant company, dated February 17, 1892. The present suit was commenced in the following August. Depositions for the plaintiff were taken in December of the same year, and yet no effort appears to have been made to find the witness, or even to communicate with him, until some time in January, 1893, when the defendant's attorney, being in New York, made, as he says, "diligent search" for him, without success. He did not, however, inquire for him at 150 Nassau street, because his former partners said he had gone out of business, and that they had not been able to find him; nor did he attempt, for aught that appears, to communicate with him through the mail, or to find him by looking in the New York city directory. We are of opinion that the record does not show due diligence on the part of the defendant to obtain the testimony of the absent witness. A motion for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, and its ruling in the matter will not be reversed by the appellate court unless plainly erroneous. The judgment is affirmed.

TESTAMENTARY POWERS—EXECUTION.

1. E. M., by second clause in her will, devises her property equally to P. M., Catherine F. and P. M., trustee for the separate use of Harriet M. for life, remainder to her children, and in default of issue with power of appointment, and in default of appointment to said P. M. and Catherine F. Harriet died, leaving said P. M. and C. F. surviving her. She made a will, disposing of her whole estate, but made no mention either of the power above or of the property derived under E. M.'s will. Her will contained a general residuary clause. Held, that under section 2520, Code 1837, providing that a bequest shall operate as an execution of a power, there was a sufficient appointment under the power conferred in E. M.'s will.

2. By clause 3 of said E. M.'s will it is provided that in the event of Catherine F.'s death without issue her share goes to P. M., and P. M., trustee for Harriet, with power of appointment in Harriet. Held, when Catherine died without issue, that her part was equally divided between P. M. and the appointee under Harriet's will, as the latter acquired title thereto under section 2526, Code 1887.

3. Where a power is authorized to be executed on a contingent event, it may, unless contrary to the intention of the party creating it, be executed before the event, though it cannot take effect until the contingency happens.

Appeal from decree of the circuit court of Shenandoah county rendered April 6, 1892, in a suit in equity wherein James W. Machir and others were plaintiffs and Noah Funk and others were defendants. The principal object of the suit was the sale of certain real estate situate in the counties of Shenandoah and Warren, which had been devised by Elizabeth Machir, deceased, with a view to a division of the proceeds among those entitled thereto. By the decree appealed from it was, among other things, held that the appellee Funk, as sole devisee of his deceased wife, Catherine S. Funk, was entitled to one-fourth of the proceeds of the sales of the said real estate, including a lot of something over nine acres, which had been previously sold for taxes, and conveyed by the purchaser to the plaintiffs, appellants here. Other facts are stated in the opinion. Affirmed in part, reversed in part.

Walton & Walton and E. E. Stickly, for appellants. John J. Williams and Williams & Bro., for appellees.

LEWIS, P. The case turns largely upon the construction of the will of Elizabeth Machir, deceased, which was admitted to probate in 1848, soon after the death of the testatrix. The second and third clauses of the will are as follows: "Second. I will and direct that all my estate, real and personal, be equally divided into three parts. One part I give and devise to my son Philip Machir, one to my daughter, Catherine S. Funk, and the other third to my son Philip A. Machir, in trust for the separate use of Harriet Machir, wife of my son Joseph S. Machir, for and during her natural life, remainder to the children of said Joseph S. Machir and said Harriet, and the descendants of any children who may be dead, such descendants taking their parents' share; and in default of such issue to such person or persons as the said Harriet by her last will and testament or by deed executed in the presence of two or more witnesses shall direct; and in default of such deed or will to the said Philip A. Machir and Catherine S. Funk equally to be divided, each of said shares to be charged with advancements made or to be made either to said Philip A., Catherine S., or Joseph S. Machir in order to equalize them, or to P. A. Machir in trust as aforesaid. Third. In case my daughter, Catherine S. Funk, shall die without children or descendants at her death, her share is to be equally divided between my son Philip A. Machir, and my said son P. A. Machir in trust for said Harriet Machir and children, with power of appointment and limitation over as aforesaid." Harriet Machir died in 1878, leaving Philip A. Machir and Catherine S. Funk surviving her. She had no child, but left a will whereby she disposed of her whole estate. No reference however is made in the will to the power under the will of Elizabeth Machir, nor is the property comprised in it mentioned; and she had considerable property of her own, which, or the most of which, was specifically disposed of. But the will contains a residuary clause, as follows: "All the rest and residue of my estate shall be sold after my death by my executors hereinafter named, and, after paying all my just debts and the legacies aforesaid, the residue, if any, I give to Mary Ellen Jamison." By deed of the 9th of February, 1881, Charles W. Jamison and the said Mary Ellen, his wife, conveyed to Philip A. Machir and Catherine S. Funk all the title and interest derived by them or either of them under the will of Harriet Machir in and to the estate of Elizabeth Machir, deceased, situate in Shenandoah and Warren counties, in this state, from which source the funds in controversy in the present case arose. On the 29th of January, 1891, Catherine S. Funk died, she having survived both Harriet and Philip Machir. She died without children or descendants, and by her will she devised her whole estate, real and personal, to her husband, Noah Funk.

In this state of things the first question to be determined is, what is the interest in the estate of Elizabeth Machir, deceased, to which Mrs. Funk was entitled at her death? By the second clause of her will above quoted the testatrix directed her estate to be divided into three equal parts. One-third she gave to her son Philip, another third she gave to Mrs. Funk, and the residue she gave in trust for Harriet Machir for life, and in default of issue at her death then to such person or persons as the said Harriet might by deed or will appoint, and in default of such appointment to Philip Machir and Mrs. Funk in equal shares. The appellants contend that Harriet Machir died without exercising the power of appointment, and that, no child having been born to her, the interest which was devised to Philip Machir, trustee, passed at her death to Philip Machir and Mrs. Funk. The ground of the first branch of this contention is that, inasmuch as the will of Harriet Machir neither refers to the power nor to the property embraced in it, there is nothing to show an intention on her part to execute it. But the common-law rule on this subject, which was recognized in Blake v. Hawkins, 98 U. S. 315; Lee v. Simpson, 134 U. S. 572, 590, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 631; Hood v. Haden, 82 Va. 588,—has to a certain extent been altered by statute in Virginia. That statute, now carried into section 2526 of the Code, enacts that “a devise or bequest shall extend to any real or personal estate (as the case may be) which the testator has power to appoint as he may think proper and to which it would apply if the estate were his own property and shall operate as an execution of such power, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will.” Here, the testatrix being empowered to appoint the property as she chose, (i. e. to whom she chose,) the residuary clause in her will operates, by force of the statute, as an execution of the power; a contrary intention not appearing by the will. Under such a statute, where it is not intended to exercise a general power, the intention to exclude the property should be stated on the face of the will. 1 Sugd. Powers, 368. This being so, the property, i. e. the subject of the power, passed under the residuary clause of the donee’s will to Mrs. Jamison, and afterwards by the deed of the 9th of February, 1881, to Philip A. Machir and Mrs. Funk, each taking one-half, which was equivalent to one-sixth of the estate devised by Elizabeth Machir. We say the property passed to Mrs. Jamison as residuary devisee, because, although the will directs it to be sold by the executors, the obvious intention was to confer on the executors a naked power. 1 Lomax, Ex’rs, 218; Mosby’s Adm’r v. Mosby’s Adm’r, 9 Grat. 584; Elys v. Wynne, 22 Grat. 224. As to the interest devised by Elizabeth Machir to Mrs. Funk directly, little need be said. By the third clause of the will it is provided that in the event of Mrs. Funk’s death without leaving children or descendants, her share (i. e. the one-third devised by the second clause) is to be equally divided between Philip Machir in his own right and as trustee of Mrs. Harriet Machir and children with power of appointment on the part of Mrs. Machir in the event specified; that is to say, she (Mrs. Funk) took a defeasible fee simple with a contingent limitation over. She died without issue, whereupon “her share” was equally divided into two parts, one of which passed to the representatives of Philip Machir, according to the doctrine of Medley v. Medley, 81 Va. 265; the other, under the will of Harriet Machir, to her appointee, Mrs. Jamison, whose entire interest in the property, vested and contingent, was conveyed to Philip Machir and Mrs. Funk by the deed of the 9th of February, 1881.

That the power of appointment was well executed by the will of Harriet Machir, although the will was executed and the testatrix died in the lifetime of Mrs. Funk, is unquestionable. This is so in view of the statute above quoted and the established common-law rule that where a power is authorized to be executed on a contingent event it may, unless contrary to the intention of the party creating it, be executed before (though it cannot take effect until) the contingency happens. 1 Sugd. Powers, 332. Hence the interest in the estate of Elizabeth Machir to which Mrs. Funk at her death was entitled was one-sixth plus one-twelfth, which is equal to one-fourth, except the nine-acre lot in the proceedings mentioned. It seems that some time before the commencement of the present suit this lot was sold as delinquent for nonpayment of taxes assessed against Mrs. Funk. It was purchased by one Krister, who subsequently sold and conveyed it to the appellants. The tax sale was duly reported to the county court and confirmed. A survey was also made and reported as required by the statute, and afterwards a deed was made by the clerk of the county court to the purchaser. The effect of these proceedings, which, for aught the record shows, were regular, was to divest the title of Mrs. Funk and to transfer it to Krister; and their validity cannot be collaterally assailed. The case of Hitchcox v. Rawson, 14 Grat. 526, is a sufficient authority on this point. Affirmed in part, and reversed in part.

COX v. JONES et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 31, 1893.)

APPEAL—DISMISSAL—FAILURE TO PROSECUTE.

An appeal will be dismissed for failure to prosecute, where appellant has permitted two terms to pass without availing himself of the opportunity given him to remedy defects in the record.

Action by W. A. Cox against Nancy A. Jones and others. From a judgment in plaintiff’s favor, defendants appeal. On motion to dismiss appeal for failure to prosecute. Motion granted.

Batchelor & Devereux, for plaintiff. H. R. Kornegay, for defendants.

CLARK, J. This was a motion made in September, 1888, to set aside a judgment rendered in a special proceeding in 1871. The appeal was docketed here at fall term, 1891. The record of the special proceeding not being sent up, a certiorari was sent down, to which the clerk returned that, after diligent search, only fragmentary parts thereof could be found, and these he sent up. Thereupon, at spring term, 1892, the case was remanded, (110 N. C. 309, 14 S. E. Rep. 782,) to the end that the appellants might take steps to have the lost record supplied, by proper proceedings in the court below. This they have not done, and the court is unable to pass upon the case, as presented in the voluminous, irregular, and insufficient transcript. The record is as defective as when the order of remand was made, though since then there have been three or four terms of the superior court in that county. No excuse is rendered which atones for this laches. The cause having been here two terms since, (fall term, 1892, and spring term, 1893,) the motion of appellee to dismiss the appeal, under rule 15, is allowed. Brantly v. Jordan, 92 N. C. 291; Wiseman v. Commissioners, 104 N. C. 330, 10 S. E. Rep. 481. Appeal dismissed.

STATE v. FINLAYSON.

CRIMINAL LAW—SPECIAL VERDICT.

In a prosecution for violating a city ordinance imposing a license tax on various occupations, a special verdict which fails to clearly allege the trade or occupation carried on by defendant, and to set forth the specific provision of the ordinance which defendant violated, is fatally defective; and a conviction will be set aside, and a new trial granted.

Appeal from superior court, Wayne county; Brown, Judge.

H. L. Finlayson was prosecuted for failing to pay a license tax imposed by an ordinance of the city of Goldsborough. The proceeding was commenced before the mayor, and, from a judgment imposing a fine, defendant appealed to the superior court. The jury returned a special verdict, and the court directed a judgment of guilty to be entered thereon, and defendant again appeals. Reversed.

The special verdict is as follows: "(1) The said city adopted the following ordinance on June 1, 1892: 'Ordinance No. 12. Be it ordained,' etc. 'Section 1. That the following taxes are hereby levied on real and personal property, and polls, and on the business, trades, and occupations carried on within the city. Sec. 2. That all monthly license taxes shall be collected on the first day of each month, in advance.' 'Sec. 7. That any person refusing to pay the license tax assessed against him, for ten days, shall be liable to a fine of $5.' (2) That, by another ordinance, it is made a misdemeanor to fail to take out the license above provided for. (3) That defendant is the agent of the Baltimore United Oil Company, a branch of the Standard Oil Company, having charge of its business in said city. (4) That said company keeps oil stored in said city, and sells it to merchants through a regular broker, who charges a brokerage for selling. Said broker is a general broker, and sells for many other parties besides said company, and pays the brokerage tax as required by the city ordinance. Said oil is shipped to Goldsborough from points outside the state, and is stored for convenience of delivery, shipped in barrels, and sold without breaking packages. (5) In making sales, the broker keeps a ticket, which he afterwards forwards to the Norfolk office of the company, and the bills are there made out against purchasers. In rare cases, the purchaser offers cash for the oil, and the broker accepts, and charges himself on his brokerage account, there having been paid, in cash, at no time up to the present, more than was due the broker for brokerage. The Norfolk, Va., office has charge of the territory of eastern North Carolina. (6) The Standard Oil Company and the United Oil Company are corporations organized under the laws of one of the states other than North Carolina, and Jersey City, N. J., is the principal place of business for the Standard, and Baltimore, Md., for the United; and they are producers, refiners, and dealers in oils throughout the United States. (7) That it was the duty of defendant to take out license for said business in Goldsborough, and he is an actual resident of said city. (8) That defendant refuses to take out the license required by said ordinance. If, upon these facts, the court shall be of opinion that the defendant is guilty, we find him guilty; but, if otherwise, we find him not guilty."

Aycock & Daniels, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The defendant is prosecuted for refusing and neglecting to pay the license tax, as required by chapter 12, § 7, of the ordinance of the city of Goldsborough. The special verdict is fatally defective, in that it fails to clearly allege the trade or occupation carried on by the defendant, and to set forth the specific provisions of the ordinance which it is alleged were violated by the defendant. Evidently, a very important question, concerning interstate commerce, was intended to be presented, but we cannot consider it upon this verdict. According to the ruling in State v. White Oak River Corp., 111 N. C. 661, 16 S. E. Rep. 331, there must be a new trial.

LOYD v. LOYD.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

PRESUMPTION—AS TO DATE OF MARRIAGE.

In replevin, evidence by plaintiff that the articles in controversy were given to her by defendant before her marriage to him, without stating the date of the marriage, raises the presumption that it was solemnized under existing statutes, which enable a married woman to acquire a separate estate, and not under laws in force prior to 1868, when no such right existed; and it is error for the court to order a nonsuit at the close of plaintiff's case.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; Brown, Judge.

Action of claim and delivery by Narcissa Loyd against William Loyd. At the close of plaintiff's evidence she took a nonsuit, in deference to an intimation by the court that she had no right of action, and appealed. Reversed.

The plaintiff, who is the wife of the defendant, testified as follows: "The articles of personal property in controversy were given me by defendant before our marriage. After our marriage we lived at my mother's. Defendant's mother also gave me some of the property. Defendant left me two years ago, and afterwards he got out a claim and delivery against my mother, and got these things from her. I was not a party to that suit. The defendant did not prepare a room for me, and tell me to come and live with him. He said I could come and live with him at his mother's if I wanted to. I have not applied for a divorce. Defendant drew a knife on me, and shut me up in a room, at my mother's, and he had a pistol in our room, and threatened me with that. I would not go and live with him at his mother's because it was agreed before we were married that we should live at my mother's. Defendant behaved so badly toward me at my mother's, while we lived together, that he left my mother's of his own motion. He was not driven off by my mother. I was afraid to go and live with him at any place other than at my mother's house." Upon this testimony his honor intimated an opinion that the plaintiff had no right to bring the suit or recover possession of the property, and thereupon the plaintiff took a nonsuit, and appealed.

J. C. L. Harris, for appellant. T. B. Parnell and Busbee & Busbee, for appellee.

AVERY, J. The appeal is from an intimation of the court below that the plaintiff's testimony did not, if admitted, establish, prima facie, her right to recover. This depends upon the application of the doctrine of presumptions. She did not state what was the date of her marriage,—whether before or after the constitution of 1868 was ratified. If before, all of her personal property belonged absolutely to the husband on the celebration of the marriage, though it was given to her by him while she was still a feme sole, and the plaintiff could not recover, certainly, the articles given her before such marriage. Giles v. Hunter, 103 N. C. 194, 9 S. E. Rep. 549. The duty rests, at all stages of a trial, upon the actor, to prove such allegations as are essential to his recovery. He may discharge this duty by submitting plenary testimony which, uncontradicted, entitles him to a verdict, or he may, after proving directly some of the facts that he is bound to establish, shift the burden, as to others, by offering such evidence as will raise a presumption of their truth, and resting, until the other party shall have attempted to rebut the presumption so raised. The plaintiff testifies that she was lawfully married to the defendant, and that the articles of personal property for which the action was brought were given to her by the husband before and after marriage. If a stranger had testified that he witnessed the celebration of a marriage in some foreign country, or in this state, between the same parties, at a date not remembered, the presumption would have arisen that the rites were performed in accordance with the laws then in force in the foreign country or in this state, as the case might be. 14 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 531, note; State v. Patterson, 2 Ired. 346. Nothing more appearing than the lawfulness of a marriage at a date unknown to, or not stated by, a witness, the courts would not refuse to adjust the rights of children or creditors of either of the parties that might be dependent, primarily, upon the marital rights of the husband growing out of the contract. The contract could not be treated as a nullity for want of proof of its actual date; and the difficulty would be met by invoking the aid of the presumption, not only that the marriage was celebrated in accordance with law, but in conformity to the statutes now in force in this state. Durham v. Bostick, 72 N. C. 357. In Durham v. Bostick, supra, the court declared that a sheriff was justified in assuming that the contract upon which the judgment was rendered and the execution issued was entered into since the ratification of the constitution of 1868, if nothing to the contrary appeared upon the face of the execution, and the suggestions in this case led to the enactment of a later statute, (Code, §§ 234-236.) We think that, as a general rule, a contract relating to marriage or other matters must be presumed, in the absence of specific proof, to have been entered into under the statutes now in force, as well as in full contemplation of their provisions. Moreover, there is a presumption in favor of the validity of all gifts and contracts, and we must infer, when the uncontradicted fact appears that the defendant husband gave to his wife certain articles of personal property, that the gift vested a valid title in her. Woodruff v. Bowles, 104 N. C. 197, 10 S. E. Rep. 452. The burden is upon him to show that the property was not given to her, or that the attempted gift was invalid. In cases where the bona fides of a gift or conveyance from a husband to his wife is drawn in question, evidence that the husband is embarrassed with debt may impose the burden of rebutting the presumption of fraud upon the wife. Osborne v. Wilkes, 108 N. C. 651, 13 S. E. Rep. 285. But there is no allegation or proof of fraud in this case. The only question involved is whether the testimony of the plaintiff, if admitted to be true, establishes her right to the articles of property which she testifies were given to her by the defendant. We think that the court below erred in intimating that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, if her own testimony was believed. The judgment of nonsuit must be set aside, and a new trial granted.

UNITED STATES ex rel. STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA et al. v.
DOUGLAS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

REMOVAL OF CAUSES—FEDERAL QUESTION—ACTION ON BOND OF FEDERAL RECEIVER.

1. The fact that the United States is a formal party plaintiff on the record does not render a cause removable from a state to the federal court, the real controversy being between the relator and the defendant.

2. Whether the liability of the sureties on the bond of a receiver appointed by a federal court is joint or several does not involve a federal question, within the meaning of the removal acts of congress, since the liability of the sureties depends, not on any law of congress, but on the proper construction of the bond itself.

3. The construction of orders and decrees of a federal court according to their true meaning does not involve a federal question, within the meaning of the removal acts.

4. Act Cong. Aug. 13, 1888, § 3, (Stat. 436,) which provides that an action against a federal receiver shall be subject to the general equity jurisdiction of the court in which he was appointed, does not affect the jurisdiction of a state court over an action against the sureties on a federal receiver's bond, to which the receiver is not made a party.

5. The fact that the state has been improperly joined as relator in an action does not authorize a removal to the federal court.

Appeal from superior court, Wake county; G. H. Brown, Judge.

Action by the United States ex rel. state of North Carolina and Samuel McD. Tate, state treasurer, against Robert M. Douglas and others, sureties on the bond of Samuel E. Phillips as receiver of the North Carolina Railroad Company, appointed by the circuit court of the United States for the district of North Carolina. Defendant Douglas petitioned for the removal of the cause to the United States circuit court, and from an order denying his petition he appeals. Affirmed.

A. W. Haywood, for appellant. Battle & Mordecai, for appellees.

MACRAE, J. This is a petition of the defendant Robert M. Douglas to remove into the circuit court of the United States, under the provisions of chapter 866, Acts 1888, (25 Stat. 436,) a civil action brought in the superior court of Wake county against the sureties alone upon the bond of a receiver appointed by the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of North Carolina. Is the cause removable because the United States is a party? It was held in State of Maryland v. Baldwin, 112 U. S. 490, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 278, that the state was only a formal plaintiff, the actual litigation being between other parties. "The name of the state is used from necessity when a suit on the bond is prosecuted for the benefit of a person thus interested, and in such cases the real controversy is between him and the obligors on the bond." Here it is evident that the real controversy is between the relator Tate and the defendants, the United States being only a formal plaintiff.

2. Is there a federal question involved in this action? By these words are meant a question requiring a construction to be put upon the constitution or some law of the United States, or treaty made under its authority. The petitioner contends that five federal questions clearly appear from the complaint, and the answer of the petitioning defendant: First. The construction of the bond sued on, which was given under a decree of the circuit court of the United States, —whether the said bond is joint or several,—upon which will depend the amount of the defendant's liability if he is liable at all. Second. The construction of the order of the United States circuit court substituting the bond sued on for one that had theretofore been given. This defendant contends that the liability of the receiver accrued upon the first bond, and that the second bond is discharged. Third. The construction of the decree of said court of December 6, 1890, which only fixed the liability of the receiver, and not that of his sureties, and which was made without notice to the sureties. Fourth. The construction of the force and effect of the decretal order of said court at June term, 1891, giving the state treasurer leave to sue, and not the state. Fifth. The construction of section 3 of the act of August 13, 1888, cited above.¹ The action was brought at the instance of the state treasurer by leave of the United States circuit court for the eastern district of North Carolina against the sureties on the receiver's bond, not against the receiver. If it were an action against the principal, it seems that it might have been removed at his instance into the United States circuit court under section 3 of the act of 1888. But the liability of the receiver had already been ascertained in said court. No federal question can arise upon the construction of the bond as to whether the liability of the sureties be joint or several. Neither the constitution nor laws of the United States can afford any aid in the solution of this question. It is simply a question of law to be determined by settled rules of construction. The form of a receiver's bond is not prescribed by any statute of the United States. The liability of the sureties thereon, like the liability upon a judgment in the United States court, or that upon a treasury note or bond of the United States, involves no construction of the laws of the United States. Society v. Ford, 114 U. S. 635, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1104. The same is true of the question arising upon the construction of decrees and orders of the United States courts. There is nothing to show that any question of construction of these decrees and orders, other than the necessity to interpret them according to their plain meaning, will arise. If the act should receive the wide interpretation claimed for it by the petitioner, no cause could be tried in the state court if objection were raised by the defendant, where any right had been formerly determined in a federal court as a discharge in bankruptcy, or where the title to land sold under foreclosure proceedings in such court were necessary to be shown in evidence, or the like. The simple question is whether the defendants are liable upon the bond, and to what amount. It is like an "attempt to enforce an ordinary property right acquired under the authority of judgments and decrees in the courts of the United States, without presenting any question distinctly involving the laws of the United States." Carson v. Dunham, 121 U. S. 421, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1030. The third section of the act referred to has no reference to an action against the sureties upon the bond, but asserts the general equity jurisdiction of the appointing court over the receiver so appointed. It might be that, upon the question whether the state court has given due effect to the judgments and decrees of the circuit court, there would be a right to review a judgment of the state court, but this question has not yet arisen, and we are not to assume that it will arise. It is to be observed that there is no separable cause of action in this case, and that there are four defendants. It is true that only the petitioning defendant has answered the complaint, and the others are all in default; but in Putnam v. Ingraham, 114 U. S. 57, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 746, it was ruled that the fact that one of the defendants did not answer, but was in default, was immaterial, and that the default placed the parties in no different position with reference to a removal than they would have occupied if that one had answered, and set up an entirely different defense from that of the other defendants. In Telegraph Co. v. Brown, 82 Fed. Rep. 337, Brewer, J., speaking of the act of 1887, § 2, cl. 1, which is "that any suit of a civil nature, at law or in equity, arising under the constitution or laws of the United States * * * may be removed by the defendant or defendants therein to the circuit court of the United States for the proper district," etc., says,

"Under the first clause, all the defendants or all the plaintiffs must unite to accomplish a removal."

The fact that the state of North Carolina has been made a relator in this action can have no effect. The misjoinder of unnecessary parties is a mere matter of surplusage under the Code, and not a fatal objection. Clark's Code, (2d Ed.) p. 161. We hold, therefore, that the defendant petitioner has shown no removable cause. Judgment affirmed.

BURWELL, J., did not sit on the hearing of this case.

MORRIS v. HERNDON et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

ESTOPPEL—SILENCE—RECORD AS NOTICE.

A junior chattel mortgagee, who is chiefly instrumental in inducing the senior mortgagee to release his mortgage, and to take another in its stead, without informing him of the existence of the junior mortgage, is estopped from asserting it as a prior lien to that of the second mortgage taken by the senior mortgagee, though the junior mortgage was duly registered.

Appeal from superior court, Durham county; H. G. Connor, Judge.

Action by W. H. Morris against J. R. Herndon to foreclose a chattel mortgage. L. C. Herndon interpleaded, and claimed the property under a mortgage prior to plaintiff's. From a judgment in plaintiff's favor, defendant and the interpleader appeal. Affirmed.

At the trial, the plaintiff introduced the following evidence: W. H. Morris, plaintiff: "I held the mortgage of March 19, 1886. There was due, in 1889, thirty dollars and interest. L. C. Herndon came and asked me to take J. R. Herndon out from under Mr. Farthing. I paid Mr. Farthing two hundred and thirty-five dollars and sixty-five cents. Two hundred was for Herndon's mother; the balance was for J. R. Herndon, ($35.65). L. C. Herndon was present at the time the last mortgage was executed. He was present during the entire transaction. He said nothing about his lien. They did not tell me that L. C. Herndon had a mortgage. I paid Farthing the money. Farthing wrote the mortgage. I did not say that, unless I could get all of the incumbrances, I would not take anything. I got only $12.80. I met the officer when he went to execute the warrant. He took five shoats. They were not the ones that I had a mortgage on. He (J. R. Herndon) agreed that I should take the five shoats in place of those that I had a mortgage on. I advertised the shoats in three places. They brought $12.80. It was a fair price. I kept them up. The mule was worth seventy-five dollars. L. C. Herndon got it. It was the same mule as the one described in my mortgages of 1886 and 1889." The foregoing was all of the plaintiff's testimony, at the close of which the defendants asked the court to charge the jury that, if they believed the evidence, they should answer the issues in favor of the defendants. This was refused, and the defendants excepted on the ground that, taking the plaintiff's testimony as true, he was not entitled to recover.

The defendants introduced the following witnesses, who testified as set out: L. C. Herndon: "Farthing wrote the mortgage. Morris said that he could not take up the mortgage Farthing held against my mother unless he could get all. Morris said that he would take it on the same terms that Farthing had it. I did not urge Morris to take up the mortgage against J. R. Herndon. I paid the amount to Morris for my brother. Morris was told that I had a mortgage." J. R. Herndon says "that he was not present when the mortgage to Morris was being prepared. He signed it as prepared by Farthing." G. C. Farthing, a witness for defendants, says: "The general character of the Herndons is good. I had a mortgage against Herndon's mother. Morris had agreed to settle it if Herndon would pay him thirty dollars he owed him for some rent. Herndon fixed the thirty dollars in a mortgage. Herndon took up both mortgages. I wrote the mortgage from J. R. Herndon to Morris from a mortgage J. R. Herndon had previously given to me. L. C. Herndon was present when the mortgage was written." The foregoing was all the evidence of the defendants.

The defendants duly requested his honor to charge the jury that, upon the whole evidence, the plaintiff was not entitled to recover, and that they should answer the issues in favor of the defendants. This request was refused, and said defendants excepted.

Fuller & Fuller, for appellants. Boone & Parker, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. In Mason v. Williams, 66 N. C. 564, it is said by Rodman, J., that registration is not sufficient notice to prevent the operation of an estoppel in pais; but, even were it otherwise, such constructive notice would not affect the rights of an innocent purchaser, if under the circumstances it was the duty of the owner to make known his claim or title. This doctrine of constructive notice, when applied to estoppels, "if correct at all," says Mr. Pomeroy, (2 Eq. Jur. 810,) "is correct only within very narrow limits, and must be strictly confined to cases where the conduct creating the alleged estoppel is mere silence. If the real owner resorts to any affirmative acts or words, or makes any representation, it would be in the highest degree inequitable to permit him to say that the other party, who had relied upon his conduct, and had been misled thereby, might have ascertained the falsity of his representation." In speaking of the same principle, Mr. Herman says, (2 Herm. Estop. § 984:) "But this is applicable only in the case where the foundation of the estoppel is in silence or acquiescence, for, when the owner concurs in a sale by participating in it at the time, it becomes his own act." So it is said in Mason v. Williams, supra, that "the rule is that if a man so conducts himself, whether intentionally or not, that a reasonable person would infer that a certain state of things exists, and acts on that inference, he shall be afterwards estopped from denying it." Without discussing the general doctrine as to the effect of mere silence where there is registration, and leaving it as it stands upon our decided cases, and conceding for present purposes the principle stated by the above mentioned authors, we think there was something more here than simple acquiescence, and that his honor was correct in refusing to charge that upon the whole testimony the interpleader, L. C. Herndon, was not estopped to claim the property in controversy. The instruction must be treated as if it were a formal demurrer to evidence, in which case it is well settled that the testimony must be considered in the aspect most favorable to the opposite party. Gwaltney v. Land Co., 111 N. C. 547, 16 S. E. Rep. 602. Viewed in this light, it was certainly a legitimate inference that L. C. Herndon was chiefly instrumental in bringing about the transaction by virtue of which he insists that the claim of the plaintiff should be postponed to his own. The plaintiff had a first mortgage executed by J. R. Herndon, and at the instance of the said L. C. Herndon the plaintiff took another mortgage upon the same property to secure the same indebtedness. The effect of taking this last mortgage was, it is conceded, to release the first, and by this means it came about that a second mortgage held by the said Herndon acquired the legal priority. Should he be permitted to avail himself of this advantage, obtained under such circumstances? The plaintiff had no actual knowledge of the said mortgage, and we think it was the duty of Herndon to have informed him of its existence. He was not a mere silent bystander, but a participant in the entire transaction; and, as the property was insufficient to secure the claims of both, it was inconsistent with good faith and fair dealing that he should have encouraged the plaintiff, by his silence, to part with his existing security. The plaintiff had a right to infer from the conduct of Herndon that he, at least, had no claim which would necessarily or probably impair the security which was then being substituted, at his instance, for the plaintiff's prior lien. This brings the case within the principles declared in the passages we have extracted from Herman, and Mason v. Williams, supra, which are abundantly sustained by our own decisions, as well as other authorities. Affirmed.

WOODY v. JONES.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—WHEN BEGINS TO RUN—AGAINST CHATTEL MORTGAGEE—TAX SALE.

1. The statute of limitations does not begin to run on a chattel mortgage until the condition of the mortgage is broken; and the fact that the mortgagor, in whose possession the property remained, took it out of the state, and sold it there, does not start the running of the statute against the mortgagee, where the mortgage was duly recorded in the proper county.

2. A sale of mortgaged chattels to satisfy taxes due from the mortgagor does not pass title to the purchaser, divested of the lien of the mortgage, though the mortgagor was permitted to retain possession, where the mortgage was duly recorded.

Appeal from superior court, Person county; Brown, Judge.

Action by C. C. Woody against Ernest Jones for the recovery of a horse, originally brought in justice court. The case was appealed to the superior court, where the only plea was the statute of limitations. Judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The action was begun March 29, 1893, for the recovery of the possession of a horse which was admitted to be worth less than $50, thus giving jurisdiction to the justice. This horse was the property of Isaac Wilson, who on December 3, 1886, conveyed it by chattel mortgage to John F. Woody, who assigned the note and mortgage to plaintiff on January 2, 1889. The mortgage was duly registered in Person county on April 15, 1887, and nothing has ever been paid upon the mortgage debt. The defendant purchased the horse in Halifax, Va., from Isaac Wilson, the mortgagor, in the fall of 1889, for full value. At the time of the purchase, the defendant was a resident of Person county, N. C., and has had the horse in his possession, in said county, ever since said purchase by him, except that the horse was seized by the sheriff of Person in July, 1890, for Isaac Wilson's taxes for 1889, and sold, and purchased by the defendant for $7.20. The said taxes were the general taxes of said Wilson, who was also a citizen and resident of Person county, and not a specific tax upon the horse. The defendant had no actual notice of the mortgage. The court below held that the defendant had notice by registration; that there is no evidence of a demand, or that plaintiff knew of defendant's possession; that defendant's possession was not adverse, or at least did not become so until the public seizure and sale in July, 1890; and, the only question being raised by the plea of the statute of limitations, that the action is not barred. There was judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appealed.

W. W. Kitchin and Boone & Parker, for appellant. J. W. Graham and V. S. Bryant, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. We concur with his honor in his conclusion that, upon the facts of this case, the action is not barred by the statute of limitations. The defendant has had possession of the horse for about four years. At the time when he acquired possession, the mortgage had been registered in the county of Person, where all parties to the sale resided, and the registration was notice to the world of the lien of the mortgagee. Parker v. Banks, 79 N. C. 480. The fact that the sale and delivery by mortgagor to defendant was in Virginia cannot affect the rights of the mortgagor, or his assignee, the plaintiff. Hornthal v. Barwell, 109 N. C. 10, 13 S. E. Rep. 721. When the mortgagor is left in possession, he holds it for the mortgagee, and his possession does not become adverse until condition broken. An action for the foreclosure, where the mortgagor has been in possession of the property, must be brought within 10 years after forfeiture. Code, § 152, subd. 3. A purchase from the mortgagor, the mortgage being registered, is not colorable title. Parker v. Banks, supra. "The rule is that the mortgagor and his vendee hold in subordination to the title of the mortgagee, not adversely to him; and the statute of limitations does not run, even after the law day is past, as in favor of the mortgagor or his vendee, without some overt act throwing off allegiance." Wood, Lim. 446.

The defendant claims, also, by virtue of the sale by the sheriff to satisfy the tax list which he had in his hands against Isaac Wilson, the mortgagor; but the legal title, by virtue of the mortgage, had passed out of said Wilson, and was not subject to levy, or, in any event, the property passed subject to the rights of the mortgagee. While the plaintiff is entitled to the possession, the defendant may still discharge the mortgage debt, and regain possession of the horse, if he so desire. Judgment affirmed.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

CERTIORARI—SUPPLYING OMITTED EVIDENCE.

A writ of certiorari will not be granted to supply evidence omitted from the case made up for appeal, when it does not appear that the judge of the lower court has intimated a readiness to make the correction desired.

Action by James M. Allen and another against S. H. McLendon and others. From a judgment against said Allen, he appeals. On petition for certiorari. Denied.

Battle & Mordecai, for appellant. R. E. Little, for appellees.

MacRAE, J. This was a petition for a certiorari filed by the plaintiff in this court upon the ground that his honor, in making up the case on appeal, had inadvertently omitted some portions of the testimony, which were material to be set out, in order that the appellant might fairly present his exceptions; that said testimony was set out in the case tendered by appellant, and in the counter case offered by appellee, and also appeared in the notes of the presiding judge, which were attached to the affidavit of the petitioner, and that the foregoing facts are the grounds of petitioner's belief that, if an opportunity were afforded him, his honor would insert in the case the testimony referred to, in response to the certiorari. There is no allegation, however, that any application had been made to his honor, or that any intimation had been made by him that he would, upon opportunity, make the amendment desired. In Boyer v. Teague, 106 N. C. 571, 11 S. E. Rep. 330, the matter involved in this application was very fully considered and discussed. In that case, his honor below had, upon application to him, intimated that he would insert the testimony referred to, in response to a certiorari, and the same was granted. And in Broadwell v. Ray, 111 N. C. 16 S. E. Rep. 408, the petitioner gave his reason for his belief that the judge would insert the testimony to be that he has informed petitioner's counsel that he had the evidence taken down at the trial, and that he would furnish the same, if the case is again placed before him; and there the motion was granted. But it is said in McDaniel v. King, 89 N. C. 29: "If the judge, by inadvertence, mistake, or misapprehension, has failed to settle the case for this court correctly, we cannot doubt that he will gladly correct his error, either with or without notice to the parties to the action, as he may deem just and proper. This court will not, certainly in the first instance, resort to harsh and extreme remedies to compel courts to discharge their duties correctly, and correct their errors, in respect to cases coming to this court by appeal."

The case settled by the trial judge imports absolute verity. This court has no authority to require the judge, in settling the case, to set forth any matter of evidence alleged to have been omitted. It is entirely within his discretion to amend the case when the opportunity is afforded him by the certiorari. "The writ will not, even in such case, be granted, unless the grounds for such belief are set forth, so that the court may pass upon the reasonableness thereof." Lowe v. Elliott, 107 N. C. 718, 12 S. E. Rep. 383, and cases there cited.

It seems but fair to the trial judge that he should have the opportunity presented to him to intimate whether he will make the desired correction. For the reasons stated in McDaniel v. King, supra,—that this court will not direct a certiorari to be issued in the first instance, it not being made to appear that the judge below has intimated that he will make the correction if the case is presented to him again,—the prayer of the petitioner is denied.

ALLEN v. McLendon et al.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—PETITION TO SET ASIDE—EVIDENCE—REVERSAL ON APPEAL.

1. Pending a motion to confirm a sale made in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding to the mortgagee, a number of alleged judgment creditors of the mortgagor came in, and averred that the mortgage was fraudulent as to them, to which averments the mortgagor made no reply; and judgment was subsequently rendered, vacating the foreclosure, and setting aside the mortgage as fraudulent. Held that, as the mortgage was found fraudulent, the sufficiency of the evidence of the judgment debts did not concern the mortgage.

2. On an issue as to the bona fides of a mortgage given to secure an alleged pre-existing indebtedness, the tax lists in the township and county of the mortgagee's residence are competent to show that he had no solvent credits.

3. It is proper to instruct the jury that the law looks with suspicion on a transaction whereby one indebted to others conveys his property, or a part of it, to a brother-in-law, for an alleged pre-existing indebtedness.

Appeal from superior court, Anson county; Whitaker, Judge.

Action by James M. Allen and another against S. H. McLendon and others to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment canceling said mortgage as fraudulent, plaintiff Allen appeals. Affirmed.

The action was brought by James M. Allen against S. H. McLendon and wife for the foreclosure of a mortgage theretofore made by defendants to plaintiff to secure the payment of a note for $2,040.57 and interest. A complaint was filed at the return term, and, for want of an answer, judgment final, by default, was rendered at the same term, and a foreclosure sale decreed. At the succeeding term of the court, W. A. Liles, executor of Nancy McLendon, was allowed to become a party plaintiff, and file a complaint, alleging that defendants had executed another mortgage to this plaintiff's testatrix since the before-mentioned mortgage was made, and asking that his rights under the second mortgage might be protected. Upon report of sale and affidavits at a subsequent term, the sale was set aside, resale ordered, and the clerk appointed commissioner, who made sale, and reported that plaintiff Allen was the last and highest bidder, but, being the mortgagee creditor, had paid in no money. Pending the motion for confirmation of this sale, a large number of judgment creditors of defendant S. H. McLendon were allowed to come in, and make themselves defendants, and file an answer, duly verified, alleging the indebtedness to them of defendant S. H. McLendon, and, further, that in April, 1885, the defendants McLendon and wife conveyed, with other lands, the lands described in the mortgage thereafter made to plaintiff Allen, who was the clerk and brother-in-law of S. H. McLendon, and that said Allen, by deed, in May, 1885, conveyed to his sister, the femdefendant, L. A. McLendon, all of said lands; and they alleged that all of said conveyances, including the mortgage made by said McLendon and wife to said Allen, were fraudulent and void as to the said creditors, and that the judgment of foreclosure was obtained by fraud and collusion; and they demanded that the same be canceled, vacated, and set aside. Plaintiff Allen filed his reply, denying all fraud or collusion, admitting the conveyances and mortgage, and alleging that the same were bona fide, and for valuable consideration, and denying all knowledge or information as to the judgments alleged by defendants. McLendon and wife filed no reply. A receiver was appointed. At said May term, 1893, the following issues were submitted to the jury, and responded to as follows: "(1) Was the mortgage by S. H. McLendon and wife to James M. Allen executed with intent to fraudulently hinder or delay the creditors of S. H. McLendon? Answer. Yes. (2) If yes, did the plaintiff have knowledge of such fraudulent intent? A. Yes. (3) Was the alleged indebtedness to plaintiff, or any part thereof, bona fide? If so, what part? A. No part. (4) Was the defendant S. H. McLendon indebted to defendants, as alleged in their answer? A. Yes." Plaintiff Allen moved for a new trial. The motion was denied, and judgment was rendered, vacating the former judgment and decree of foreclosure, and setting aside and declaring void the deeds and mortgage aforementioned; directing the receiver to sell the lands named in said deeds and mortgage for cash, and report; and the cause was retained for further directions, and the distribution of the proceeds of said sale among the judgment creditor defendants and W. A. Liles, executor, pro rata, and for costs. Only James M. Allen appealed. The exceptions are stated in the opinion.

MacRAE, J. The plaintiff Allen tendered the following issues: (1) Was the mortgage executed by S. H. McLendon and wife to the plaintiff J. M. Allen made to secure a bona fide debt to the plaintiff, and has the same, or any part thereof, since been paid? (2) Was the said mortgage executed with the intent to defraud the creditors of S. H. McLendon? (3) Did the plaintiff know of, and participate in, such fraud?

The first exception was to the submission by the court of the second issue submitted, and the refusal by the court to submit the third issue tendered by the plaintiff. The issue submitted confined the question to the knowledge of the grantee, while that tendered and refused extended the inquiry to a participation in, as well as knowledge of, the fraud. The rule is that "a mortgage deed executed to secure the payment of money loaned, or of a valid pre-existing debt, but also with the intent on the part of the mortgagor to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, will nevertheless be deemed valid and enforced by the courts as against the claims of creditors other than the mortgagee or cestui que trust, unless the beneficiary under the deed had knowledge of, and participated in, the fraud." Woodruff v. Bowles, 104 N. C. 197, 10 S. E. Rep. 482; Hudson v. Jordan, 108 N. C. 12, 12 S. E. Rep. 1029; Battle v. Mayo, 102 N. C. 413, 9 S. E. Rep. 384. But the response of the jury to the third issue, that the alleged indebtedness of McLendon to plaintiff Allen was not bona fide,—in other words, that there was no debt to be secured by the mortgage, and, therefore, that the conveyance was necessarily fraudulent as to both grantor and grantee,—relieves us of the necessity of considering the question whether the mortgage would have been vitiated simply by notice of fraud on the part of the mortgagor fixed upon the mortgagee.

The plaintiff Allen objected and excepted to the evidence offered to prove the judgment indebtedness of S. H. McLendon to the new parties defendant; but that was a matter between defendant McLendon and the other defendants, who had put in a duly-verified answer in the nature of a complaint, charging that they were judgment creditors of said McLendon in the sums set out. He made no reply, and the alleged judgment creditors were entitled to judgment against him as to the indebtedness. Besides, it appears that most of the judgments were proved by the judgment docket, which was proof of the record itself; and if there were irregularity in proof of any of the judgments rendered by justices of the peace it cannot now concern this plaintiff, by reason of the response to the first, second, and third issues.

For the purpose of showing that McLendon was not indebted to Allen, it was entirely competent to offer the tax lists for several years in the county and township of said Allen's residence, to show that he listed no solvent credits. While this may not have been absolute and convincing proof, it was surely some evidence competent to go to the jury upon the question stated.

J. M. Allen testified that he owned a tract of land in Anson county, worth $250, which he had bought in 1886 on credit. He was then asked by his counsel what other property, if any, he owned, outside of the mortgage sued on. Defendants objected. The objection was sustained, and plaintiff Allen excepted. As the testimony is reported, there is no ground on which to base this exception.

Defendant McLendon testified, as a witness for plaintiff Allen, that he (witness) owned several tracts of land,—naming them, and their values. Witness was asked on cross-examination if this land, or a portion of it, had not been allotted to him as his homestead, and at what price. His answer was objected and excepted to. Whatever may have been the object of the question, there could be no valid objection to it and the answer, for it was asked and answered upon cross-examination.

The defendants were allowed to amend their answer during the trial by inserting the words "not due" and "illegal," to which plaintiff Allen excepted. This was within the discretion of his honor, and not subject to review. The amendment did not change the character of the action.

We see no error in the charge of his honor that the law looks with suspicion upon a transaction of this kind, where the defendant McLendon is indebted to others, and conveys his property, or a part thereof, to his brother-in-law; that they were required to scrutinize the matter closely, in declaring their conclusion as to its validity. The language seems to follow an approved precedent in State v. Mitchell, 102 N. C. 347, 9 S. E. Rep. 702.

The exceptions: "(2) Because the court did not put its charge in writing, and read it to the jury; (3) because the court stated in full the contentions of the defendants, and failed and neglected to state the contention of the plaintiff Allen; and (4) because the court failed to charge the jury as requested by plaintiff,"—are met by the statement in the case that "the plaintiff Allen did not request the court to put its charge to the jury in writing. The plaintiff Allen did not tender or show to the court any requests or prayers for instructions to the jury; and the court, in its charge, did state to the jury, carefully, particularly, and fully, the contention of the plaintiff Allen as to all the questions embraced by the different issues submitted to them." These findings are binding upon us.

There was also a motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, but we have not been furnished with the grounds of the motion; and we see nothing in the plea which confesses a cause of action, nor that the matter relied on in defense is insufficient. No error.

BURWELL, J., did not sit on the hearing of the case.

TOWN OF DURHAM v. RICHMOND & D. R. CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

APPEAL—AFFIRMANCE—DIVIDED COURT.

Where the appellate court is evenly divided, the judgment below stands affirmed.

Appeal from superior court, Chatham county; Winston, Judge.

Action by the town of Durham against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company and the North Carolina Railroad Company. From a judgment, both plaintiff and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Batchelor & Devereux, T. B. Womack, W. W. Fuller, and J. S. Manning, for plaintiff.

D. Schenck, F. H. Busbee, W. A. Guthrie, J. W. Graham, and John Manning, for defendants.

CLARK, J. In this case both the plaintiff and defendants appealed. Mr. Justice Burwell did not sit, and the court is evenly divided. The appeals have now been standing on this docket four terms. Under these circumstances, following the uniform practice of appellate courts in such cases, the judgment below stands, not as a precedent, but as the decision in this case. Marshall, C. J., in Etting v. Bank, 11 Wheat. 59; Taney, C. J., in Benton v. Woolsey, 12 Pet. 27; and in Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet. 540; Bridge Co. v. Stewart, 3 How. 413, 424; Chase, C. J., in U. S. v. Reeside, 19 U. S. (Lawy. Ed.) 391; Durant v. Essex Co., 8 Allen, 103. The appellants will respectively pay the costs, each in their own appeal. Plaintiff's appeal affirmed. Defendants' appeal affirmed.

RALEIGH & W. RY. CO. v. GLENDON & G. MIN. & MANUF'G CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

FOREIGN WILLS—VALIDITY.

As Code, § 2136, requires a will to be subscribed by two witnesses, and section 2156, as amended by Acts 1885, c. 393, allowing the record in this state of a copy of a will proved in another state, provides that the will must be executed according to the laws of this state, and that such fact "must appear affirmatively in the certified probate or exemplification of the will," the fact that a will proved in another state was subscribed by two witnesses must so appear, and a mere recitation in the attestation clause of the will itself is not sufficient.

Appeal from superior court, Chatham county; G. H. Brown, Judge.

Action by the Raleigh & Western Railway Company against the Glendon & Gulf Mining & Manufacturing Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Civil action tried at September term, 1893, of Chatham superior court, before Bynum, J. The right of plaintiff to recover was admitted to depend, among other questions, upon the sufficiency of the probate of the will of Oliver Ditson, an exemplification of which was recorded in Chatham county, to pass the land in dispute. The attestation clause of the will, and the probate in Massachusetts, were as follows:

"Signed, sealed, published, and declared by the aforesaid testator as and for his last will and testament, in the presence of us, who, at his request, and in his presence, and in the presence of each other, have subscribed our names as witnesses hereto. Otis Norcross. Edwin Howland. Grenville Norcross."

"At a probate court holden at Boston, in and for said county of Suffolk, on the 14th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1889, on the petition of Charles H. Ditson, of the city, county, and state of New York, Reuben E. Demmon, and Charles F. Smith, both of said Boston, praying that the instrument therewith presented, purporting to be the last will and testament of Oliver Ditson, late of said Boston, deceased, may be proved and allowed, and letters testamentary issued to them, the executors therein named, without giving a surety, or sureties, on their official bonds, and the heirs at law, next of kin, and all other persons interested having been duly notified, according to the order of court, to appear and show cause, if any they have, against the same, and no party objecting thereto, and it appearing that the said instrument is the last will and testament of said deceased, and was legally executed, and that the said testator was, at the time of making the same, of full age and sound mind, and that said petitioners are competent persons to be appointed to said trust, it is therefore decreed that said instrument be proved, approved, and allowed as the last will and testament of said deceased, and letters testamentary be issued to said petitioners; they first giving bond, without sureties, for the due performance of said trust. John W. McKinn, Judge of Probate Court."

Batchelor & Devereux and T. B. Womack, for appellant. W. A. Guthrie and H. A. London, for appellee.

AVERY, J. The right of plaintiff to recover was dependent upon the competency of the will of Oliver Ditson, which constituted an essential link in its chain of title. The court intimated the opinion that the probate was defective, in that it failed to show affirmatively that the will was executed in accordance with the statutes. Code, §§ 2136, 2156. The first of the sections referred to requires, in explicit and mandatory terms, that "no will or testament shall be good or sufficient, in law, to convey or give any estate, real or personal, unless such will shall have been written in the testator's lifetime, and signed by him, or some other person in his presence and by his direction, and subscribed in his presence by two witnesses at least, no one of whom shall be interested in the devise or bequest except as herein-after provided." The subsequent section, (2156,) as amended by Act 1885, c. 393, allows a properly authenticated copy of a will proved in another state to be recorded in this state, but provides that, "when such will contains any devise or disposition of real estate in this state, such devise or disposition shall not have any validity or operation unless the will is executed according to the laws of this state, and that fact must appear affirmatively in the certified probate or exemplification of the will." It is essential to the sufficiency of a will to pass the property, the title to which is in dispute, that it shall be subscribed in the presence of the testator by two witnesses, at least. Prior to January 1, 1856, the fact of subscription by both witnesses could be shown, on proof in common form, by one of them, (Jenkins v. Jenkins, 96 N. C. 254, 2 S. E. Rep. 522; Moody v. Johnson, 112 N. C. 793, 17 S. E. Rep. 578;) but since that date it must appear that at least two of the witnesses, if living, were examined, or, if one has died, the living witness must testify, not only to the handwriting of the dead witness, but to his subscription, as well as his own, in presence of the testator, (In re Thomas, 111 N. C. 409, 16 S. E. Rep. 226.) Such is the proof prerequisite to sufficiency, where the original record is made in this state. But, where a certified copy from another state has been recorded, we are met by the further plain provision of the statute that the fact of subscribing by at least two witnesses must appear affirmatively "in the certified probate or exemplification of the will." Code, § 2156. The mere recitation in the attestation clause is not affirmative evidence. It is not necessary to discuss or pass upon the other questions raised by the intimations of the judge, the proof of the paper writing purporting to be the will of Ditson being defective. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

v.18s.E.no.9—14

BIRD v. HUDSON et al.

LIBEL—EVIDENCE—QUALIFIED PRIVILEGE—MALICE—HOW PROVED—COMMENT OF COUNSEL—OBJECTIONS NOT RAISED BELOW.

1. An alleged libelous circular charged that plaintiff, the Democratic candidate for tax collector, had requested M., one of the leaders of the Populist party, to help secure plaintiff's nomination on the Populist ticket. Plaintiff testified that he was present at the Populist meeting, but denied that he solicited the nomination, and that M. asked him if he wanted the nomination, and that he told him he would not receive it except from the Democratic party. Held, that such conversation was competent as corroborative of plaintiff's testimony.

2. Testimony of a witness for plaintiff, who was also a candidate for office on the Democratic ticket, that defendant requested him not to support plaintiff, and said that, if witness did support plaintiff, defendant would not vote for witness, was competent to prove defendant's malice towards plaintiff.

3. In an action for slander, defendant may be asked, on cross-examination, if he did not compromise an action by him for slander, for $175, without requiring defendant in that action to retract the charge, as such question is competent as tending to impeach him as a witness to show he had put a low estimate on his own character.

4. Comment of counsel, not objected to when made, cannot be complained of on appeal. Hudson v. Jordan, 12 S. E. Rep. 1029, 108 N. C. 10, followed.

5. Where the circular was a publication of qualified privilege, and charged plaintiff with crime, the language of the circular was properly considered in determining whether defendant was actuated by malice in making it, since in such case plaintiff need not prove malice by extrinsic evidence, but may rely on the words of the libel itself for such proof.

Appeal from superior court, Wayne county; George A. Shuford, Judge.

Action by J. E. Bird against O. J. Hudson and others for libel. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

An alleged libelous circular, published by defendants concerning plaintiff, the Democratic candidate for tax collector, charged that he had requested McCullen, a leading member of the Populist or Third party, to help him secure the nomination for tax collector on that ticket. Plaintiff was offered as a witness in his own behalf, and admitted that he was present at the Third party meeting, but stated that he did not then, or at any other time, try to secure a nomination for tax collector at their hands, and testified as follows: "On the day of said meeting, Mr. McCullen asked if I wanted the nomination for tax collector. I asked him what he meant,—was it with reference to the meeting to be held this P. M.? He said, 'No.' I told him I would not accept the nomination except from the Democratic party." The witness further stated that he did not know at the time whether McCullen was a Democrat or a Populist, but that he had afterwards learned that McCullen had voted the Democratic ticket. To the foregoing conversation with McCullen defendants excepted. J. A. Stevens was introduced as a witness for the plaintiff, and testified as follows: "I was a candidate last year on the Democratic ticket, and the plaintiff, Bird, was a candidate on the same ticket. The defendant O. J. Hudson came to me during the campaign, and asked me not to support Bird as the Democratic nominee. I told him that I would have to support Bird, and he then said that if I did he would not vote for me, or any one else who would vote for Bird." This was offered to show malice. Objected to by defendants, objection overruled, and defendants excepted.

Allen & Dortch, for appellants. W. C. Munroe, for appellee.

CLARK, J. 1. The testimony of the plaintiff touching his conversation with McCullen was competent as corroborative of his testimony on the trial. State v. Whitfield, 92 N. C. 831. There is no exception that the court failed to instruct the jury that they should consider it only in that view, and it will be presumed that proper instructions were given. State v. Powell, 106 N. C. 635, 11 S. E. Rep. 191.

2. The second exception was abandoned, and, as to the third exception, the testimony of Stevens was clearly competent as tending to prove malice. 13 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 431, § 4.

3. The question put to defendant on cross-examination, whether he had not compromised an action for slander for $175, without requiring the defendant to retract the charge of perjury, was an impeaching question. It was competent as tending to impeach him as a witness to show he had put a low estimate on his own character. The witness was properly allowed to explain the matter. It is, however, not every question tending to disparage or disgrace a witness which is competent. The question must be, as in this instance, limited to particular acts; and even then, when it is apparent to the court that it is put merely for the purpose of annoying or harassing the witness, the trial judge may, in his discretion, refuse to compel him to answer. State v. Gay, 94 N. C. 814.

4. The comment of counsel was not objected to at the time, and the objection is lost. State v. Suggs, 89 N. C. 527; State v. Lewis, 93 N. C. 581; State v. Powell, 106 N. C. 635, 11 S. E. Rep. 191; Hudson v. Jordan, 108 N. C. 10, 12 S. E. Rep. 1029.

5. In Ramsey v. Cheek, 109 N. C. 270, 13 S. E. Rep. 775, the law of slander and libel is thus summarized: (1) When the words are actionable per se, unless the matter is privileged, the law presumes malice, and the burden is on the defendant to show that the charge is true. (2) If it is a case of absolute privilege, no action can be maintained, even though it could be shown that the charge was both false and malicious. (3) In a case of qualified privilege the burden is on the plaintiff to prove both the falsity of the charge and that it was made with express malice. Or, to put it more succinctly, if the words are actionable per se in "unprivileged" slander and libel, falsity and malice are prima facie presumed; if "absolutely privileged," falsity and malice are irrebuttably negated; and if it is a case of "qualified privilege," falsity and malice must be proven. In Ramsey v. Cheek, supra, which, like the present, was a case of qualified privilege, (13 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 420, par. 11,) it was further held that in such cases, while the plaintiff must prove both the falsity of the charge and malice, and though the falsity of the charge taken alone, was not sufficient to establish malice without showing further that the defendants knew it to be false, or would have known if they had used the opportunities open to them, yet "the plaintiff is not bound to prove malice by extrinsic evidence. He may rely on the words of the libel itself, and on the circumstances attending its publication, as affording evidence of malice. Odger, Libel & Sland. §§ 277-288; 13 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 431." The instruction now excepted to, that "the language of the circular, which imputes to plaintiff a crime, and alleges that one of the defendants had been damaged by him, may be considered by the jury in finding whether the defendants were actuated by malice in making the publication, is therefore unobjectionable. Bradsher

v. Cheek, 109 N. C. 278, 13 S. E. Rep. 777. There was other evidence of malice, among other that of Stevens which is set out in the third exception. The language of the circular might therefore be properly considered in connection with the other evidence in passing upon the question of malice. Newell, Defam. 770. It should be noted that in cases of qualified privilege, though proof of falsity does not per se raise a presumption of malice, yet proof of malice takes away the protection of privilege, and shifts the burden of proving the truth of the charge upon the defendant. Ransey v. Cheek, 109 N. C. 270, 13 S. E. Rep. 773, and cases cited on page 275, 109 N. C., and page 776, 13 S. E. Rep.

WARD v. WILMINGTON & W. R. CO.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

RAILROAD COMPANIES—KILLING STOCK—OBSTRUCTIONS ON RIGHT OF WAY.

A railroad company must remove bushes or other growth, calculated to obstruct the view of its engineers, to the outer bank of the side ditches, or from all the ground of which it assumes actual dominion for corporate purposes; and if it fails to do so, and a horse is killed by a train because concealed by the bushes, it is liable.

Appeal from superior court, Pender county; Winston, Judge.

Action by E. W. Ward against the Wilmington & Weldon Railroad Company for killing a horse. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant requested the court to charge the jury: "(1) If the jury believe that the engineer, as soon as he could, by looking out and being on the watch, discovered the horse, and then used all the efforts at his command to stop the train, and could not do so in time to keep from striking the horse, then the defendant was not guilty of negligence, and plaintiff could not recover. (2) If the jury believe that the engineer was prevented from seeing the horse, had he been on the careful lookout, by the weeds and bushes growing upon the right of way not in the actual use of the company, and on the side of the road on which the horse was killed, and the horse suddenly emerged therefrom, and got upon the track in front of the approaching train, and the engineer did all he could to prevent the collision, and the horse was killed, then the prima facie case in favor of the plaintiff would be rebutted, and the jury should find the first issue in favor of the defendant." The court gave the second instruction as asked for, but modified the first by adding the following: "But if the jury should find from the testimony that the defendant carelessly and negligently suffered and permitted bushes and weeds to grow on its right of way between the railroad track and the railroad ditch to drain the roadbed, which ditch, in this case, is testified to be in about three or four feet of said track; and if the jury shall further find that said weeds and bushes were tall enough to hide the horse from the engineer, and did hide the same until it was too late to stop the train and prevent the destruction; and if the jury shall, in addition, believe that the horse was killed because he was concealed by the bushes and weeds as aforesaid, and but for the same would not have been killed,—then the defendant was negligent. The defendant is not required to clear the right of way outside of the said drain or ditch, and, if the horse was killed because of being concealed in bushes or weeds growing beyond said limits, the defendant is not negligent."

Haywood & Haywood, for appellant.

AVERY, J. The defendant's engineer testified that the bushes which hid the horse from his view grew "on the inside" of the "railroad drain," and "next to the track." It was held on the former appeal in this case to be the duty of railroad companies to remove such growth, whether of shrubs, trees, or grain, as was calculated to obstruct the view of their engineers, to the outer bank of the side ditches, or from all of the ground of which they assumed actual dominion for corporate purposes. Ward v. Railroad Co., 109 N. C. 358, 13 S. E. Rep. 926; Hinkle v. Railroad Co., 109 N. C. 472, 13 S. E. Rep. 884. In making the addition and qualification of the instruction asked, to which defendant excepted, the judge below stated the law applicable to the testimony of the defendant's witness Knight, and substantially as announced by this court in the opinion referred to. There was therefore no error.

STATE v. THOMPSON.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

PERJURY—INDICTMENT.

An indictment which charges that defendant did unlawfully commit perjury on the trial of an action in a certain court wherein the state was plaintiff and J. was defendant, by falsely asserting an oath in substance as follows, to wit, (setting forth the alleged false testimony,) said defendant knowing the said statements to be false, against the form of the statute, etc., is in compliance with the form prescribed by the act of 1889, and is sufficient.

Appeal from criminal court, New Hanover county; Meares, Judge.

John Thompson was convicted of perjury, and appeals. Affirmed.

The jurors, etc., present that John Thompson, etc., did unlawfully commit perjury upon the trial of an action in the mayor's court in the city of Wilmington, in said county, wherein the state of North Carolina was plaintiff and John Thompson was defendant, by falsely asserting on oath "in substance as follows, to wit: 'About 8 o'clock on the 25th of February I was between Schulkin and Dennis' store. A man passed in about 6 or 7 feet of me, and made an oath. He had a gun in his hand. He walked to the corner, and stood up by a post. In a few minutes a car came up to the end of the switch, and as the man changed the trolley he fired. I am positive the man that fired the gun was Buck Wright. I have known him for some time. I have seen the gun before. Wright left it in my shop to be repaired last Christmas. I put a new spring in it,'—the said John Thompson knowing the said statements to be false against the form of the statute in such cases made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state." The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and the defendant moved in arrest of judgment on the ground that the indictment was not sufficient in its averments to charge the crime of perjury, as it did not specifically charge that the matters alleged to be sworn to were willfully, absolutely, and falsely in a matter material to the point in issue. The motion was denied, and the defendant appealed from the judgment pronounced.

The Attorney General for the State.

BURWELL, J. The averments in the indictment are sufficient. It complies in all essential particulars with the form prescribed by the act of 1889, which has been approved by this court in State v. Gates, 107 N. C. 832, 12 S. E. Rep. 319, and in other cases. Affirmed.

BOYKIN et al. v. WRIGHT.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

APPEAL—TIME OF TAKING—DISMISSAL.

An indorsement on "the case" of acceptance of service, signed by the counsel who represented appellee in the court below, is not, standing alone, a waiver of appellee's right to a dismissal of the appeal because not docketed in the supreme court within the prescribed time.

Appeal from superior court, Sampson county.

Action by Boykin, Carmer & Co. against John C. Wright. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

R. O. Burton, for appellant. W. R. Allen, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The judgment was rendered at February term, 1892, of the superior court. The appeal was docketed in this court March 13, 1893. It appears in the record that the appellees agreed that the appellant might have "thirty days to perfect appeal." Upon "the case" is this indorsement, "Service accepted December 31, 1892," and this is signed by counsel who represented the plaintiffs in the court below. We do not think this indorsement, standing alone, constitutes in any degree a waiver of the appellees' right to insist that the appeal shall be dismissed because not docketed here within the prescribed time. Their motion to dismiss must be allowed. Appeal dismissed.

COX v. GRISHAM.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE—SUMMONS—AMENDMENT.

Where the original summons in an action before a justice to recover personalty fails to state the value, the justice may allow an amendment, under Code, § 840, rule 9, or section 908, giving him power to amend any warrant, process, pleading, or proceeding, either in form or substance, or under section 273, permitting an amendment inserting other allegations material to the case.

Appeal from superior court, Onslow county; Armfield, Judge.

Action commenced before a justice of the peace by O. B. Cox against O. F. Grisham. On appeal from a judgment for plaintiff the action was dismissed, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Batchelor & Devereux, for appellant.

CLARK, J. This was an action for the recovery of a sow and five pigs. The original summons failed to show the value of the property, and the justice allowed a motion to amend the summons by filling in the blank, left for allegation of the value, with the words "ten dollars." The defendant offered no evidence, but, upon judgment being rendered against him, he appealed. In the superior court, the defendant moved to dismiss the action on the ground that the justice had no power to amend the warrant. This motion was erroneously allowed. The justice had ample authority to grant the amendment. Section 908 of the Code provides that a justice of the peace "shall have power to amend any warrant, process, pleading or proceeding" in any action pending before him, either civil or criminal, "either in form or substance." To the same purport is Code, § 840, rule 9; also, section 273, which permits an amendment "inserting other allegations material to the case." The evidence, uncontradicted, being that the value of the property was less than $50, this amendment could have been allowed even after verdict and judgment. Had the averment of value been omitted from the summons, as it doubtless was, by mistake or inadvertence, the amendment could have been allowed even on the trial in the superior court, not to give jurisdiction, but to make it appear by the summons that it had not been improperly exercised. "Such amendment would relate back to the date of the summons. It could not work injustice to the parties, because in fact the jurisdiction existed. It only helped—cured—defective process.” Leathers v. Morris, 101 N. C. 184, 7 S. E. Rep. 783. In State v. Sykes, 104 N. C. 694, 10 S. E. Rep. 191, Merrimon, C. J., says: “Procedure and proceedings before justices of the peace are generally more or less informal and summary. They are favored by every reasonable intendment, and are to be helped by the free exercise of the large powers conferred by the statute (Code, § 906) upon the courts where the action in which they appear may be pending to amend them, as to form or substance, at any time before or after judgment. State v. Smith, 103 N. C. 410, 9 S. E. Rep. 200, and cases there cited.” To same purport are State v. Baker, 106 N. C. 758, 11 S. E. Rep. 360, and State v. Norman, 110 N. C. 484, 14 S. E. Rep. 968.

Error.

WILLIAMS v. COOPER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

WITNESS—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEASED.

1. Under Code Civil Proc. § 590, which provides that “no party shall be examined in his own behalf against the administrator of a deceased person except where the administrator is examined in his own behalf concerning the same transaction,” the administrator of the payee of a bond is competent to prove its execution by defendant, and testifying to such execution renders defendant a competent witness “concerning the same transaction” only.

2. Testimony of an administrator, on cross-examination by defendant, to a transaction concerning which he did not testify in chief, does not render defendant a competent witness concerning such transaction.

Appeal from superior court, Duplin county; Bryan, Judge.

Action by A. F. Williams, as administrator, against Moses Cooper, on bond and note. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. R. Kornegay, for appellant. A. D. Ward, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The plaintiff, administrator and distributee of the payee, was competent to prove the execution of the bond by the defendant. The incompetency attaches only to the surviving party to the transaction. Code, § 590. The representative of the deceased can testify if he so elect, under penalty of making the surviving party a competent witness to the same transaction. Thompson v. Humphrey, 83 N. C. 416. On cross-examination by the defendant, witness stated that he did not know of any payment made by the defendant. The witness was not examined in his own behalf, except in regard to the execution of the note. This rendered the defendant a competent witness only “concerning the same transaction or communication,” by the very terms of the statute. Kesler v. Manney, 89 N. C. 369; Burnett v. Savage, 92 N. C. 11; Sumner v. Candler, Id. 634; Hughes v. Boone, 102 N. C. 137, 9 S. E. Rep. 286; Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. Rep. 1043. Nor could the door be opened wider by defendant cross-examining the witness as to another transaction, to wit, payments on the note as to which the witness was not offered, and did not testify, in chief. To permit this course would be to nullify that portion of the section (590) which restricts the competency of the opposite party when an administrator has been offered as a witness to the “same transaction.” This would become meaningless if the opposite party could, by cross-examining as to other matters, make himself competent as to them, also. No error.

EVANS v. CHAMBERLAIN.

MASTER AND SERVANT—FELLOW SERVANTS—NEGLECT OF MASTER—DEFECTIVE APPLIANCES—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In an action by a brakeman against a railroad company for personal injuries, proof that the cars which plaintiff was coupling were pushed together with undue force by the engineer, so that plaintiff's arm was crushed, was insufficient to make a prima facie case of negligence, as the engineer and brakeman were fellow servants, and there was no evidence that the engineer was employed without due care, or was incompetent.

2. Where the evidence showed that plaintiff, while uncoupling cars, the bumpers on which were apparently in good order, was injured by the cars coming so close together as to crush his arm, and expert testimony tended to show that the accident could not have occurred if the bumpers had been in good repair, a nonsuit for failure of proof was properly refused, as it was an essential duty of the railroad company to its employees to have the bumpers to cars in good repair.

3. An instruction “that if the jury believe the bumper which caused the injury to plaintiff was defective, and had been allowed to remain so by defendant, the plaintiff is entitled to a recovery, even though he may have been able to discover such defects by the use of ordinary care and diligence,” was not erroneous as charging in respect to facts, where the judge gave such charge when considering the question of plaintiff's diligence, and, in considering the cause of the injury, charged that plaintiff should satisfy the jury by a preponderance of evidence that his arm was crushed from defective machinery.

4. Such charge was not erroneous in allowing plaintiff to recover “even though he may have been able to discover such defects by the use of ordinary care and diligence,” as he had the right to assume, without inquiry or examination, that the appliances furnished him were safe.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; J. H. Hudson, Judge.

Action by H. S. Evans against D. H. Chamberlain, as receiver of the South Carolina Railway Company, for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henderson Bros., for appellant. John G. Evans, for respondent.

MCGOWAN, J. The plaintiff was a brakeman on the railway, operated by the defendant as a receiver, and claims that he was injured by the coming together of two bumpers of two freight cars at Branchville on February 4, 1892. The complaint alleges as follows: "That at night, at Branchville, a station on said line of railway, he was engaged in coupling cars on said freight train, which said act was his duty, and within the scope of his employment; that, while making a coupling on said train, it was necessary for plaintiff to use his right hand to hold and place in position the coupling pin; that, while so engaged, the cars were pushed together with undue force by the engineer, and, through the carelessness and wanton negligence of the defendant, a weak, defective, and insecure bumper had been appended to one of said freight cars, which said fact was unknown to the plaintiff; that as soon as the bumpers of the said freight cars came together, by reason of the negligence and carelessness of the defendant, or his agents, in using unnecessary force in pushing said cars, and by reason of said insecure, weak, and defective bumper, said bumper was driven in, and rendered useless, allowing plaintiff's right arm to be caught between the deadblock of one car and the body of the other, thereby breaking, mangling, and rendering the same useless for life; that had it not been for the carelessness and negligence of defendant in using such defective and insecure bumper, and the careless and reckless manner of defendant's agents in pushing said cars together, said injury to plaintiff could not have happened, it being otherwise impossible for said cars to have come together so as to injure plaintiff; that by reason of defendant's negligence, plaintiff has lost the entire use of his right arm, and has been damaged thereby to the reasonable amount of two thousand ($2,000) dollars," etc. These allegations were denied by the receiver, and the issue thus made up came on for trial before his honor, Judge Hudson, and a jury. There was much testimony, which is all printed in the record. When the plaintiff rested, the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury, which was refused, and the case went to the jury. Both parties made requests to charge, but it will not be necessary to consider any of them, except those as to which the appellant alleges error. Under the charge of the judge, the jury found for the plaintiff $1,000 damages, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

"First. That his honor erred in refusing to grant nonsuit on the motion of the defendant, for the reason that the testimony produced by the plaintiff showed an entire failure to prove the alleged cause of action set up by the plaintiff in his complaint against the defendant, and showed an entire failure of proof as to any cause of action against the defendant," etc. As we understand it, the rule is well settled that if, in a law case, there is any pertinent evidence to be considered, the case must go to the jury. In such a case, neither the circuit judge nor this court has the right to weigh conflicting evidence. It is, however, within the province of the circuit judge to determine, in the first instance, whether there is any evidence to go to the jury,—that is to say, whether, regarding the plaintiff's evidence as true, the case, as it stands, is such as to authorize the jury, properly, to find for the plaintiff,—and, if so, the case should go to the jury. Now, taking this as the test, did his honor, the judge, commit error of law in refusing a motion for nonsuit in this case?

1. As to the allegation of the complaint that "the cars were pushed together with undue force by the engineer," etc., we do not think that there was sufficient proof to make a prima facie case of negligence. Besides, if such had been shown, we incline to agree with the judge that the engineer and brakeman were fellow servants, in the sense of the rule upon that subject, and, there being no evidence that the engineer had been employed without due care, or was not competent, that the plaintiff could not recover from the company damages for an injury caused by the negligence of the engineer in managing his engine in the operation of coupling or uncoupling cars in his train.

2. But the judge held that there was some evidence to go to the jury upon the other allegation of the complaint, viz. "that a weak, defective, and insecure bumper had been attached to one of the cars to be coupled or uncoupled, which fact was unknown to the plaintiff," etc. As we consider it, this is a very different matter from mere carelessness on the part of the engineer in managing his engine so as to assist in the operation of uncoupling cars in his train. "While it is true, on the one hand, that a workman or servant, in entering into an employment, by implication, agrees that he will undertake the ordinary risks incident to the service in which he is engaged, including injuries from fellow servants, it is also true, on the other hand, that the employer or master impliedly contracts that he * * * will also take due precaution to adopt and use such machinery, apparatus, tools, appliances, and means as are suitable and proper for the prosecution of the business in which his servants are engaged, with a reasonable degree of safety to life, and security against injury," etc. See Hooper v. Railroad Co., 21 S. C. 546. It thus appears that it is one of the essential contract duties of a railroad company, as such, to furnish all employees with safe and suitable appliances to perform the work in which they are engaged; and this certainly includes bumpers to cars, in good repair, one object of which, as we suppose, is to prevent collision, by keeping the bodies of the cars at a certain distance from each other. In the line of his duty, the plaintiff was required to uncouple cars at Branchville, to be left there. No defect in the bumpers was apparent. The plaintiff made an effort to uncouple, and in doing so had to use his right hand, and at that instant the cars came so close together that his right arm was crushed before the rebound of the cars. There was testimony of experts tending to show that such could not have been the result if the bumpers on the cars had been sound, and in good repair. We cannot say that the trial judge committed error of law in refusing to grant the nonsuit.

"Second. That his honor erred in charging the jury as requested by the plaintiff's attorney in his third request to charge, as follows: 'That if the jury believe the bumper which caused the injury to the plaintiff was defective, and had been allowed to remain so by the defendant, the plaintiff is entitled to a recovery, even though he may have been able to discover such defects by the use of ordinary care and diligence,'—for it is submitted that the charge was erroneous, in charging upon a question of fact, viz. that the bumper caused the injury, and was further erroneous in this: that if the plaintiff could discover the alleged defect as well as the defendant, and did not do so, he could not recover, under the law," etc.

1. We do not think that the judge charged "in respect to facts," in saying "that if the jury believe that the bumper which caused the injury to plaintiff was defective," etc. When the expression fell from the judge, he was not considering the question as to what inflicted the injury, but whether the plaintiff should be precluded from recovering if he could, by ordinary care and diligence, have discovered the defects alleged to exist. There was no conflict of testimony, or even a contention, as to injury to the plaintiff, or as to where it was received. Besides, in determining whether the circuit judge has committed error of law in his instructions to the jury, the charge must be considered as a whole; and, considered in this light, the defendant certainly had no cause to complain of the charge. After a full and clear statement, the judge said: "Bear in mind you must determine from all the evidence whether that arm was broken from defective machinery. The plaintiff has so alleged, and the burden of proof is upon him, and he must satisfy you by the preponderance of the evidence that it is so; and if he does not, then the evidence is wanting, and the case should fail. If you come to the conclusion that the evidence does not show that the machinery was broken, but the arm was broken by the want of proper skill on the part of the plaintiff, then the company is not responsible," etc. See Hume v. Insurance Co., 23 S. C. 190.

2. But the defendant further insists that the judge should have charged that if the plaintiff could have discovered the alleged defect as well as the defendant, and did not do so, he could not recover, under the law. This view would emasculate the fundamental rule that it is incumbent upon the master to furnish safe and suitable appliances for the employe. As was said by the chief justice in delivering the judgment of the court in the case of Carter v. Oil Co., 34 S. C. 215, 13 S. E. Rep. 419: "The rule is that it is the duty of the master, and not of the servant, to exercise due care and diligence to ascertain whether the appliances furnished are safe and suitable; and a servant has a right to assume, without inquiry or examination, that the appliances furnished him are safe and suitable. Lasure v. Manufacturing Co., 18 S. C. 281. Of course, if he uses a machine or other appliance, knowing at the time that it is out of repair to such an extent as to render it unsafe, then another rule applies, with certain qualifications, which it is needless to state here," etc. We have carefully considered the case of Grant v. Railroad Co., 133 N. Y. 657, 31 N. E. Rep. 220, cited and relied on by defendant's counsel. While, at first view, there does seem to be some analogy between that case and this, we think that, upon a close examination, it will be found to be more seeming than real. In the New York case the plaintiff, an employe of the defendant, was at work upon one of three coal cars standing on a trestle. Two other loaded cars were being pushed upon the same trestle by a locomotive to which they were attached by a drawbar, which was slightly bent. When they approached the three cars, steam was reversed, the engine stopped, and the drawhead of the first car, to which the drawbar was attached, broke, and the two cars ran into the cars standing on the trestle with such force as to push them over the end of it, and the plaintiff was injured. There was a verdict for the plaintiff. It was not denied that the breaking of the drawhead was the cause of the injury, and the question was whether the fracture was made by the slight bend in the drawbar, or by some possible latent defect in the drawhead of the car. The court, saying, among other things, "that it appears almost beyond doubt that the deviation of the drawbar from a straight line had no effect whatever in producing the result," held as follows: "Where, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, it appears that there were two or more possible causes of the injury, for one or more of which the defendant was not responsible, the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show by evidence that the injury was wholly or partly the result of a cause for which the defendant is responsible. If the evidence leaves it just as probable that the injury was the result of one cause as of the other, the plaintiff cannot recover," etc. Now in this case, it seems that there was no breaking, as to which a question might arise as to "a latent defect;" but the circuit judge placed the whole case upon the question of fact, whether the bumper was defective, and caused the injury. In charging, he said: "Bear in mind you must determine whether, from all the evidence, that arm was broken from defective machinery. The plaintiff has so alleged, and the burden of proof is upon him, and he must satisfy you by the preponderance of the evidence that it is so." etc. We cannot doubt that under this charge the jury found solely upon the allegation that the injury was caused by the defective bumper, being a cause for which the company was responsible. In a law case, this court cannot review the testimony, with the purpose of granting a new trial for the want of sufficient evidence. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

WILLS—SIGNING BY ANOTHER—WITNESSES.

1. Under Gen. St. § 1854, providing that a will shall be signed by testatrix, or by another person in her presence, and by her express directions, and shall be attested and signed by three or more witnesses, the person signing for testatrix may sign as a witness.

2. If the whole conversation between testatrix and the one signing for her amounted to an express declaration that he should sign the will, this would satisfy the requirement that it should be done by her express direction.

3. Where the person directed to sign the will for testatrix subscribed her name to it before coming into her presence and that of the witnesses, but, when in her presence and that of the witnesses, wrote beneath her name his name, preceded by the word "by" and followed by the words "by request," he sufficiently signed for testatrix in her presence and that of the witnesses.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

On petition of B. E. Leonard, as executor of Emeline Bowen, deceased, her will was admitted to probate, and Albert Dial and others appeal. Affirmed.

Haskell & Dial and W. H. Martin, for appellants. H. J. Haynsworth, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. On August 16, 1890, Emeline Bowen, widow, departed this life. On September 6th thereafter a paper writing, purporting to be her last will and testament, was filed in the office of the probate judge of Laurens county, who admitted the same to probate in common form, and on October 20, 1891, Albert Dial and others, the heirs and distributees of deceased, if she died intestate, filed their petition that Benjamin E. Leonard, the party producing said paper, be required to prove the same in due form of law on or before November 15th thereafter. On November 11, 1891, said Leonard filed his petition accordingly, and on June 23, 1892, the matter came on for a hearing in the probate court, and, after hearing the testimony of the subscribing witnesses and others, both for and against the said will, the probate judge filed his decree admitting the same to probate in due form of law, whereupon Albert Dial, Elizabeth Teague, and others appealed to the court of common pleas of the said county. At the February term of the court thereafter the proceedings on appeal came on for a hearing before his honor Judge Norton, who submitted two questions to the jury: (1) Was the paper duly executed as a will? (2) Was Mrs. Emeline Bowen, at the time of executing the will, competent to make a will? On these issues of will or no will there was much testimony, covering nearly 100 pages of printed matter, reported by the stenographer, as it fell from the witnesses, and of course it cannot be restated here; but, in order to make the points intelligible, it will be necessary to make a short and condensed statement of facts as developed. It appeared that Mrs. Bowen, the testatrix, was very sick with what was called "typhoid fever," and that about noon of August 16, 1890, she asked her attending physician, Dr. S. S. Knight, to prepare her will for her, and gave him minute instructions as to how she wished it drawn, of which the doctor took rough notes. Among other things, she asked him if it would not do for him to sign her will for her, as she was so nervous, to which he replied that he thought so. Later the doctor drafted the will, and, as he testifies, he first prepared it to be signed by "a mark," by leaving a blank space, and writing "her mark" above and below respectively. It is not very clear whether he then wrote the name of "Emeline Bowen" in preparing for the mark, but we think it probable that he did. After having done this, the doctor says he concluded that it would be best not to sign with "a mark," and so erased the words "her mark." About twilight he procured two other witnesses, and went to Mrs. Bowen's room, which was lighted by a lamp. He then produced the paper, and told Mrs. Bowen that it was her will, and was ready to be executed. He recalled to her attention what she had said about signing the will, by asking her, "Shall I sign the will for you?" to which she answered "yes," and he signed the will for her. It is not quite clear whether he did this by writing then all the words "Emeline Bowen. By S. S. Knight, by request," or whether, the name "Emeline Bowen" having been previously written in preparing the will for "a mark," and not having been erased, the signing was merely by writing under the name "Emeline Bowen" the other words, "By S. S. Knight, by request." Then each of the witnesses in turn signed the paper, including Dr. Knight, who signed the paper for the deceased. All this was done in the presence of the testatrix, who was lying in bed, with her face towards the little table in the room, on which the paper rested, in full view of all who chose to use their senses. Mrs. Bowen died on the next day night, within 30 hours after the signing of the paper. After a full and careful charge, the jury found both issues of fact referred to them in the affirmative,—that Mrs. Bowen was competent to make a will, and that the will was executed according to law. The contestants did not except to the finding on the second issue, that Mrs. Bowen was competent to make a will, and therefore that issue goes out of the contest; but they did except to the finding on the first issue, as to the manner of the alleged execution of the paper propounded as a will, and moved for a new trial, which was refused; and then the whole issues involved came on to be heard by the presiding judge, who, after argument, held and decreed as follows: "The parties seeking to set aside the probate of the will raise and urge the following propositions before me now: 'First. That the witness S. S. Knight is not a competent witness, as he signed the name of the testatrix to the paper propounded as a will. Second. That the will was not signed by S. S. Knight in the presence of testatrix. Third. That the will was not signed by her express direction. Fourth. The signature of testatrix not having been made in her presence, was the signing of S. S. Knight's signature under hers a sufficient ratification of any previous instructions to sign for her?' I am of opinion that the three first propositions are not well taken, and are overruled. As to the fourth and last proposition I am in doubt, rather inclining to sustain the position; but, as the effect would be to grant a new trial, I prefer that the supreme court pass upon this question, as in that event the case would be ended one way or the other, and therefore the motion to set aside the probate of the will is refused, and the appeal dismissed."

From this judgment the contestants appeal to this court upon numerous exceptions, 14 in number, which are all printed in the brief; but, following the good example of the appellants' attorney, we think that they all may be considered under four general propositions, urged in the argument below to set aside the verdict of the jury and refuse probate of the will, which have already been stated in the judgment of the court. The power to direct during life how one's property shall go after death is certainly a great privilege. As was said by the court in Means v. Means, 5 Strob. 190: "The right to make a will is especially valuable to the old and infirm. Their thoughts dwell most upon posthumous arrangements, and in this right they have the means, not only of gratifying their feelings, but of securing substantial advantages while they live," etc. In order to protect this valued right against fraud and imposition, the law has prescribed for the execution of wills peculiar formalities, which must be observed. Section 1854 of the General Statutes declares that "all wills and testaments of real and personal property shall be in writing, and signed by the party so devising the same, or by some other person in his presence, and by his express directions, and shall be attested and subscribed, in the presence of the said devisor, and of each other, by three or more credible witnesses, or else they shall be utterly void and of no effect." The words of this law which are in point here are identical with those in the old English statute of frauds, and have often received construction which may throw light on the inquiry here. Mrs. Bowen, the testatrix, did not sign the paper propounded as her will, but the law allowed her to execute a will, "signed by another person in her presence, and by her express directions, attested and signed by three or more subscribing witnesses in the presence of the devisor and of each other," etc.

1. The first objection to the execution is that, "as Knight signed the name of the testatrix to the paper propounded as her will, he was not a competent witness to attest her will as one of the subscribing witnesses required by law." At first some of us thought it rather an anomalous proceeding for a witness to attest a signing by himself, but Mr. Jarman explains that such a witness does not attest the signing merely, but also the directions given to sign; but, at all events, the authorities concur that, under the circumstances stated, the signer of the will is competent as one of the three subscribing witnesses required by law. See 1 Jarm. Wills, 204; Schouler, Wills, 338; Redf. Wills, 209. Mr. Redfield says: "Both the earlier and present English statute, and most of those in force in this country, allow the testator's signature to be made by some other person, if made in the presence of the testator, and by his express direction. Under this clause of the statute, it has been held that this act may be done by one of the witnesses. Indeed, it is the law in some of the states that one who has signed for the testator, at his request, must write his name as witness to the will." We think there was no error here.

2. The second proposition is that Mrs. Bowen did not give Doctor Knight "express directions" to sign her will for her. The judge charged that it was a question of fact, to be decided by the jury; saying that the "plaintiffs' attorney contended that Mrs. Bowen need not have said in articulate words, "Doctor Knight, you must sign that paper for me;" and that is the right contention. It is sufficient if the whole conversations that occurred between the testatrix and Dr. Knight amounted to an express declaration, it should be construed into "an express direction" to sign the paper." As we understand it, a simple question and answer may amount to a declaration. We cannot suppose that the word "express" was intended to be limited necessarily to an expression in words. We take it that one perfectly dumb, and unable to speak a word, may in some way indicate his desire, so as to come within the provision of the law, as to giving direction; as some one has tersely put it, "a direction in fact, but not in words." But, taking both conversations of the parties together,—that of the afternoon, when Dr. Knight was requested to write the will, and that at night, when they were about to execute it,—we think that the judge committed no error on this point. There is no evidence that Dr. Knight was a volunteer in the matter.

3. The next proposition is that "the will was not signed in the presence of Mrs. Bowen, the testatrix, and the signing of S. S. Knight's name under hers was not a sufficient ratification of any previous instructions to sign for her." The judge charged: "If you find that S. S. Knight did not write or sign Mrs. Bowen's name to the paper propounded as her will in her presence, then it was not duly executed, under the law, unless he then and there adopted it by signing his name as agent in the presence of the other witnesses." Under the charge the jury must have found that Knight wrote the words "By S. S. Knight, by request," under the name of "Emeline Bowen," already in the will, thereby adopting the name previously written by himself, and that this was done at the time the will was executed, in the presence of the testatrix and the witnesses. Assuming, then, that the name of the testatrix was written on the will in the afternoon, and not rewritten at the time of execution, it is very clear that her written name, no matter when or where made, was not an accomplished act, but only preparatory to something else, to give it vitality. At first the appending of "her mark" by Mrs. Bowen was intended, which would certainly have adopted it, no matter when written, but afterwards changed to "another person signing for her by request." Standing alone, it was a perfect nullity, and might have been stricken out, as a word incorrectly used. As it seems to us, it is not a question of ratification by Mrs. Bowen, for she did not know that in preparing her will her name had been written in it, but rather a question of adoption by Knight, as a part of his signing by request. Neither the law nor the testatrix directed Knight how he was to sign, and we cannot see why he might not adopt her name, previously written by himself, as he could then have run his pen through the name, and have rewritten it then and there. But if in this we are in error, if, from the nature of the subject, Knight could not adopt the name of Mrs. Bowen, standing on the draft of the will, so as to be a compliance with the law, which requires that the signing by "another person" must be in the presence of the testator, etc., was it indispensable to the execution that the "other person" deputed to sign for Mrs. Bowen should, in doing so, set out her name? It will be observed that the law does not so require, and, as it seems, the signing by "another person" is not confined only to the name of the testatrix. All the authorities agree that a will may be executed without the name of the deviser appearing on its face. It has often been decided that a mark, without the name itself, is sufficient, and, of course, the initials of testator's name would also suffice, (see Ray v. Hill, 3 Strob. 303, and Adams v. Chaplin, 1 Hill, Eq. 265;) and the will may be signed by another person for the testator. "That 'other person,' as it seems, may be one of the witnesses, and it is immaterial that he signed his own name, instead of the name of the testator; and, when the testator directed a person to sign the will for him, which that person did by writing at the foot 'This will was read and approved by C. F. B., by C. C., in the presence of,' etc., and then followed the signature of the witnesses, the will was held good," etc. The following form of subscription is sufficient: "E. N., for R. D., at her request." "So, also, where the testator's name was subscribed, at his request, by one of the subscribing witnesses." See 1 Jarm. Wills, p. 79, and Redf. Wills, 205, and numerous cases in the notes; and also 1 Williams, Ex'rs, p. 83. But, be this as it may, we cannot say it was error to hold that, under the authority given him by the testatrix to sign for her, S. S. Knight sufficiently signed for her on Sunday night, at the time the will was executed, in the presence of the testatrix and of the subscribing witnesses.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and the case be remanded to the probate court of Laurens county, for such further proceedings as may be deemed proper and necessary to carry out the conclusions herein announced.

KAUFFMAN MILLING CO. v. STUCKEY.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 20, 1893.)

SALE—SPECIAL GUARANTY—BREACH—RESCISSON.

A breach of a special guaranty by a seller of flour "that the flour sold would give satisfaction to the customers of the purchaser" does not give the purchaser any greater rights against the seller than would a simple breach of a warranty implied by law, and does not authorize a rescission of the contract of sale.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Action by the Kauffman Milling Company against J. K. Stuckey for the price of goods sold and delivered to defendant. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duncan & Sanders, for appellant. Bomar & Simpson, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. This case has been in this court before, (see 37 S. C. 8, 18 S. E. Rep. 192,) where all the facts will be found stated. The complaint alleged that it was a corporation doing business in the city of St. Louis, Mo., and that on or about October 24, 1888, the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendant on account 25 barrels of flour of the brand Victoria, at $5.05 per barrel, and 25 barrels of flour of the brand Gem, at $4.75 per barrel, which the defendant agreed to pay therefor; that the defendant has paid the freight on said flour, viz. $40.50; and that there is due and owing from the defendant to the plaintiff on said account the sum of $204.50, etc. The defendant admitted the principal allegations, but made defense that the flour was purchased by sample, and did not come up to the sample, and, after he had sold a number of the barrels, (14,) he offered to return it, or keep it at a reduced price, which offers were duly refused by the plaintiff. The plaintiff had a verdict for $185.50, but upon appeal this court granted a new trial for error in regard to the admission of certain testimony, etc. After the case went back, the defendant, by permission of the court, amended his answer, setting up the following defenses, to wit: "(1) That the flour was sold to him by sample; (2) that it was sold to him as good, sound, merchantable flour, for the purpose of being sold to his customers for bread-stuff for family use, and under the special agreement that it would give satisfaction to his customers; (3) that relying upon this guaranty, and believing it to be sound and good flour, he hauled it to his store, and offered it for sale; (4) that the flour did not come up to the sample, was unfit for the purposes for which it was bought, was not 'a sound, merchantable flour,' was unfit for family use, and failed to come up to the guaranty given by plaintiff; (5) that as soon as he ascertained that it was not giving satisfaction, was unfit for family use, and not a sound, merchantable flour, he tendered it back to plaintiff." Under the pleadings as amended, the case was tried before Judge Norton and a jury. Several counterclaims were pleaded, as in the first trial, but, from the view taken, it will not be necessary to consider them here. There was much testimony upon all the issues. There were also requests to charge on both sides. The judge, among other things, charged as follows: "So, gentlemen, the sum and substance of the charge I have given you is this: If you think there was no defect in the flour, then you ought to find for the plaintiff the full amount of his bill under the contract, which is admitted. The price is admitted, less the amount paid for freight that is set out in the complaint. That is the plaintiff's case as he made it. You ought to find the plaintiff's case as he states it in his complaint, if there was no defect in the flour, and if it did not fail to come up to the implied warranty, or the special warranty made on its sale. If you do think that it did not come up to either of these warranties, or failed to come up to both of them, then you will make your calculation as to what you think the value of the flour was, taking into consideration what the contract price was, and give, after deducting the amount that was paid for freight, a verdict for the plaintiff for the value, taking the contract price as the basis of value, to see what proportion you ought to deduct from the contract price. If you think, however, from the evidence, that the flour was of no value at all, then you could only give the plaintiff judgment for so much of the flour as was actually sold by Mr. Stuckey, as he would have no right to take even a worthless article of the plaintiff, and sell it, and then defend himself by saying that it was worthless, but he must account for the proceeds of the sale. You would still have to deduct from that the amount of the freight, and find for the plaintiff or the defendant, whichever had the balance in his favor, after making that calculation," etc. Under this charge, the jury again found for the plaintiff, $106. From this judgment the defendant again appeals to this court, upon numerous exceptions, (14 in number,) which are all printed in the record, and need not be set out here.

As far as we are able to see, there is really but one new point made, all the others having been decided in the first trial of the case, and, as we understand it, the point claimed to be still open may be expressed in the following proposition: "That the additional allegation in the amended answer of the defendant claiming that at the time of the sale a special guaranty was verbally made to the following effect, 'That the flour sold would give satisfaction to the customers of the purchaser,' and that guaranty having been broken, the rights of the defendant are now greater than they were at the first trial, under a simple breach of a warranty implied by law, which alone was considered at that time," etc. Passing by the vagueness of the alleged special guaranty,—"satisfactory to the customers,"—and assuming that it was made and breached, as claimed, we do not see how that could alter the character of the contract, so as to make it a conditional sale. On the contrary, it still remained a warranty, possibly a little different from the ordinary warranty of soundness implied by law, but still a warranty, as to which the remedy was damages for its breach, unless the facts authorized the party to rescind, and, as a consequence, to return the property. This is the right which the defendant so strenuously claims, and which was denied him at the first trial. It was then and there held, both upon reason and authority, "that the defendant had no right to rescind, unless (1) there was an agreement at the time he purchased that, if the flour did not come up to sample, (or, as we suppose, warranty,) he could return it; or (2) where there has been fraud; or (3) where there has been an entire failure of consideration," etc. It is not now claimed, under the amended answer and the allegation of the special guaranty, that there was any such agreement as to returning the property. Upon this subject there is a total absence of proof as at the first trial. Nor was there any proof of fraud at either trial. It may have been incidentally argued that there was an entire failure of consideration by regarding the sale of the 14 barrels as necessary, merely to test the quality of the flour in the other barrels, which were in the store, "unopened and unsampled." We cannot accept this view, and concur with the judge when he charged: "If you think, however, from the evidence, that the flour was of no value at all, then you could only give the plaintiff judgment for so much of the flour as was actually sold by Mr. Stuckey, as he would have no right to take even a worthless article of the plaintiff and sell it, and then defend himself by saying it was worthless, but he must account for the proceeds of sale," etc. In the language of Judge Evans, speaking for the court in the case of Carter v. Walker, 2 Rich. Law, 48: "As the jury have found that the property was of value, and there was no allegation of fraud in the sale, the defendant was not entitled to rescind the contract. He was entitled to an abatement in the price, and that the jury have allowed, and therefore the motion for a new trial must be dismissed." The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

RUFF et al. v. ELKIN et al.

JUDGMENT — COLLATERAL ATTACK — RETURN ON SUMMONS — IMPEACHMENT — ORDER OF SALE — AMENDMENT.

1. On a proceeding to partition land among heirs, P., who claimed the land adversely on the ground that a foreclosure by which his title was divested was invalid, was made a party; it being agreed that his claim should be determined therein, and that he should "have the right to introduce any evidence and make any point in his defense which he could introduce or make in any action which he might bring to set aside" the judgment in the foreclosure proceedings. The sheriff's return in such previous proceedings was to the effect that there was personal service on P., then an infant under 14 years of age. Held, that the sheriff and P. were properly allowed, in the partition proceeding, to give evidence contradicting such return.

2. An order rendered in a foreclosure proceeding for the sale of a tract of land cannot be amended at a subsequent term, without a rehearing, so as to include another and additional tract.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Fairfield county; James Aldrich, Judge.

Proceeding by Silas W. Ruff and others against Carrie G. Elkin, Henry L. Parr, and others, to partition certain land, and to determine title thereto. From a judgment in favor of defendant Parr, the other parties appeal. Affirmed.

J. G. McCants, for appellants. McDonald, Douglass & Obeare, for defendants, appellants. Ragsdale & Ragsdale, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. The parties in this case are very numerous, and the facts somewhat complicated, so that it will promote clearness to make a short preliminary statement:

Many years ago, one James Elkin, of Fairfield county, died, leaving a will, by which, among other things, he devised a certain tract of land, containing 181 acres, to his son, William B. Elkin, on the express condition, that, in case he should die without heirs of his body, the said land should be divided between his daughters, Mary Ann Elkin and Judith M. Ruff, and to their issue or children, forever, etc. The life tenant went into possession, and some time before 1858 some proceeding was instituted in the old court of equity to sell the land, and change the investment; and Chancellor Dargan granted a decretal order that the land should be sold upon a credit, except as to costs, for 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 years; the purchaser "to give bond and good personal security, and a mortgage of the premises, to secure the purchase money." One Henry W. Parr became the purchaser, and complied with the terms of sale by giving to W. R. Robertson, then the commissioner in equity for Fairfield, a bond for the purchase money, with personal sureties,—R. W. Coleman and John Yarborough,—and secured the same by a mortgage of the premises sold, viz. the Elkin land, consisting of 181 acres. It seems that the said purchaser, Parr, also executed another mortgage to Coleman, one of his sureties on the aforesaid bond to the commissioner, in order to save harmless and indemnify the said Coleman from any loss by reason of his suretyship upon the bond aforesaid. This latter mortgage was on another tract of land of the said Parr, and generally known as the "Montgomery Land," 581 acres, being the tract now in dispute. Matters seem to have remained in this condition during the war, and down to 1876, when the mortgagor, Parr, died intestate, possessed of some personalty and several tracts of land, and leaving, as his only heir and distributee, an infant son, Henry L. Parr, then under seven years of age, who is the party named in this case as a defendant. Soon after the death of Parr, the father, William B. Elkin, the life tenant, obtained letters of administration upon the estate of Henry W. Parr; and on May 26, 1877, a suit on the equity side of the court was commenced in the name of Samuel B. Clawney, as clerk of the court, (who had succeeded to the rights of Robertson, as commissioner in equity,) against Henry L. Parr, the infant son of the mortgagor, Henry W. Parr, deceased, to foreclose the two mortgages above described,—both that of the Elkin land, to Robertson, as commissioner, and that of the Montgomery land, to Coleman, as surety. The legal proceedings in this case, seeming to be regular on their face, and neither W. B. Elkin, as administrator, nor the guardian ad litem of the infant, Parr, making any objection, proceeded to judgment; but as to the legality, force, and effect of which, we will have occasion to consider hereafter. (1) The order of sale under this judgment of Judge Mackey, May 9, 1877, included only the original Elkin land, under the mortgage to the commissioner, which the sheriff reported that he sold to one Murphy for $726, and the same was confirmed by the court. (2) On October 29, 1877, Judge Kershaw passed an order purporting to amend the original order of sale by adding to it the Montgomery tract of land, which seems to have been conveyed by the sheriff on December 3, 1877, for the consideration of $1,995 expressed in the sheriff's deed; reciting that the land had been sold on that day, viz. December 3, 1877, under Judge Mackey's order of May 9, 1877, (then amended,) to W. B. Elkin, "to hold the same in accordance with the provisions and limitations contained in the will of James Elkin, deceased,"—that is to say, to hold the land himself for life, etc.

On April, 1890, W. B. Elkin died without issue; and thus the event upon which the remainders over in the original devise were to take effect had occurred. At that time the two persons, viz. Mary A. Elkin and Judith W. Ruff, who were named as the first takers in remainder, were dead, but leaving numerous children and grandchildren, who, together, were about to institute proceedings to partition among themselves the Montgomery tract of land, in the view that, by sale under the foreclosure decree in the case of Samuel B. Clawney, as clerk of the court, v. Henry L. Parr and W. B. Elkin, as administrator of Henry W. Parr, deceased, said tract had been substituted for that devised in the Elkin will. At the same time, Henry L. Parr, having attained his majority, and claiming that the sale in foreclosure, under which that tract purported to have been sold, was irregular, illegal, and absolutely void, as to him, was about to institute proceedings for the establishment of his rights thereto. Under these circumstances, and in order to facilitate the effort to ascertain the rights of the different parties, they mutually entered into the following agreement: "Whereas, the children of Judith W. Ruff and of Mary A. Elkin claim the said [Montgomery] tract of land, and are now instituting proceedings to partition the same among themselves; and whereas, the said Henry L. Parr is in the possession of the said tract of land, claiming to be the owner thereof in fee, and is about to institute proceedings for the establishment of his rights thereto; and whereas, it will facilitate matters to have all issues settled in one action,—it is agreed: (1) That the said Henry L. Parr shall be joined as a party defendant in the action for partition among the children of Judith W. Ruff and Mary A. Elkin, deceased. (2) That the issues between the said parties respecting the ownership of, and the right to, the said tract of land, shall be submitted to the court and a jury, and the said parties, the children of Mrs. Ruff and Mary A. Elkin, shall have the opening and the reply. (3) [Substituted.] That the defendant Henry L. Parr shall have the right to introduce any evidence and make any point in his defense which he could introduce or make in any action which he might bring to set aside the said judgment of Samuel B. Clawney, as clerk, v. Henry L. Parr and William B. Elkin, as administrator, or in any direct proceeding which he might institute to vacate or set aside said judgment," etc.

In pursuance of this agreement, the circuit judge submitted to the jury the following issue: "Is Henry L. Parr the owner in fee of the land described in the complaint?" Upon this issue the plaintiffs offered in evidence the judgment roll in the case of Clawney, clerk, v. Henry L. Parr and W. B. Elkin, administrator, filed on May —, 1877, and certified copy of deed of Sheriff Ruff to William B. Elkin, made under said proceedings. From the record it appeared that the summons was in the usual form, and had indorsed the following acceptance: "I accept service of the summons and complaint as guardian of Henry L. Parr, at Alston, S. C. [Signed] W. B. Elkin." And there was the following affidavit of service:

"R. F. Martin, being duly sworn, says, that he served the summons and complaint in this action on the defendants by delivering to them, personally, and leaving with them, copies of the same, at Alston, S. C., on the 29th day of March, 1877, and that he knew the persons so served to be the ones mentioned and described in the summons as Henry L. Parr and William B. Elkin, the defendants therein; and the deponent is not a party to the action. R. F. Martin.

"Sworn to before me March 13, 1877. S. B. Clawney, Clerk."

Notice of the application for the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the infant defendant, Henry L. Parr, was also served on the said William B. Elkin at the same time and place. The plaintiffs then rested.

Then Henry L. Parr, over objections, offered testimony impeaching the record, and tending to show that personal service of the summons was never made, as alleged, upon him, who was then an infant under the age of seven years. He testified positively that no paper in the case was ever personally served upon him, and that he really did not know that there was any such case until years afterwards. And the deputy sheriff, Martin, also testified that the service was not actually made upon the infant Parr, but upon William B. Elkin, who claimed to be his guardian; the infant, however, being present at the time, etc.

The attorney of Parr made 11 requests to charge, which are long, and, all being printed in the brief, need not be restated here. Among other things, the judge charged: "Now, you have in this case the return of the deputy sheriff, in which he states that he served the summons and complaint in this action on the defendants by delivering to them, personally, and leaving with them, copies of the same, at Alston, on March 29, 1877, and that he knows the persons so served to be the ones mentioned and described in the summons and complaint as Henry L. Parr and William B. Elkin. That is a paper,—a written instrument. It is my duty to construe that paper. There is nothing hidden about that paper. It is a plain, outspoken affidavit that he served Henry L. Parr personally, and upon its face it is regular. That being the law, and it being my duty to instruct you, I charge you that that service was according to law, and that Henry L. Parr was personally served. But it would be manifestly unjust if a sheriff or deputy sheriff could, by making a false return, bind a party,—in this case, Henry L. Parr,—when, as a matter of fact, he never served him personally. Therefore, the law is that while that affidavit on the record, coming, as it does, from an officer of the court,—nothing else appearing,—is presumed to be correct, yet, when it is attacked, it may be shown to be incorrect or false. In this case they have undertaken to attack that affidavit of Martin. Now, I can't charge you as to what the facts were. You have heard the testimony of Mr. Parr, in which he states as to the failure to serve the summons and complaint on him. You have heard the testimony of Mr. Martin in regard to what he did,—what he now says about the matter. Well, I cannot comment on that. I do not mean to say, though, that the jury are restricted to determine the issues whether Mr. Martin, when he made that affidavit, perjured himself,—told a willful falsehood,—or made an unintentional mistake. You heard his testimony; and the question for you to pass upon now is not whether Mr. Martin was guilty of perjury, or whether he made a mistake. The question is, did he serve these papers on Henry L. Parr? If he made a personal service, then that is all, so far as that issue is concerned. If he failed to serve them personally, then this judgment, and the sale under it, never divested the rights of Henry L. Parr," etc. Under this charge, the jury found, affirmatively, that Henry L. Parr was the owner, in fee simple, of the Montgomery tract of land. Thereupon, the other parties moved for a new trial on the minutes of the court, which was refused, and they then moved that his honor would "proceed to adjust the equities of the parties;" and this, also, being refused, the judge delivered his decree, affirming the verdict of the jury, and dismissing the complaint as against Henry L. Parr, with leave to plaintiffs to apply to the court for such action as they may deem proper, and the law will permit, to revive the action against W. B. Elkin, as administrator.

From this final judgment, the appeal comes to this court upon the following exceptions: "(1) That his honor erred in allowing R. F. Martin, deputy sheriff, to testify in contradiction to his affidavit of service of summons and complaint in Clawney, clerk, v. Henry L. Parr and W. B. Elkin. (2) That his honor erred in allowing Martin, deputy sheriff, to testify as to his recollections and impressions as to the service of the summons and complaint in Clawney, clerk, v. Parr and Elkin, in contradiction of his affidavit indorsed on said summons. (3) That his honor erred in charging that there must have been a manual delivery of the summons in the case of Clawney, clerk, v. Parr and Elkin. (4) That his honor erred in charging the requests of defendant Henry L. Parr, numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11. (5) That his honor erred in charging the jury upon the question of chilling the biddings at the sale under the judgment aforesaid, when there was no evidence in the case to warrant the charge. (6) That his honor erred in charging the jury as to fraud on the part of the Ruffs and Elkins, being parties to this action, in procuring the "judgment in the aforesaid case of Clawney, clerk, v. Parr and Elkin, administrator, when there was no testimony showing that they were parties to said action. (7) That his honor erred in charging the jury upon the general question of fraud in, and payment of, the judgment of Clawney, clerk, v. Parr and Elkin, as there was no evidence to warrant such a charge. (8) That his honor erred in holding that it was necessary to have a legal representative of the estate of Henry W. Parr before the court, before he could adjudicate the equities between the parties, when it appeared from the undisputed testimony that a legal and valid judgment had already been obtained and entered against the estate of Henry W. Parr, deceased, in the case of Clawney, clerk, v. Henry L. Parr and William B. Elkin, as administrator. (9) That his honor erred in holding that the order of Judge Kershaw, amending the aforesaid judgment of Clawney, clerk, etc., was without force and effect. (10) That his honor erred in holding, on the equity side of the court, that the complaint should be dismissed," etc.

The Montgomery tract of land was the property of Henry W. Parr, the father, and never passed under the will of James Elkin; and therefore the devisees under that will have no interest therein, unless it was transferred to them by the force and effect of the sale made under the proceedings in the case of Clawney, clerk, v. Henry L. Parr and William B. Elkin, administrator. It is therefore manifest that the main question in the case is whether that judgment, and the sale under it, were binding upon Henry L. Parr, or illegal and void as to him. It is insisted that the said proceedings were and are absolutely void as to him, for at least two reasons: That he was never made a party to that case; and, if he was, that the original order for sale made by Judge Mackey did not give authority to sell the Montgomery tract of land, the same not being included in the mortgage to the commissioner, (clerk,) or in the order of sale; and the subsequent order of Judge Kershaw, to amend the order of sale by adding the Montgomery tract to it, did not cure the defects.

1. Was Parr made a party in the case of Clawney, clerk, etc., so often referred to? Being a minor under 14 years of age, he could be made a party defendant only by a strict compliance with the law upon the subject, which requires that "all civil actions in courts of record shall be commenced by service of a summons." Code, § 148. "If the action be against a minor, under the age of 14 years, a copy of the summons shall be served by delivering to such minor personally, and also to his father mother or guardian, or, if there be none within the state, then to any person having care or control of such minor, or with whom he shall reside, or in whose service he shall be employed." Code, § 155, subd. 2. The record states service of the summons upon Henry L. Parr in the usual form, and also shows that William B. Elkin accepted service "as guardian of Henry L. Parr." The judge referred the fact as to personal service of summons to the jury, and, against objection, allowed Parr himself to be examined,— and he testified that he had never been served with any paper in the case,—and the deputy sheriff, Martin, who had served the papers, to explain and contradict his sworn return of the personal service of summons. Did the judge commit error in allowing the record to be thus assailed? There is much conflict in the authorities upon the subject, but we may assume that these propositions have been settled in this state: (1) That a void judgment, order, or decree, in whatever tribunal it may be rendered, is, in legal effect, nothing. "All acts performed under it, and claims flowing out of it, are void. Hence, a sale based on such a judgment has no foundation in law." (2) That judicial proceedings are void when the court in which they are taken is acting without jurisdiction, either as to the subject-matter or the parties. If it have jurisdiction of the subject-matter, but not of the parties, the judgment, quoad such parties, is void. (3) That, however, a judgment is considered as something more than an ordinary fact, liable to be overthrown by parol proof; that there is in its favor something more than a presumption of correctness, which may be rebutted; that this is a legal presumption, so conclusive in its character as to give the judgment immunity from impeachment in any collateral proceeding,—that is to say, "in an action other than that in which it was rendered, except upon proof of fraud, or want of jurisdiction." See 1 Rap. & L. Law Dict., "Collateral Impeachment," p. 226; Riker v. Vaughan, 23 S. C. 187; Turner v. Malone, 24 S. C. 398; Tederall v. Bouknight, 25 S. C. 276. From these settled principles, we think it naturally and necessarily follows that where there is a judgment regular on its face, but showing a jurisdictional infirmity, which is hidden, and can only be made to appear by proof, it is what is called a "voidable judgment," and an injured party may assail it, in a direct proceeding instituted for the purpose of setting it aside in whole or in part, for the want of jurisdiction. It is not denied, but, on the contrary, was expressly admitted, by the parties "that the defendant Henry L. Parr shall have the right to introduce any evidence and make any point in his defense which he could introduce or make in any action which he might bring, to set aside the said judgment of Samuel B. Clawney, as clerk, v. Henry L. Parr and William B. Elkin, as administrator, or in any direct proceeding which he might institute to vacate or set aside said judgment," etc. We cannot say that the circuit judge committed error in admitting the parol testimony objected to, as in conflict with the record, or in construing the provisions of the Code as to the necessity of personal service of summons on a minor under 14 years of age. See the authorities appended in a note to Taylor v. Lewis, 19 Amer. Dec. 135.

2. Under this view, the other grounds of appeal lose much of their importance, but we will advert to them briefly. Clawney, as clerk, brought the contested action to foreclose the mortgage on the Elkin land, (181 acres,) given to his predecessor, as commissioner; making exhibit, also, of the mortgage on the Montgomery place, which had been given to Coleman to indemnify him as surety. There was only one order of sale, (May 9, 1877,) which referred to premises "as hereinafter set forth;" and no other premises were "set forth," except the Elkin land, (181 acres.) At the next term of the court, however, Judge Kershaw, on October 25, 1877, passed an order purporting to amend the order of sale by adding thereto, at the end thereof, a paragraph describing the Montgomery tract, under which it was sold. The judge held, as matter of law, "that Henry L. Parr, not being a party to the action, and being an infant, was incapable of employing an attorney, and that the consent of Mr. Obear as attorney gave no force and effect to the judgment, and that said order of Judge Kershaw was without force or effect." We cannot say that this was error. See Chaffee v. Rainey, 21 S. C. 16; Barrett v. James, 30 S. C. 331, 9 S. E. Rep. 263; 2 Daniell, Ch. Pr. 1028. The rule seems to be "that no alteration can be made in a decree or motion without a rehearing, except in a matter of clerical error or of form, or where the matter to be inserted is clearly consequential, on the directions already given," etc. The fourth exception, that there was error in charging the requests of Parr numbered 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11, is, as it seems to us, a clear misapprehension. The judge charged that the requests were good law, except as modified in his charge, which we are now considering. Besides, the exception is too vague and general. In order to make the points clear, it was necessary, not only to show that the requests, as modified, were still error, but in what particulars they were so.

Exceptions 5, 6, and 7 seem to complain that as the plaintiffs were not parties to the foreclosure suit in the name of Clawney, as clerk, it was error to refer to the jury the question of fact, as to the alleged fraud in chilling the biddings, etc. It is true that the plaintiffs—remainder-men under the will of James Elkin—were not nominatin parties to the foreclosure suit of Clawney, clerk, who had no interest except as a public officer. But they were, nevertheless, beneficiaries under the proceeding; the sheriff who made the sale being one, and the purchaser of the land, another, of those parties. We cannot hold that it was error to leave the question of actual fraud to the jury,—always a proper tribunal for the decision of such questions.

We are not sure that we understand what is meant by "adjudicating the equities between the parties." The plaintiffs, surely, have no right to partition the Montgomery tract of land until their right to it is established. From the view which was taken by the circuit judge, it seems to us that there was nothing for him to do but to dismiss the complaint, as to Henry L. Parr, simply upon the ground that the sale of the Montgomery tract of land, under the aforesaid foreclosure proceedings, was, as to him, an utter nullity,—simply as void as if it had never existed. The question of payment in fact was withdrawn from the jury, and this ruling is without prejudice to any rights, which the parties may be advised that they are entitled to. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

BEASLEY et al. v. NEWELL.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 13, 1893.)

INDEMNITY MORTGAGE—WHAT CONSTITUTES—FORECLOSURE—ESTOPPEL.

1. A mortgage executed by a trustee to the sureties on his bond stated that it was given to secure them "free and harmless from any loss which they may sustain on account of their being my security," and recited that, if they should be injured by being security, "if the within-mentioned premises can be sold for more than the amount which they * * * may have paid for me, that then and in that event" they should sell the premises, returning any overplus to the mortgagor. Held, that the latter clause did not destroy the character of the mortgage, as one of indemnity, which may be enforced by the sureties when endangered, and before actual payment of the debt for which they are sureties.

2. The probate court granted a petition by a life tenant, joined in by the trustee, which set forth that such life tenant was entitled to the interest on the trust fund, with remainder to her children, and prayed that the trustee might pay over to such children as were then of age, and to others as each became of age, their respective shares, and the trustee paid the children that were then of age their shares. Fourteen years afterwards, such life tenant and the other children filed a petition stating that such children were of age, and that the trustee was in arrears, and praying that he account to her and such children. The court ordered the trustee to forthwith pay the amounts found due, and no appeal was taken from the order. Held that, in an action by the trustee's sureties to foreclose an indemnity mortgage because the trustee had failed to pay as ordered, such trustee and the grantees of the mortgaged premises were estopped from claiming that the probate court had no jurisdiction to order the trust fund paid to the children during the life of the life tenant.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Darlington county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Action by Reuben Beasley and W. A. Parrott Clark, as administrators of the estate of Giles Carter, deceased, against William D. Newell, to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment sustaining exceptions to the report of a referee, and dismissing the complaint without prejudice, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

The report of the referee, and the exceptions thereto, are as follows:

"The above-stated case was referred by his honor, J. B. Kershaw, on the 19th day of November, 1887, to J. J. Ward, as special referee, to ascertain and report what amount is due the plaintiff on the mortgage claim set forth in the complaint, and that he hear and decide all other issues raised by the pleadings, and report his findings of law and fact to this court. It being so that the said J. J. Ward could not act as said referee, the undersigned was, per agreement, substituted, and hereby submits the following report:

"James Newberry, of the county and state aforesaid, by his will, left certain property in trust to Alexander M. Newberry and Samuel C. Graham, for the use of Elizabeth Jane Scaff for life, and after her death to be divided among her children. That the said Alexander M. Newberry and Samuel C. Graham declined to accept the said trust, and that, by due proceeding held in the court of equity, one Isaac J. Newberry was appointed trustee on the 16th day of February, 1859. That the said Reuben Beasley and Giles Carter, the intestate of the said J. N. Garner, became the sureties on the trust bond of the said Isaac J. Newberry. That the said Isaac J. Newberry, on the 9th day of November, A. D. 1859, executed the mortgage in question (a copy of which is hereunto attached) to the said Reuben Beasley and the said Giles Carter to indemnify them against all loss by reason of the said suretyship. The said mortgage was duly recorded in the office of R. M. C. for the county and state aforesaid, on the 25th day of April, 1860, in book T, pages 414 and 415. On September 7, 1872, the said Elizabeth Jane Scaff filed a petition in the office of the probate judge for the county and state aforesaid, setting forth that she was only entitled to the interest of the trust fund for her natural life, with remainder to her children, and praying that the court would empower the trustee to pay over to the children then of age, and to the ones then under age, as each became of age, their respective shares in the trust funds; stating that she, the said Elizabeth Jane Scaff, was willing to make such a surrender of her life interest, and that the said trustee concurred and joined in said petition. That the judge of probate, James M. Brown, passed an order on the 7th day of September, 1872, granting the prayer of said petition. That in accordance with that order the said trustee paid over to the children then of age, to wit, James J. Scaff and Mary A. Baker, their respective shares. That Frances Rebecca Cobb, Milton Scaff, Annie Dubose, Nettie Lovett, and Elizabeth Jane Scaff, on the 15th day of March, 1886, filed a petition in the probate court against Isaac J. Newberry, as trustee, alleging that he, the said Isaac J. Newberry, as trustee, had failed to pay over to the children as they arrived of age, and also to pay the interest annually to the life tenant, the said Elizabeth Jane Scaff. That, after due proceeding had in the probate court, the Hon. E. C. Baker, judge of said court, on the 15th day of May, 1886, filed a decree against the said Isaac J. Newberry, to wit, that the said I. J. Newberry do pay over, forthwith, to said Elizabeth Jane Scaff the said sum of $650.04, being the amount of interest due her as aforesaid. It is further ordered that he do also, forthwith, turn over and distribute equally to and among the said Frances Rebecca Cobb, Milton Scaff, Minnie Dubose, and Nettie Lovett the said trust fund of $403.36, with interest on each of said sums, to the respective parties, till the same is paid. That abstract of said judgment was duly filed. That the parties in interest pressed for payment, but the judgment has never been paid by the said trustee or by the said sureties, and that the amount due by the said trustee is the amount of the said judgment and cost, plus the interest, which amounts to the sum of one thousand four hundred and seventy-six 86-100 dollars, up to date. That the said Reuben Beasley lives in Arkansas, and that the estate of the said Giles Carter is insolvent. That the said defendant, W. D. Newell, came into possession of the land through intermediate purchasers of the said Isaac J. Newberry, by deed bearing date 4th day of December, 1878, for the sum of $1,150. That Newell (the defendant) was a purchaser with notice. The above is a concise statement of the facts, as I find them.

"Questions of law: Can the sureties on a trust bond foreclose a mortgage like the one in question, given to secure them free and harmless on account of their being my security on said bond against a purchaser with notice, when the sureties have not paid anything by reason of the default of the trustee? A surety is not liable to suit on a trust bond until it has been judicially ascertained that the trustee has defaulted. Orane v. Moses, 13 S. C. 561. It has been judicially determined by the judgment of the probate court that the trustee, Isaac J. Newberry, is in default. Therefore, the sureties are liable to suit, and have become endangered thereby, and can foreclose a mortgage against the principal, given to indemnify them against loss. Tankersley v. Anderson, 4 Desaus, Eq. 45; Hellams v. Abercrombie, 15 S. C. 110. Can the sureties foreclose against Newell, a purchaser with notice? I hold that they can. Granting that the judgment does not bind Newell as to amount, and that he had a right to surcharge and falsify the same,—on which points no evidence was introduced,—it is evidence of the default of the trustee. The defendant claimed that the order of the probate court passed on the 7th of September, 1872, changed the contract of suretyship, and thereby discharged the sureties. It is a principle of law that, when the creditor and principal change the terms of the contract, the surety is released, but that principle does not apply in this case. Whatever change of contract there was, it was done by the court, and the principal was a party; and, furthermore, that rule is for the protection of the sureties, and those claiming under them, and not for the principal, who was a party to it, or those parties who claim under or through the principal. I recommend that the mortgage be foreclosed; that the land be sold by the clerk of court, and the proceeds applied to the said debt, of one thousand four hundred and seventy-six and 86-100 dollars, ($1,476.86); and I further recommend that the plaintiffs' attorneys be paid out of the proceeds a fee of one hundred dollars, and after paying the said debt and fee, and the cost of this action, the surplus, if any, to be paid to the defendant."

Exceptions to referee's report: "The defendant excepts to the report of T. H. Spain, Esq., referee herein, dated the 2d day of November instant: (1) Because the said referee erred, in law, in finding that the said mortgage from Newberry to the sureties on his bond as trustee was the ordinary obligation of indemnity, whereas the said referee should have found the said mortgage to be a special contract, binding on Newberry only in case of actual loss to his sureties. (2) Because the said referee erred, in law, in finding that there was a breach in the condition of the said mortgage from Newberry to his sureties before actual loss to them. (3) Because the said referee erred, in law, in finding that the probate court had jurisdiction of the action instituted by Elizabeth Jane Scaff against Isaac J. Newberry to recover the amount due to her by him as trustee. (4) Because the said referee erred, in law, in finding that the indebtedness of Newberry as trustee was legally established against the defendant. (5) Because the said referee erred, in law, in finding that the agreement of Newberry to pay the remainder-men the corpus of the estate could be enforced against the sureties or against the defendant before the death of the tenant for life. (6) Because the said referee erred, in law, in finding that the probate court had jurisdiction in the premises, and that the order of the said court of date September 7, A. D. 1872, is binding and conclusive as to the defendant, whereas the said referee should have found that the said probate court had no such jurisdiction, and that the said order is null and void as to the defendant. (7) Because the said referee erred, in law, in finding that the said probate court had power to so change and alter the contract of suretyship of the said sureties as to charge them and the defendant with the payment of the corpus of the trust estate to the remainder-men during the lifetime of the life tenant. (8) Because the said referee erred, in law, in awarding judgment to the plaintiffs against the defendant during the lifetime of the tenant for life, for a sum of money due to the remainder-men only on and after her death."

Boyd & Brown, for appellants. E. Keith Dargan, for respondent.

McIVER, C. J. By the will of James Newberry, certain property was given to trustees to hold for his daughter Jane Elizabeth Scaff for life, and after her death to be equally divided among her children. The trustees named in the will having declined to accept the trust, one Isaac J. Newberry was, by proper proceedings in the court of equity, duly appointed trustee in the place of those named in the will, and as such entered into bond, with the plaintiff Reuben Beasley, and Giles Carter, the other plaintiff's intestate, as his sureties, conditioned for the faithful performance of the duties of his trust. Shortly afterwards, the said Isaac J. Newberry executed a mortgage of a tract of land to the said Beasley and Carter, a copy of which is set out in the case; and, as this appeal turns largely upon the proper construction of the terms of that mortgage, it is proper that the same should be set out here, substantially, omitting only the formal parts thereof. Its recital is as follows: "Whereas, Giles Carter and Reuben Beasley * * * did this day sign and execute, as my security as (on) a trusteeship bond to T. B. Haynesworth, commissioner in equity for Darlington district, for the penal sum of two thousand four hundred dollars, conditioned that the said I. J. Newberry shall and do well and truly discharge all the duties which may devolve upon him as trustee for Mrs. E. Jane Scaff, wife of Riley Scaff, and the children of said E. Jane Scaff: Now, know ye, that I, the said I. J. Newberry, for the purpose of securing the said Giles Carter and Reuben Beasley free and harmless from any loss which they may sustain on account of their being my security on said bond as aforesaid, and for and in consideration of the sum of five dollars. * * * The condition of the above bargain and sale is this: That if I, the said I. J. Newberry, shall keep and save the within-named Giles Carter and Reuben Beasley harmless from any loss which they may sustain by their being my security as aforesaid, then the above sale shall be null and void; otherwise, it shall remain in full force and virtue. And it is agreed by and between the parties aforesaid that the said I. J. Newberry is to have and retain peaceable possession of, all and singular, the premises within mentioned, until the said Giles Carter and Reuben Beasley shall sustain loss by being my security as aforesaid. And in the event that they should be injured by being my security as aforesaid, if the within-mentioned premises can be sold for more than the amount which they, the said Carter and Beasley, may have paid for me, that then, and in that event, the said Carter and Beasley shall sell and dispose of said premises, returning the overplus, if any, after paying all liabilities and costs, to said I. J. Newberry, or his heirs and assigns." This mortgage was duly recorded on the 25th of April, 1860. Subsequently, the land covered by this mortgage came into the possession of the defendant, William D. Newell, through intermediate purchasers from said Isaac J. Newberry, under a deed dated 4th of December, 1878. Two proceedings were instituted in the court of probate, the first being a petition filed by the said E. Jane Scaff on the 7th of September, 1872, setting forth that she was only entitled to the interest of the trust fund for life, with remainder to her children, and praying that the trustee, I. J. Newberry, be empowered to pay over to such of the children as were then of age, and to the minors as each became of age, their respective shares of the trust fund, she, the said E. Jane Scaff, being willing to make such surrender of her life interest. The trustee concurred in this petition, and joined in the prayer thereof. Accordingly, the judge of probate, on the same day, made an order granting the prayer of the petition, and in accordance therewith the trustee paid over to the two children who were then of age their shares in the trust fund. The other proceeding was a petition filed by the other children and Mrs. Scaff on the 15th of March, 1886, setting forth the proceedings under the previous petition, that these children had now become of age, and that the trustee had failed to pay to Mrs. Scaff any interest due her since the 1st of January, 1873, and praying that the trustee should account for his actions and doings as such, and pay over to the petitioners the amounts found due them, respectively. Whereupon, a hearing was had before the judge of probate, who rendered his decree adjudging that the trustee was indebted to Mrs. Scaff in the sum of $650.04, arrears of interest, and was likewise indebted to the other petitioners in the sum of $403.36, to be equally divided between them, and he was ordered to pay the said amounts forthwith. Mrs. Scaff and her children, through their attorney, made demand upon the trustee for the payment of the money thus found to be due, which proving to be fruitless, demand was made upon the plaintiff Beasley, and the representative of Carter, deceased, as sureties on the bond of the trustee, whereupon the mortgage above mentioned was put into the hands of the attorney for foreclosure, who commenced action for that purpose on the 4th of October, 1886. The issues in the action were referred to a referee, who made his report, (a copy of which should be incorporated in the report of this case,) wherein, after finding the facts substantially as above stated,—that one of the sureties, Beasley, was absent from, and resided beyond the limits of, this state; that the other surety, Carter, had died insolvent; and that the defendant was a purchaser with notice,—he found, as matter of law, that the plaintiffs were entitled to have foreclosure of the mortgage, even though they had paid nothing for their principal, and recommended judgment accordingly. To this report the defendant filed the several exceptions set out in the case, and the same came before his honor, Judge Norton, who rendered the following judgment: "There are no exceptions to the referee's findings of fact in this case, and they are adopted; and I agree with him in his conclusions of law, except two: (1) I construe the mortgage given by I. J. Newberry to be a special agreement to repay his sureties any moneys which they should have been required to pay for him. The use of the word 'loss,' without more, would have entitled the sureties to the relief sought, if the proper parties were before the court; but the expression, 'the amount which they may have paid for me,' as synonymous with 'injury,' which had just been used as synonymous with 'loss,' leads me to the interpretation above announced, which seems more conclusive because it is not until that event that they are authorized to sell the mortgaged premises. And (2) the probate court had no jurisdiction, either to call the trustee to account, or to pass the order authorizing and requiring him to anticipate the payment of the corpus of the trust estate. The exceptions of the defendant to the referee's report are overruled or sustained in accordance with the above opinion. It is adjudged that the complaint be dismissed without prejudice to the right of plaintiffs, or any other person interested, to proceed, in such manner as they may be advised, to attain the object of this action." From this judgment, plaintiffs appeal, upon the several grounds set out in the record, which need not be repeated here, as the appeal really makes but two questions: (1) As to the construction of the mortgage; (2) as to the question of the jurisdiction of the court of probate.

Ever since the case of Tankersley v. Anderson, 4 Desaus. Eq. 44, it has been regarded as the settled law of this state that a surety who holds a mortgage or other collateral security given him to indemnify him against loss by reason of his suretyship may proceed to enforce such mortgage or other security as soon as he becomes endangered, and before actual payment of the debt for which he has become security. This doctrine has been fully recognized as late as the case of Hellams v. Abercrombie, 15 S. C. 110. Indeed, we do not understand that the circuit judge disputes it, for he rests his conclusion solely upon the terms of the mortgage, which he construes to be nothing more than a special agreement to pay whatever amount his sureties may have paid for him, and not a mortgage of indemnity. So that our first inquiry is whether the judge erred in his construction of the terms of the mortgage. It cannot be denied that this instrument, down to its last sentence, is an ordinary indemnity mortgage. After reciting the fact that Carter and Beasley had become his sureties on the trusteeship bond, the mortgagor declares, in the most explicit terms, that he gives the mortgage "for the purpose of securing the said Giles Carter and Reuben Beasley free and harmless from any loss which they may sustain on account of their being my security on said bond as aforesaid." It would seem that language could not express more clearly the real intention of the parties to this instrument,—to make an ordinary mortgage of indemnity. It is urged, however, that the last clause in the mortgage converts it into a mere special agreement to repay the sureties any money which they may have been required to pay for the mortgagor, and, hence, that the sureties could not maintain their action without showing that they had actually paid something. It is very obvious that the language used in the last clause of the mortgage does not very clearly express the manifest intention of the parties, for, if that language be literally construed, the sureties, even if they had paid the full amount of the bond, could not proceed to sell the mortgaged premises unless the same could be sold for more than the amount thus paid. The language is: "And in the event that they [the sureties] should be injured by being my security as aforesaid, if the within-mentioned premises can be sold for more than the amount which they, the said Carter and Beasley, may have paid for me, that then, and in that event, the said Carter and Beasley shall sell and dispose of said premises, returning the overplus, if any, after paying all liabilities and costs, to said I. J. Newberry, or his heirs and assigns." Under a literal construction of this language, the sureties could not sell the mortgaged premises, even to reimburse themselves for any money they may have paid, unless the mortgaged premises could be sold for more than the amount thus paid, for the power of sale is only conferred "if the within-mentioned premises can be sold for more than the amount thus paid," and it is only "then, and in that event," that the power of sale is given. But it is very obvious that no such construction could be adopted, as that would be so totally at variance with the whole tenor and manifest object of the instrument as to show that such cannot be the proper construction. Indeed, it would border on absurdity to hold that the mortgaged premises could not be sold for an amount which would be a single dollar less than the amount paid by the sureties, and thus defeat the manifest and declared purpose of the mortgage, and yet if sold for a single dollar, or even five cents, more than such amount, the sale would be valid. It is absolutely necessary, therefore, that some other than a literal construction of this last clause should be adopted. What, then, is the proper construction of this paper? As is well said by Mr. Justice McGowan in the case of Anderson v. Holmes, 14 S. C., at page 165, where a similar attempt was made to control the construction of a mortgage by certain words found in the closing sentence of the mortgage: "The intention of the parties to make a mortgage is clear. The object of construction is to ascertain what the parties meant by the terms and expressions used, and, where the intent can be clearly and distinctly ascertained, it will prevail, not only in cases in which it is not fully and clearly expressed, but even when it contradicts particular terms of the agreement. The general intention, to be collected from the whole context and every part of a written instrument, is always to be preferred to the particular expression." Guided by this rule, let us look at the instrument which we are called upon to construe. The instrument is in the form of a mortgage of indemnity, and its declared purpose is to save the sureties harmless from any loss which they may sustain by reason of their suretyship. All the terms of the instrument, down to the very last sentence, are in conformity to this declared purpose. Can the particular expression used in the last clause be allowed to control, and in fact destroy, the general intention? The authority just cited says no. Besides, as we have seen, the language used in the last clause cannot, with any sort of propriety, be given a literal construction, and therefore some other must be adopted; and what other more appropriate than that which will make it conform to the manifest and declared intention in the previous portion of the mortgage? Indeed, we think that the sole object of the last clause was to provide for the payment to the mortgagor or his assigns of any balance of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises which might remain after paying the amount of the mortgage debt, so to speak, and the costs and expenses of enforcing the mortgage; and this accounts for what would otherwise be the very extraordinary provision (to use no stronger term) authorizing a sale only in the event that the mortgaged premises could be sold for more than the amount paid by the sureties.

Again, it is a well-settled doctrine of equity that a creditor is entitled to avail himself of any security which may be held by the sureties to insure the payment of his debt; but, if the security held by the sureties in this case could not be enforced until the sureties have paid their liability on the bond of their principal, the result might and probably would be, in this case, that the beneficiaries of the trust would lose the benefit of this equity, and the declared object of the mortgage be defeated, for it appears that one of the sureties has died insolvent, and the other is beyond the jurisdiction of the court; and hence it is not at all likely that anything ever would be paid by the sureties, or either of them. It seems to us, therefore, that the circuit judge erred in the construction which he put upon the mortgage.

Next, as to the question of the jurisdiction of the court of probate. Under the facts, as found in this case, we do not deem it necessary to inquire into that question, for the trustee, Isaac J. Newberry, having submitted himself to the jurisdiction of that court, and having acted under the judgment first rendered, by paying over to such of the children as were then of age their shares of the trust fund, as directed by the decree of the judge of probate, and having acquiesced in the second decree by not raising the question of jurisdiction, or appealing from the decree, is estopped from now disputing the jurisdiction of the court of probate, (Finley v. Robertson, 17 S. C. 435;) and the defendant, who claims under him, and is only entitled to his rights in the premises, would likewise be estopped. It may be that the defendant might still be at liberty to surcharge and falsify the account, as taken in the court of probate; but this does not appear to have been attempted, and, as no question of this kind seems to have been raised in the circuit court, we are not at liberty to consider it.

There seems to have been some question raised before the referee as to whether the sureties were not discharged by an alleged change in the contract, but as that question was determined by the referee adversely to the defendant, and his finding in that respect was confirmed by the circuit judge, to which no exception has been taken, the question is not before us, and we are not to be regarded as determining anything upon that subject. It seems to us, however, that, inasmuch as one of the sureties has died insolvent, and the other is beyond the jurisdiction, the ends of justice require that the complaint should be amended so as to make the beneficiaries of the trust fund parties, in order that the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, or so much thereof as may be necessary to satisfy their claims, may be paid to them directly, instead of to the surviving surety and the representative of the deceased insolvent surety, after making proper provision for the payment of their counsel fees. The trustee, Isaac J. Newberry, may also be made a party, if it is desired to raise the question whether the defendant can now be permitted to surcharge and falsify the accounts heretofore taken in the court of probate. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to that court for the purpose of carrying out the views herein announced.

MCGOWAN and POPE, JJ., concur.

PORTER et al. v. JEFFERIES et al.

COVENANT OF WARRANTY—ACTION FOR BREACH—MISTAKE OF LAW—ESTOPPEL—USURY.

1. In an action for breach of covenants of warranty in a mortgage, the attorney who drew the mortgage cannot testify to previous conversations of the parties as to their intentions, in the absence of an allegation or proof that any fraud was intended by any of the parties to the mortgage, since its true construction must be gathered from the terms in which the intentions of the parties were expressed in writing.

2. In an action against executors on covenants in a mortgage executed by them, an answer alleging, generally, that, in executing the mortgage, defendants did not intend to bind themselves personally on the covenant of warranty, and that plaintiff's attorney told them they would not be so bound, does not state facts constituting a defense, and testimony as to the alleged mistake is properly excluded.

3. A mistake of law as to the construction of a written instrument is not a ground for equitable relief.

4. A mortgagee is not estopped to sue for breach of the covenant of warranty in the mortgage because defendant executors executed it under a representation of plaintiff's attorney that they would not be bound personally by the covenant, since defendants cannot take the benefit of the mistake as to the legal effect of the terms of the mortgage, without allowing plaintiff the benefit of the misrepresentation, though innocently made, as to the title to the land offered by defendants as security for the money obtained.

5. Where the maker of a note tainted with usury borrowed from the holder, and incorporated the two debts into a new note secured by a mortgage, it was not error to charge that the new loan was not tainted with usury by the fact that the original note was tainted.

6. Since Acts 1882, (18 St. 36,) providing for a forfeiture of double the sum received as usurious interest, requires it to "be collected by a separate action or allowed as a counterclaim to any action for the principal sum," a counterclaim for such forfeiture is properly excluded in an action for breach of a covenant of warranty in a mortgage given to secure a usurious note.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Action by John A. Porter and another, as executors of R. C. Oliver, deceased, against John R. Jefferies and Eber C. Allen, for breach of covenants of warranty contained in a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stangarne Wilson, for appellants. C. P. Sanders and D. E. Hydrick, for respondents.

MELVER, C. J. This action was originally commenced by R. C. Oliver, and upon his death continued in the name of his executors, the plaintiffs above named. The object of the action was to recover damages for the breach of covenants of warranty contained in a certain mortgage, a copy of which is set out in the case; but, as we propose to extract therefrom so much of the terms thereof as bear upon one of the points made by this appeal, it is unnecessary to set out the mortgage in extenso. It seems that Woodward Allen, of whose will the defendants are the duly-qualified executors, being indebted to Jesse F. and John B. Cleveland in a large sum of money, during his lifetime executed a mortgage on 835 acres of land to secure the payment of said debt, and that after his death the defendants, being executors as aforesaid, desired to pay the Cleveland debt, because it was bearing a high rate of interest, and for this purpose borrowed from R. C. Oliver the sum of $3,500, and extinguished the Cleveland mortgage, giving to said R. C. Oliver a mortgage on the same land covered by the Cleveland mortgage. Subsequently, the defendants procured another loan from said R. C. Oliver, the amount of which, together with the amount then due on the former loan, was embraced in a new note, and secured by a new mortgage on the same land; and it is this new mortgage which contains the covenants, the breach of which constitutes the cause of action in the present case. So much of this last-mentioned mortgage as is pertinent to the questions raised by this appeal reads as follows: "We, John R. Jefferies and E. C. Allen, executors of the last will and testament of Woodward Allen, deceased, by virtue of the power given to us in said will and testament, of the county and state aforesaid, send greeting: Whereas, we, the said John R. Jefferies and E. C. Allen, executors as aforesaid, in and by a certain note bearing date the twenty-second day of February, A. D. 1884, promise to pay R. C. Oliver or order the sum of three thousand and seven hundred and twenty-five dollars, ($3,725.00,) payable on the 1st day of January, 1885, with interest from the 1st of February, 1884, at 10 per cent. per annum till paid. * * * Now, know all men that we, the said John R. Jefferies and E. C. Allen, in consideration of the said debt and sum of money aforesaid, and for the better securing the payment thereof to the said R. C. Oliver, according to the terms of the said note, and also in consideration of the further sum of three dollars to us, the said Jefferies and Allen, in hand well and truly paid by the said R. C. Oliver, * * * we, the said Jefferies and Allen, executors as aforesaid, have granted * * * being the tract on which Mrs. Allen, the widow of the late Woodward Allen, now resides, containing eight hundred and thirty-five acres, (835,) more or less, and being the tract of land of which the late Woodward Allen, at the time of his death, was seised in fee. * * * And we do hereby bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, to warrant and forever defend, all and singular, the said premises unto the said R. C. Oliver, his heirs and assigns, from and against us and our heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, and all persons lawfully claiming or to claim the same, or any part thereof." The attesting clause of the mortgage is in these words, "Witness our hands and seals this 22nd day of February, A. D. 1884," and it is signed as follows: "John R. Jefferies, [L. S.,] Eber C. Allen, [L. S.,] Executors of W. Allen, deceased."

The breaches of this covenant of warranty, as assigned in the complaint, are as follows: (1) That by proceedings in this court, to which the defendants as well as the said R. C. Oliver were parties, it has been adjudged that three hundred and thirty-five acres of the land embraced in the mortgage did not belong to the said Woodward Allen, but was the individual property of his widow, Mrs. Harriet Allen, and therefore not liable to the lien of the mortgage. (2) That in the same or similar proceedings it has been adjudged that the said widow is entitled to both dower and homestead in so much of the mortgaged premises as remained after taking off the said 335 acres adjudged to be the individual property of Mrs. Allen. The defendants, in their answer, set up several defenses: (1) That of mistake in executing the mortgage; (2) estoppel arising from the representations made to them at the time of the execution of the mortgage by the attorney of Oliver; (3) estoppel arising from a former proceeding to which both Oliver and these defendants were parties; (4) that the lands of Woodward Allen, when sold under the mortgage, were bid off by R. C. Oliver at much less than their real value, and he should be required to credit his mortgage with the full value of the land bought by him; (5) usury in the note secured by the mortgage; (6) a counterclaim for double the amount of usurious interest paid on the note secured by the mortgage. The case came on for trial before his honor, Judge Norton, and a jury, and after his charge the jury found a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for $603.98; and, judgment having been entered, the defendants appeal upon the several grounds set out in the record.

We will first take up those which impute error to the circuit judge in his rulings as to the admissibility of testimony. The first ground alleges error in refusing to allow Mr. Carlisle to answer the following question: "Was it not a fact that they [meaning the defendants] considered the land as belonging to Woodward Allen?" On turning to that part of the case where this question was objected to, we find that counsel for defendants explained by saying: "I am asking him, as the representative of both parties, if he believed at that time the mortgage was upon the land of Woodward Allen?" Taking the question in either form, it seems to us that there was no error in ruling the question irrelevant. It seems that the parties repaired to the office of Mr. Carlisle, who had been for some time the attorney of Oliver, and there the mortgage was drawn and executed, from the description of the land in the Cleveland mortgage. How Mr. Carlisle could know what the defendants considered as to the ownership of the land, except from what was said at the time, or how what was considered, or what he himself believed, could affect any question raised by this appeal, we are at a loss to conceive. There is no allegation, and certainly no proof, that any fraud was intended by any of the parties, and any previous conversation as to the intention or legal effect of the mortgage was merged in the instrument as it was written; and, without any such allegation or proof, the true construction of such instrument must be gathered from the terms in which their intentions were expressed in writing.

The testimony alleged to be erroneously excluded in the second, third, and fourth grounds of appeal was so manifestly irrelevant to any issue raised by the pleadings, or so clearly immaterial, that we do not deem it necessary to dwell upon it. The fifth ground will be more appropriately considered in connection with the eighth, for, as matter of fact, the testimony there referred to was received, though the judge afterwards instructed the jury to disregard it; so that the objection was really more to the charge than to the ruling as to the admissibility of the testimony.

The sixth ground complains of error in permitting plaintiffs to ask Mr. Carlisle the question whether he would have told the defendants that they were not personally liable on the mortgage, if he had known, or if it had been intimated to him, that Mrs. Allen claimed a part of the land embraced in the mortgage. Even if this question had been incompetent, the answer to it, certainly, was not incompetent, for his answer was in accordance with what he had said before, without objection, viz. "I would not have taken the mortgage at all." So far as we can perceive, the witness did not then answer the hypothetical question as to whether he would have told the defendants they were not personally liable upon the covenants in the mortgage if he had known, or if it had been intimated to him, that Mrs. Allen claimed a considerable part of the land covered by the mortgage. If he can be regarded as saying anything upon that subject, it was in reply to a subsequent question, to which no objection was interposed, to wit: "If you did state to them [referring to the defendants] that they were not liable individually, upon what was that based?" to which the reply was "that they were acting under the will, mortgaging the land belonging to their testator." Indeed, it is manifest from all the testimony upon this point that both Mr. Carlisle and the defendants, at the time the mortgage was executed, regarded the whole of the land as subject to the lien of the mortgage, which Mr. Carlisle regarded as ample security for the debt; and hence anything that may have been said as to the personal liability of defendants was said in that view, for, of course, if the value of the mortgaged premises was sufficient to secure the payment of the debt, no personal liability could have been incurred. We think, therefore, that in any view of the matter the sixth ground of appeal cannot be sustained.

The seventh ground of appeal, which imputes error to the circuit judge in holding that the covenant of warranty in the mortgage was the personal covenant of the defendants, and binding upon them as individuals, need scarcely be considered, for it is admitted by counsel for defendants that the authorities sustain the view taken by the circuit judge; and we need not go further back than the cases of McDowall v. Reed, 28 S. C. 486, 6 S. E. 300, and Moss v. Johnson, 36 S. C. 551, 15 S. E. 709, to show that such admission was amply justified.

We come then to the fifth and eighth grounds of appeal, which raise what seem to be regarded by counsel for appellants the most material questions in the case. The circuit judge held that, inasmuch as the allegations in the answer were not sufficient to raise the question of mistake on the part of the defendants in giving such a covenant of warranty as would bind them personally, all the testimony bearing upon that alone should be disregarded by the jury, and that defense must be determined adversely to the defendants. In the argument here, counsel for appellants rely upon paragraphs 2, 3, and 6 of the answer to show that the defense of mistake was sufficiently pleaded; and, in justice to the appellants, these paragraphs should be incorporated in the report of this case. It seems to us that the allegations there found are too general in their character to warrant the introduction of evidence to sustain the defense relied on. These allegations, practically, amount to this,—that the defendants, in executing the mortgage, did not intend to bind themselves personally by the covenant of warranty, and that they were told by Oliver's attorney that they would not be so bound. There is no allegation that any words were omitted which ought to have been inserted, nor any words inserted which ought to have been omitted. Indeed, there is no allegation of any fact upon which an issue could be raised, unless it be the fact that they were "told by plaintiff's attorney, in his presence, that they assumed no individual liability thereby," and that fact alone, as we shall see presently, was not sufficient to sustain the defense. It seems to us, therefore, that these paragraphs were demurrable, upon the ground that they did not state facts sufficient to constitute any defense; and if so, then, clearly, there was no error in excluding testimony as to such allegations. Pom. Rem. § 603. There was no error, therefore, on the part of the circuit judge, in excluding from the consideration of the jury the testimony as to the alleged mistake. But, as it is possible (though we are not to be regarded as so holding) that the defect in the answer might have been cured by amendment, we are not content to rest our judgment upon the ground of defect in the pleading.

It is not pretended that there was any fraud or concealment on the part of either Oliver or his attorney, nor can it be pretended that the mistake relied on was as to any matter of fact. If any, it was a mistake of law, and, what is more, a mere mistake as to the proper construction of a written instrument. Against such a mistake, a court of equity will not relieve. In 15 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 637, we find the following proposition laid down, and supported by quite an array of authorities: "A mistake on the part of a person executing an instrument as to its legal effect, or that it has an effect different from that intended, cannot avail to avoid that construction of the instrument which the language used, and the rules of law as applied thereto require." So in 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 843, we find the following: "The rule is well settled that a simple mistake by a party as to the legal effect of an agreement which he executes, or as to the legal result of an act which he performs, is no ground for either defensive or affirmative relief." This doctrine is fully supported by our own cases. Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349, and Munro v. Long, 35 S. C. 360, 14 S. E. 824. We do not think, therefore, that, even if the mistake here relied upon had been fully made out, it could have availed the defendants as a defense in this action.

The ninth and tenth grounds both relate to the defense of estoppel, and may therefore be considered together. We do not think that there is any just foundation for these grounds. The appellants claim that inasmuch as they executed the mortgage containing a covenant of warranty, which, as we have seen, bound them personally, the plaintiffs are estopped from enforcing such covenant because they signed the mortgage under a representation made to them by the attorney of Oliver that they would not be bound personally by such covenant; but they take no account of the fact that they obtained Oliver's money by a representation that all of the land embraced in the mortgage was subject to the lien thereof, for the land is described in the mortgage as "being the tract of land of which the late Woodward Allen, at the time of his death, was seised in fee." It does not seem to us to be at all in accordance with the principles upon which the doctrine of estoppel rests to allow the defendants to avail themselves of the benefit of an alleged mistake in the construction and legal effect of the terms of the mortgage, without at the same time allowing the plaintiffs the benefit of a misrepresentation, though innocently made, as to the title to the land offered as security for the money which they obtained. The plaintiffs cannot be estopped from bringing their action to recover damages for a breach of warranty plainly written in the mortgage, when such breach has been occasioned by the misrepresentation (innocent though it be) made by the defendants, in the mortgage, as to the title to the land warranted to be in Woodward Allen. Indeed, it is a mistake to say that defendants were misled by the statement of plaintiffs' attorney, for it is clear, from the undisputed testimony, that Mr. Carlisle was acting for both parties, and the language used by the defendant Jefferies in reply to the question when he asked Mr. Carlisle whether they would be responsible as individuals, as to both of the mortgages, his reply was, "Yes, that was the general counsel he gave me all the time," showing very clearly that he regarded Mr. Carlisle as his attorney, as well as the attorney of Oliver, for otherwise he would have had no right to call on Mr. Carlisle for "counsel."

The eleventh ground imputes error to the circuit judge in charging that $500, part of the debt, would not be tainted with usury, even though the original debt was so tainted. As we understand, the undisputed testimony in the case was that the original sum borrowed was $3,500, which it is claimed was tainted with usury; and after that debt had been running for some two or three years the defendants borrowed another sum, of about $500, to pay the balance on a note due to the bank, and then the two debts were incorporated in a new note, which was secured by the last mortgage; and, as we understand the charge, the jury were instructed that the mere fact that the original note was tainted with usury would not have the effect of tainting the new loan with usury, and in this we see no error. But as it seems to us that the figures show clearly that the verdict of the jury could not have been reached if any interest had been allowed upon any part of either of the debts, the instruction complained of, even if erroneous, could not possibly have affected the result, and therefore the error, if there was one, becomes wholly immaterial.

The twelfth ground alleges error in ruling out the counterclaim for double the usurious interest paid. The second section of the act of 1882 (18 St. 36,) provides, as an additional penalty for receiving usurious interest, a forfeiture of double the sum so received, "to be collected by a separate action, or allowed as a counter-claim to any action brought to recover the principal sum." This, being a penalty imposed only by a special statutory provision, can be enforced only in the mode prescribed by the statute; and as it is there declared "allowed as a counter-claim to any action brought to recover the principal sum," and as this is not an action to recover the principal sum, but, on the contrary, an action to recover damages for the breach of a covenant of warranty, it is quite clear that there was no error in excluding the counterclaim.

The only remaining ground, the thirteenth, claims that there was error in charging the jury that the allowance of a homestead would constitute a breach of the covenant of warranty. While it is quite true that in one portion of his charge the circuit judge did say to the jury that he thought the taking the homestead out of the land would be a breach of the covenant of warranty, yet after a colloquy between himself and counsel as to the homestead, in the concluding part of the charge, the matter of homestead was dropped out; and the jury were practically instructed that, if they found that there was usury in the whole transaction, then, in order to ascertain what damages the plaintiffs had sustained by reason of the breach of warranty, they should add together the principal sums of the two notes, $3,500 and $510.95, and the amount paid for dower, $963.64, and from the sum thus ascertained deduct the sum of all the payments made upon the mortgage debt, and the balance would be the damages which the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. This, as we understand the figures, was just what the jury did, and hence the question as to the homestead became wholly immaterial. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

TOMPKINS et al. v. TOMPKINS et al.
(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 4, 1893.)

JUDICIAL SALES—VALIDITY — ORDER FOR RESALE.

1. Where the decretal order for a sale of land fixes the date thereof, a sale made at any other time is unauthorized and void.

2. After a purchaser at judicial sale had paid into court a part of the price bid by him, and the money so paid had, by order of court, been used for the purposes of the action, the sale was declared void, as having been made at an unauthorized time. Held, that it was proper to order another sale, subject to the condition that if no bid was made, greater than the price paid at the former sale, the former sale should be confirmed, and that if there were such bid the former sale should be declared void, and the money paid thereon be returned to the purchaser.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Edgefield county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by J. G. Tompkins and others against S. S. and J. W. Tompkins, executors, and others. From an order setting aside a sale of land by the master, and directing a resale thereof, S. S. Tompkins and one W. R. Parks, the purchaser at such sale, appeal. Modified.

The decretal order of the circuit judge was as follows:

"This is a motion, upon due notice, by the defendants, to set aside a sale of certain real estate made by the master under an order passed in the said cause on the 11th day of March, 1891, upon the following grounds: (1) That the order obtained at the March term, 1891, was passed without notice to the plaintiffs or defendants, or any of them. (2) That all the parties interested in said land were not parties to this suit in March, 1891, and are not now parties herein. (3) That the order passed at March term, 1891, was in all respects regular, and properly passed. It authorized the master to sell only 'on sales day in November, 1891,' and on no other day or at any other time; and the sale reported as having been made on the 3d day of January, 1892, was a surprise to and a fraud upon the parties in interest, without authority, and void. The motion was heard by me at the March, 1892, term of the court of common pleas for said county.

"The facts necessary to a full understanding of this question raised and to be determined are, briefly, as follows: The action was commenced several years ago for an accounting and settlement of the estate of James Tompkins, deceased. Creditors were called in, and, among others, J. H. Jennings, executor of Rhoda Ramsey, presented and proved against the said estate a claim for about fifteen hundred dollars. To pay the debts presented and proven against said estate, certain of the real estate of the said testator, James Tompkins, deceased, was sold under a decree made in said cause. The home tract, containing 1,056 acres, more or less, was not sold, a portion thereof being in litigation. On the 11th day of March, 1891, the debt of J. H. Jennings, executor, as aforesaid, being still unpaid, an order in the cause was passed by his honor, J. H. Hudson, directing a sale of the 'homestead tract by the master of said county,' and the manner in which he should apply and pay out the proceeds. This order directed that the 'homestead tract be sold by W. F. Roath, as master for Edgefield county, or his successors in office, on sales day in November, 1891, for one-half cash; the balance on a credit of twelve months from date of sale; the credit portion to be secured by bond of the purchaser or purchasers, and a mortgage of the premises sold.' Under this order, said master advertised the said homestead tract for sale on the sales day fixed in said decretal order, but afterwards, and before the day of sale, the advertisement was, by direction of Mr. Ernest Gary,—one of the counsel engaged in the cause,—withdrawn. Afterwards, and without any further order of the court, the homestead tract was by said master advertised for sale on sales day in January, 1892. On the sales day in January, 1892, the homestead tract was sold by said master to W

R. Parks for the sum of three thousand two hundred dollars, as appears by the master's report of sales, bearing date 4th March, 1892. It also appears from the affidavit of S. S. Tompkins, Esq., that he was not informed of the sale of said homestead tract until the 21st day of January, 1892, and that he immediately, upon receiving said information, wrote to the said master, notifying him that said sale was without authority, and that he would resist the confirmation thereof, and also, on the 25th day of February, notified said master not to take any steps to consummate the sale, or to make title to the purchaser of said land, and suggested to him that he report the facts and circumstances to the court; to which suggestion the master replied that he would report the case to the court, and would not make title until he had the judgment of the court thereon. These facts are not denied by the said master. Afterwards, the said master executed titles to the said purchaser, who paid the cash portion of the purchase money, and gave his bond and mortgage to the master to secure the credit portion thereof; and thereafter the master reported said sale to the court, not referring therein to the circumstances in regard thereto, or the objections interposed by the said S. S. Tompkins and others. The master, in his affidavit read at the hearing, says the sale was, in all respects, fairly and regularly conducted, and that the bidding was spirited; and W. R. Parks, in his affidavit, states that he had no suspicion of any irregularity in any of the proceedings which led to the sale, and assumed that all the parties in interest were satisfied with the advertisement, especially as nearly all the heirs at law are residents of the county, and that one of them, at least, was present, and participated in the bidding. Several affidavits were read in reply to the affidavits submitted in support of the motion, tending to show that the homestead tract was bid off at a fair and full price for the same.

"In the view I take of the case presented, I do not think it necessary to discuss fully the first and second grounds set forth in the motion papers. It may be proper to say, however, that I do not think these grounds can avail the moving parties. The order of the 11th day of March, 1891, was made in open court, and ordinarily all parties interested would be charged with notice thereof, and, if certain necessary parties were not before the court at that time, their rights are not affected thereby. The third ground, however, presents a serious question. It is clearly competent for the court, in the absence of any statutory regulation, to prescribe the mode and terms of sale; fix the time of sale; and these requirements must be complied with by the master or other persons conducting the sale. The conduct of the person conducting the sale is subject to the scrutiny of the court. Confirmation is the judicial sanction of the court, and in cases of this nature, the court being the vendor, it may, in its discretion, give or withhold its consent. Any mistake or misunderstanding between persons conducting the sale and intended bidders or parties in interest; any accident, fraud, or other circumstances by which interests are prejudiced without fault of the injured party or parties, or by reason whereof property is sold at a price considerably disproportioned to the real value,—will be deemed sufficient cause for refusing confirmation, and for ordering a resale; and so, generally, whatsoever, and even less, that is sufficient to set a sale aside after its consummation, will, of course, upon the same principle, cause confirmation to be denied. Rorer, Jud. Sales, § 129. The powers of the master are precisely what the decretal order of the court confers. Young v. Teague, Bailey, Eq. 22. The term of the decretal order became the law of the case,—the condition on which the authority is to be exercised. Bally v. Bally, 9 Rich. Eq. 395. If the official fails to comply with the terms of the order in making the sale, such sale is without authority, and therefore void. Bally v. Bally, supra; Alexander v. Messervey, (S. C.; 1892,) 14 S. E. Rep. 854. Now, in Bally v. Bally, supra, it is held that where a commissioner sells land without having advertised the sale for the time prescribed in the order of sale, the sale is invalid, and will be set aside. At that time there was no statute regulating the time for the advertisement of sales made under the order of the court. While, therefore, the rule may be different, now, as to the length of time lands shall be advertised before sales, by reason the statute set, we have no statutes regulating the time when, or the month in which, sales of land ordered by the court shall be made. Such being the case, I take it that the court may fix the time in the decretal order of sale, and, when this is done, it becomes one of the conditions on which the authority of the master, or the person making the sale, is to be exercised; and if such officer fails to comply in this respect with the terms of the order, in making the sale, such sale is without authority, and therefore void. It often becomes a serious question at what time a sale of land should be made; and frequently the court is called upon to exercise a sound judicial discretion in fixing the time of sale, so as to prevent a sacrifice of the property, and an impairment of the rights and interest of the parties. If the time fixed by the decretal order for sale can be disregarded by the master, then the object which the court had in view may be wholly defeated. To allow the master to modify the terms of the decretal order of sale in this particular, at his discretion, would be dangerous to the rights and interests of the parties interested in such sales. If the master can, in his discretion, when the time of sale is fixed to take place on sales day in a certain month, disregard this specific condition, and sell upon some subsequent sales day thereafter, what is there to prevent him selling on some sales day previous to that named in the order? In my opinion, the master has no such discretion. If the decretal order specifies that the sale is to be made on a certain sales day, this becomes one of the conditions on which the authority of the master is to be exercised; and, if he fails to sell on that day, his authority is at an end, and his power to make the sale is gone. He must await the further order and direction of the court. If, in the exercise of his discretion, he proceeds to sell upon some sales day previous or subsequent to that named in the order, such sale will be invalid for want of authority to make it. Here, the decretal order fixed the time for the sale on the sales day in November, 1891. No authority is given the master to sell at any other time. Without any further order or direction from the court, he sells on the sales day in January, 1892. This was certainly a surprise to the parties here complaining, even if bound by, and charged with notice of, the order of March 11, 1891. Immediately upon receiving information that the sale had been made, the master is notified not to consummate the sale, or its confirmation would be resisted. Notwithstanding this notice, the master, after having led the parties to believe that he would not complete the sale, but would report the facts and circumstances to the court, and ask its direction, proceeds to complete the sale by receiving the cash portion of the purchase money, taking the bond and mortgage of the purchaser for the credit portion, and executing and delivering titles to the purchaser. This conduct on the part of the master, under the circumstances, is, to say the least, not commendable. He should have submitted the matter for the judgment of the court. I am not prepared to say that the premises would not have brought a larger price than that bid by W. R. Parks. I am rather inclined, however, to think that they would, as, doubtless, there would have been more and greater competition. This was, in a measure, at least, prevented by the master's selling at an unauthorized time. It is therefore ordered that the motion to confirm the master's report of sales, bearing date the 4th day of March, 1892, be, and the same is hereby, refused; that the sale of the homestead tract made by the master on the sales day in January, 1892, be set aside, and that the master of Edgefield county do resell the said homestead tract, at Edgefield C. H., at public auction, on the sales day in November next, or some convenient sales day thereafter, after due and legal advertisement, upon the same terms, as to cash, credit, and security, as directed in the previous order for sale thereof. Further ordered, that said master do pay out the proceeds arising from such sale as directed in the previous order for sale of the homestead tract, and retain the surplus until further order of the court."

S. S. Tompkins, for appellants. Sheppard Bros., for respondents.

POPE, J. It seems that in 1877 the plaintiffs, J. G. Tompkins and others, exhibited their complaint on the equity side of the court of common pleas for Edgefield county against S. S. Tompkins and J. W. Tompkins, as executors of the last will of James Tompkins, deceased, and J. L. Tompkins and F. A. Tompkins, as defendants, wherein, in general terms, it may be stated that the object was to withdraw from said executors the further control of the estate of their testator; that their accounts as such executors might be stated, etc. Creditors of the testator were called in. Decree was made, and carried on appeal to the supreme court. A portion of the real estate of testator was sold under the order of the court, but a tract of over 1,000 acres, known as the "Homestead Tract," was reserved from sale. The cause remained on the calendar of the court of common pleas for Edgefield county down to the present time. At the March term, 1891, of said court, Judge Hudson passed an order directing the sale by the master of this homestead tract of land on the first Monday in November, 1891. No appeal was taken from this order. The master advertised the sale to take place on first Monday in November, 1891; but at the suggestion of one of the counsel interested in the cause, such master, without any direction from the court, withdrew the land from sale, but readvertised the land for sale on the first Monday of January, 1892,—again acting without any authority from the court. He sold the land to W. R. Parks, at the price of $3,250,—said purchaser complying with his bid by paying one-half of the purchase money in cash; but before deed was executed by the master, or a bond and mortgage by the purchaser, notice from S. S. Tompkins was given to such master and the purchaser, Parks, that he objected to such sale. Nevertheless, after such notice, the master executed a deed to the purchaser, and the purchaser gave his bond secured by mortgage. Thereafter, a motion was made at the March term, 1892, before his honor, Judge Izlar, to refuse to confirm the sale. This motion was made on numerous affidavits. Judge Izlar made an order setting aside the sale, and directing the master to resell the said premises on the first Monday of November, 1893, in accordance with the terms of Judge Hudson's decretal order of March 7, 1891, and pay out the proceeds of such sale as directed in Judge Hudson's order. From this order of Judge Izlar, two separate appeals are taken,—one on behalf of S. S. Tompkins, and one by W. R. Parks, for himself. The grounds of Mr. Tompkins' appeal are: (1) That said order was made without any motion therefor, and without notice to this defendant, or opportunity of arguing the same. (2) That said order was made without having the necessary parties before the court, the legal representatives of appellant's deceased codefendants, J. W. Tompkins, James L. Tompkins, and F. A. Tompkins, who represent, in the aggregate, one-half interest in said land; they never having been made parties to this suit. (3) That his honor erred in ordering any further sale of testator's land until the proceeds of former sales had been accounted for and applied, and the exact amount of each subsisting claim ascertained, and the parties in interest given the opportunity of settling the same without selling the ashes of their ancestors. (4) That his honor erred in ordering any part of the proceeds of sale to be paid to Messrs. Gary and Evans; their said claim, being an individual liability of appellant's codefendant, J. W. Tompkins, if it was ever a claim against the estate, being barred by the terms of the order of this court, calling in the creditors of said estate, as directed by the supreme court. W. R. Parks presented the following grounds of appeal: (1) Because, as matter of law, his honor erred in refusing to confirm the master's report of sale herein. (2) Because his honor erred in setting aside the sale of the homestead tract made by the master on sales day in January, 1892. (3) Because, if his honor did not err in ordering the homestead tract to be resold, he erred in refusing to provide for the return by the master to W. R. Parks of the amount paid by him to the master for the purchase money of said tract.

We will first consider and dispose of the appeal of Mr. Tompkins:

We cannot see any virtue in his first ground. Judge Izlar was asked at the regular term of court, in March, 1892, at Edgefield, by this appellant, to protect him against what he conceived was an invasion of his rights by the master, by a disregard of the terms of the decretal order of Judge Hudson, wherein a tract of land known as the "Homestead Tract" was required to be sold. When Judge Izlar viewed the terms of such order, and compared the terms of sale adopted by the master, he saw there was, what he conceived, a fatal variance. To provide a relief to the plaintiff, he tried, by his order, to place all the parties as they were under the order of Judge Hudson. It would be difficult to conceive what other course the circuit judge could have adopted during term time.

The reformation or change in the administrative part of Judge Hudson's decretal order was all that was done by Judge Izlar, independent of setting the sale aside. This act of Judge Izlar forms no part of an order on the merits. We fail to perceive any injury to this appellant. Besides, there is nothing in the case which informs this court that a decree was not made in this cause when all the parties were alive, and allowed to speak for themselves. The previous sale of 2,000 acres of land furnishes strong evidence of this.

The third ground of appeal seems fanciful. There is nothing to show us that all due regard had not been paid to the rights of all the parties to this controversy in the action of the court below. It certainly had remained on the calendar of the court in Edgefield sufficiently long to enable any amount of scrutiny into the claims of creditors. Besides, this court cannot be called upon to assume the existence of errors in the court below. They must be made to appear by the case, and here there is a woeful silence in every important particular.

The fourth ground of appeal is disposed of by the views we have expressed in disposing of the first ground of appeal. These four grounds of appeal must be dismissed.

It remains now to consider the complaint of W. R. Parks:

(1) Was it error in the circuit judge to refuse to confirm the sale made by the master to Parks? Let us consider this matter seriously, for it involves the decision of a question of practice that is of moment to purchasers at judicial sales. We should be slow in adopting any views that would create doubt in the minds of would-be purchasers at such sales. It is of the utmost importance that such sales should be regulated by such wholesome rules, the effect of which will cause the property thus exposed to sale to command its full value, by obtaining bidders to agree to purchase at such figures as represent that full value, and technical difficulties growing out of such a sale ought not only to be discouraged, but, when made, speedily disapproved of. The court of last resort in this state has repeated the rule to be that purchasers are only to be concerned with the facts that the court that orders the sale has jurisdiction, and that all the parties essential to the cause have been made parties. This rule seems to us to include the idea of an order for sale, and imports that purchasers should be bound to observe the terms of the order for the sale. The courts of this state are interdicted from "opening the bids," as it is called. But it has been held that where a sale has been made under a decree of the court of equity in this state, and there has been a failure by the master to observe the terms of such decree, the court will refuse to confirm such sale. Baily v. Baily, 9 Rich. Eq. 392. Chancellor Dargan, as the organ of the court in that case, said: "But where the court has made an order of sale, of which a notice is to be given by advertisement for a given time, such direction, as well as the other terms, [italics ours.] become the law of the case. It becomes the condition on which the authority is to be exercised, the nonperformance of which will destroy the power." Again, he says: "The decree investing the commissioner with power to sell is held sufficient, if he conforms to the conditions of his authority." The circuit judge elaborates this view in his decretal order, that will accompany the report of this case. We concur in the views expressed by him. We suppose it is scarcely necessary that we should say, in announcing this conclusion, that no reflection is intended to be made upon the worthy gentleman who was master, and made this sale. His motives were praiseworthy, but he was guilty of an error. It may be stated, in passing, that great caution should be observed by officers charged with the duty of making sales under decrees of courts. We will not say that they are never justified in failing to sell on the day named in a decree without the authority of an order of court for that purpose. It is decidedly the safest and best course, however, to obtain such order. But for an officer who has failed to get such an order, of his own motion, to fix a new day for such sale, cannot be sanctioned. It is true, if all parties in interest had consented to this course, and the court had thereafter sanctioned it by the passage of an order, the error would have been cured. This ground of appeal is overruled, and for the same reasons the second ground of appeal is dismissed.

The third ground of appeal seems to us to be meritorious. In this case, everybody concerned acquiesces in the sale, except S. S. Tompkins. The purchaser has paid into court $1,625 of his money, a large part of which has been appropriated to the purposes of the action, under the decree of court. Now, if there is one thing, over others, in our system of jurisprudence, that merits the commendation of all, it must be the flexibility of the principles adopted by courts of equity, by which they are made to subserve the needs of each particular case. Ought not these principles to be applied here? It seems so to us. Under our law, William R. Parks, by being a successful bidder at the sale provided for by a decree in this cause, has, to a certain extent, become a party to this action. His money has been paid into court, and used for the purpose of the action,—under an honest mistake, it is true. Only one party to the action seeks any relief against him. The circuit judge orders a new sale, without any provision being made for his (Parks') protection. This is error, and must be rectified. After much reflection, we have concluded that a decretal order should be made on circuit, whereby the master should be directed to sell the homestead tract of land here in dispute, after 21 days' public advertisement, for one-half of the purchase money to be paid in cash, and the balance on a credit of 12 months,—the credit portion to be secured by bond of the purchaser, and a mortgage of the lands by the purchaser,—but that such sale shall, in the advertisement and in its conduct, provide that no bid will be received of less than $3,250, and that, if no more than $3,250 is bid at such sale, then the purchase by Parks shall be confirmed, but, if more than $3,250 is bid, that then the sale to Parks shall be annulled, his deed from the master for the premises shall be canceled and delivered up by him, and that he shall be paid the sum of $1,625 in cash, and have his bond and mortgage canceled by the master, and delivered to him, (Parks.) It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be modified as herein required, and that the cause be remanded to the circuit court, without any delay of the remittitur going down, for the purpose of having the circuit court prepare the decree in accordance with the directions of this court.

PEAKE, Master, v. YOUNG.

EQUITY — SALE BY ORDER OF COURT — POWER OF MASTER—SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—LIMITATIONS.

1. A decree in equity for the sale of land need not explicitly direct the execution of a conveyance by the master, as a direction to sell the land, and to take a bond and mortgage from the purchaser for part of the selling price, implies the duty of conveying.

2. A master sold land under a decree for part cash, with the balance secured by bond and mortgage, and entered the purchaser's name in the book of sales. The purchaser made the required cash payment, entered into possession, and subsequently refused to execute the bond and mortgage; and the term of office of the master expired before he took the bond and mortgage from the purchaser, and executed a conveyance. Held, that the book of sales, and the money paid by the purchaser, were transferred, under Gen. St. § 457, to the master's successor in office, who, though without power to convey, could maintain an action for specific performance of the contract, on the refusal of the purchaser to give the bond and mortgage.

3. In such action a decree may be rendered for the sale of the property to pay the purchase money, in case the purchaser further refuses to execute a bond and mortgage.

4. Such action is not barred by the statute of limitations applicable to an action at law for the recovery of the balance due on the purchase price.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Union county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Suit by Christopher H. Peake, as master of Union county, against John L. Young, for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. Decree for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the decree of James F. Izlar, P. J.:

"The history of this case, as developed by the pleadings and testimony, is as follows: James Munro, late master of Union county, on the sales day in January, 1883, sold, under a judgment duly obtained in this court in a cause entitled Thomas B. Jeter, as administrator of Andrew Wallace Thomson, deceased, plaintiff, against Aurelius Wallace Thomson, defendant, the lot of land described in the complaint herein. At said sale the said lot was bid off by and set down to John L. Young by the said master, and said defendant became the purchaser at the price of two hundred and twenty-five dollars. That the terms of the said sale were one-fourth cash, and the balance on a credit of one and two years; the credit portion to be secured by a bond of the purchaser bearing interest from the day of the sale, and a mortgage of the premises. The defendant paid to James Munro, master, the sum of fifty-six dollars and twenty-five cents, being the cash portion of the purchase money, and entered into the possession of the premises under his purchase, and has been ever since, and is now, in the possession and use of the same; but he has failed and neglected to comply with the terms of the sale, by executing his bond and mortgage for the credit portion of the purchase money, as required by the terms of sale, and the decree of the court under which said lot was sold. James Munro, late master, prepared the deed, bond, and mortgage, and was ready and willing to deliver the conveyance upon the execution of the bond and mortgage by defendant; but, in consequence of the failure of the defendant to execute the bond and mortgage, the conveyance was not delivered. The defendant sent a check to James Munro, master, for the two installments, not including the interest due thereon. This sum said master declined to accept in full satisfaction of the debt. James Munro went out of office in January, 1891. After the plaintiff, his successor, had qualified as master, he signed the deed of conveyance which had been previously prepared by him; and this deed, together with a deed signed by his successor in office, were duly tendered to the defendant, who refused to accept the same, and to execute his bond and mortgage, as required by the terms of sale. That the said James Munro was ready and willing at all times during his term of office to execute the deed of conveyance, as required by the decretal order which the land was sold, and to deliver the same upon the defendant's executing his bond and mortgage for the credit portion of the purchase money, as fixed by said decree, or upon his paying the credit portion of the purchase money and interest; and the plaintiff has also been ready and willing to do the same. The defendant raised no objection to the title of said property, but claimed that the estate of Andrew W. Thomson, deceased, was indebted to him. James Munro, knowing that the defendant was perfectly good for his contracts, and believing that he would comply with the terms of sale, took no steps to enforce it. The defendant made no absolute refusal to comply until just before action was commenced. On the 24th day of February, 1892, James Munro, as late master of Union county, executed the following paper to C. H. Peake, as master of said county: 'I, James Munro, late master of Union county, do hereby assign and transfer unto C. H. Peake, as master of said county, a certain agreement entered into on the 1st day of January, 1893, by John L. Young, with me, as master, for the purchase by said John L. Young of a lot of land containing four acres, more or less, in the town of Union, state of South Carolina, bounded,' etc. Action was commenced by the plaintiff on the 25th day of February, 1892. The case was heard by me at the October term, of 1892, of the court of common pleas for said county, the testimony being taken in open court. The defendant offered no testimony. The material allegations of the complaint are fully sustained by the evidence. The defendant, however, pleads the statute of limitations to the cause of action alleged in the plaintiff's complaint, and demurs orally on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff. These pleas raise serious questions, and demand more than casual consideration.

"The action is for specific performance. The specific performance of contracts is a branch of the equitable jurisdiction of the court of equity. This jurisdiction arises out of the inability of the courts of common law to enforce the actual performance of the contract. 'There are many cases,' says Mr. Fry in his work on Specific Performance, (page 1,) 'in which, though a contract is, in conscience, obligatory upon both parties to it, yet the common law, from the strictness of its forms, affords no remedy to the party injured by the nonperformance of the other. The defect of justice which would hence arise is avoided by the jurisdiction of equity, which, in such cases, compels the specific execution of the contract, if in other respects fit for the intervention of the court.' Again, (page 2:) 'The fact that the legal remedy has been lost by the default of the very party seeking the specific performance will not exclude the jurisdiction, if it be, notwithstanding, conscientious that the agreement should be performed, as in cases when the plaintiff has performed his part substantially, but not with such exactitude as to be able to plead performance at law.' That the court of equity would enforce specific performance of a contract like the present, I have no doubt.

"The rule in equity is different from that in law, in regard to the time in which a contract is to be performed. 'A court of equity discriminates between those terms of the contract which are formal, and a breach of which it would be inequitable in either party to insist on as a bar to the other's rights, and those which are of the substance and essence of the agreement; and, applying to contracts those principles which have governed its interferences in relation to mortgages, it has held time to be, prima facie, nonessential, and has accordingly granted specific performance of agreements after the time for their performance has been suffered to pass, by the party asking for the intervention of the court, if the party has not shown a determination not to proceed.' Fry, Spec. Perf. p. 312. It is clear to my mind, that the defendant in the present action, notwithstanding the lapse of time since his purchase and entry into the possession, could have maintained his action against James Munro, master, for specific performance of the contract to convey, at any time before he went out of office, in case he had offered to perform his part of the agreement, and said master had refused to execute the conveyance. In the case of Waters v. Travis, 9 Johns. 450, where, by a contract for the sale of land, the vendor was to convey at a time specified, and the vendee was, 'at the same time,' to secure the purchase money, and the vendee took possession under the contract, but no conveyance was executed, and the purchase money was not paid for fifteen years, it was held that the lapse of time was no objection to a decree for specific performance at the suit of the vendee. Fry, Spec. Perf. p. 322, note 13. If such lapse of time would not bar the vendee, one party to the contract, why should it bar the vendor, the other party? And that the vendor here is the court, acting through its agent, the master, can certainly make no difference. In Longworth v. Taylor, 1 McLean, 395, it was held that the parties might be considered as mortgagor and mortgagee, as the defendant's default has prevented them from occupying that position in law; that the plaintiff's equity was not extinguished by lapse of time; and that he had not been guilty of such negligence as to cut off his right to a decree for performance. So I hold in the present case. The plea of the statute of limitations, therefore, cannot prevail, under the circumstances of this case.

"But the difficulties in the case do not end here. The plaintiff is the successor in office to James Munro, late master, who made the sale, and who, as the agent of the court, was directed to execute the conveyance to the purchaser, the defendant. Has the plaintiff, then, such right and interest in the agreement entered into between his predecessor in office and the defendant, respecting the sale of said lot or parcel of land, as entitles him to maintain an action upon it for specific performance? Now, if the contract for the sale of said lot had been completed, and the bond and mortgage had been executed by the defendant to James Munro, master, and, not having been paid, had been turned over to his successor, the plaintiff, it is clear that he could have maintained an action of foreclosure to enforce the payment of the same. But here the contract was not completed by James Munro, plaintiff's predecessor. When the late master went out of office, he had, it is true, prepared the deed and other papers, but he had not signed the deed. He signed the deed after his authority to exercise the duties of the office of master had ceased. When his office ceased, his duties in connection with the office ceased. After this, he could perform no official act. His authority for making the sale, and executing a deed of conveyance to the purchaser, was contained in the decree under and by virtue of which he acted. Outside of said decree, he had no authority in connection with the sale and conveyance of said lot, and could exert none. When he went out of office, the sale was not completed; the deed had not been delivered. The making of the deed was a part of the act of selling. He was appointed by the court to make the sale. Therefore, he was the only person who could make the deed, without the further order of the court. Ror. Jud. Sales, § 427. Where a sale is made, by order of the court of equity, by the master, the court takes the matter into its own hands, and makes the sale for the parties. It directs, controls, and manages the whole proceeding, until the sale is, in all things, carried into effect. McKee v. Lineberger, 69 N. C. 240, cited by Ror. Jud. Sales, § 7, note 2. Had he signed the deed in the manner required by law, while in the exercise of the duties of his office, and in that shape the papers had been turned over to the plaintiff, as his successor in office, to be delivered by him to the defendant upon his completing the contract of purchase on his part, I think the plaintiff would have been warranted in completing the contract with the defendant by delivering to him the conveyance upon his executing and delivering to him, as master, the bond and mortgage required by the terms of sale, for under these circumstances the plaintiff would have been in position to have fulfilled the agreement on the part of the vendor, the court, by delivering the deed authorized by the decree. The transaction would, when executed, have related back, and have taken effect as of the time when it should have been completed; and such act of the master, upon being reported to the court, would, without doubt, have been confirmed by the court, as the court has complete control over the officers making a judicial sale, and the approval or disapproval of such sale rests in its sound discretion. But such was not the case. The deed was not signed by James Munro, late master, until after his successor, the plaintiff, had qualified, and taken possession of the office. But, even under these circumstances, I think the plaintiff had such a right and interest in the contract as would enable him to maintain an action for specific performance. While it is true that the master's office is created by statute, and he can only exercise the powers conferred by statute, and that there is no statute which authorizes and empowers the successor to the master who made the sale to execute a conveyance to the purchaser on his complying with the terms of the sale, and that the authority of the master who made the sale is derived from the decree under which the sale is made, yet it appears to me that the successor to the master who made the sale is at least invested with sufficient right and interest in the completed contract of sale as to enable him to compel the purchaser to comply with his contract. The act establishing the office of master, approved March 22, 1878, (16 St. p. 608,) provides that masters shall possess the powers, perform the duties, and be subject to the liabilities prescribed in and by the act of the general assembly passed in 1840, entitled 'An act to ascertain and define the powers, duties, and liabilities of masters, commissioners, registers in equity,' etc. Section 26 of the act of 1840 (11 St. p. 130) prescribes, among the duties required of masters, that, upon the expiration of the term of any master, he shall (within twenty days after his successor has received his commission) pay over, transfer, and deliver to his successor, all moneys, bonds, notes, certificates of stock, and other choses in action, or property, held by virtue of his office. The right to take proceedings in equity is an equitable chose in action. James Munro, late master, at the expiration of his term, had a right to bring an action in equity against the defendant to compel him to complete his contract of sale regarding the lot of land described in the complaint. This right of action, under the statute, passed to, and was transferred to, his successor. I have no doubt whatever that, had the present plaintiff reported to the court the status of the case under which the sale was made, the court would have had, under the circumstances of this case, authority to have ordered the present master, upon the defendant's complying with the terms of sale, to execute to him a deed of conveyance to the premises, and that upon this being done, and reported to the court, and the sale confirmed, it would have vested in the defendant the title to the lot, and determined all questions as to its regularity, and left nothing further to be considered and done in regard to it. Now, does the mere fact that this course was not pursued prevent the court from granting any relief in the present action? I hardly think so. It may have been better to have proceeded in the case in which the sale was made, and to have invoked a different process of the court to compel the defendant to comply with his contract. But, be this as it may, I hardly think that, under the broad and liberal rules of the court of equity, the plaintiff will be turned out of court, with the injunction: 'You have mistaken your remedy. You have no interest in this matter, which entitles you, under these proceedings, to the relief which you demand.'

"I know it is a well-settled principle that the court of equity will not compel specific performance unless it can at the time execute the whole contract on both sides, or at least such part of it as the court can ever be called on to perform. But, in the view I take of this case, no such difficulty is presented. The purchaser at a judicial sale becomes a party to the proceedings in which the sale is made. 'Now, whoever makes himself a party to the proceedings of a court of general jurisdiction, and undertakes to do a particular thing under its decretal orders, may be compelled to perform what he has undertaken. The proper tribunal to compel it is the same court, and by motion in the same cause, in which the undertaking occurred.' Ror. Jud. Sales, § 148. The purchaser at a judicial sale may be compelled to complete his purchase by rule to show cause why the property should not be resold at his risk, made in the case in which the property was sold; and in such case, when a resale is ordered, the former sale is not set aside, but the property is sold as the property of the former purchaser. If it brings more than the debt, he is entitled to the surplus. If it brings less, he is responsible for the deficiency. But, as I take it, rule to show cause in the action under which the land was sold is only one of the modes by which the purchaser may be compelled to complete his purchase. It appears to me, therefore, that, while the party seeking to compel the purchaser to complete his contract of purchase may proceed in a summary way, by rule to show cause in the case in which the sale was made, (and this, it would seem, is the usual and proper proceeding,) there is at the same time nothing to prevent the party from adopting the formal action of specific performance to compel the purchaser to specifically perform his contract. Although the defendant is in the possession of the lot of land, and has an equitable estate therein, nevertheless, the vendor still retains the legal title, 'and the vendee cannot prejudice that legal title, or do anything by which it shall be divested, except by performing the very obligation on his part which the retention of such title was intended to secure, namely by paying the price according to his contract.' 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1260. And the action here may be regarded simply as an action to compel the defendant to make payment of the purchase price of the lot within a specified time, according to the terms of his contract, or else foreclose the contract.

"I conclude, therefore, that, under the circumstances of this case, the delay in completing the contract of sale is attributable to the defendant, and it would be inequitable to allow him to avail himself of lapse of time as a defense; that there has been no laches on the part of the plaintiff subsequent to the absolute refusal of the plaintiff to complete his contract; that the plaintiff has such an equitable right and interest in the contract of sale as will entitle him to maintain this action; that the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and that the plaintiff is entitled to the relief which he demands. It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant specifically perform his agreement respecting the purchase of the lot of land described in the complaint, by executing his bond to the plaintiff, as master of this court, conditioned for the payment of one hundred and sixty-eight dollars and seventy-five cents, payable in two equal annual installments, with interest from the 1st day of January, 1883, payable annually,—that is to say, eighty-four dollars and thirty-seven cents on the 1st day of January, 1884, and all interest then due; and the remaining sum of eighty-four dollars and thirty-seven cents, and all interest then due, on the 1st day of January, 1885, together with a mortgage of said lot or parcel of land; and that the plaintiff, as master of this court, do at the same time execute to the defendant a deed of conveyance to said premises; and that, simultaneously with the delivery of said conveyance by the plaintiff to the defendant, the defendant deliver to the plaintiff the bond and mortgage hereinbefore ordered to be executed by him. That the cost of this action be paid by the defendant. It is further ordered and adjudged that, in case the defendant shall fail to execute and deliver the said bond and mortgage, or to pay the credit portion of the purchase money of said lot, with the interest due thereon, according to the terms of sale, on or before the 1st day of February, 1893, the said lot or parcel of land be sold on the sales day in March next, or on some convenient sales day thereafter, at Union courthouse, after due advertisement by the clerk of this court, for cash, the purchaser or purchasers to pay for papers, and, in case the purchaser or purchasers shall fail to comply with the terms of sale, the said premises to be resold on the same sales day, or on some subsequent sales day, on the same terms, and at the former purchaser or purchasers' risk; that in case of sale the said clerk shall, out of the proceeds, pay first the costs and expenses of sale, and the cost of this action, then the amount due to the plaintiff for principal and interest on his debt, and, if there be a surplus, that he pay said surplus to the defendant, but in case the proceeds of sale be insufficient to pay the debt and interest of the plaintiff, in full, that the defendant pay such deficiency to the plaintiff."

D. A. Townsend, for appellant. William Munro, for respondent.

POPE, J. This action was brought to a hearing before his honor, Judge Izlar, in the court of common pleas for Union county, at the October term, 1892; and the decree of the court having been rendered on the 3d of January, 1893, in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant has appealed therefrom on 28 grounds, to wit, that the circuit judge erred in finding: (1) That James Munro, Esq., was ready and willing at all times during his term of office to execute the deed of conveyance, as required by the decretal order under which the land was sold, and to deliver the same, upon the defendant's executing his bond and mortgage for the credit portion of the purchase money of said land. (2) That said deed was not delivered because of defendant's failure to execute such bond and mortgage. (3) That the defendant made no absolute refusal to comply till just before action was commenced, and in not finding and decreeing the contrary. (4) That the material allegations of the complaint are fully sustained by the evidence. (5) That the action is one for specific performance. (6) That the court of equity would enforce the specific performance of a contract like the present one. (7) That the rule in equity is different from that in law in regard to the time in which a contract is to be performed. (8) That the plea of the statute of limitations could not prevail, under the circumstances of this case. (9) That the plaintiff is the successor in office of James Munro, as late master for said county. (10) That James Munro, as late master, was directed by the court to make a deed of conveyance of said land to the purchaser thereof. (11) That there was a sale of said land to the defendant. (12) That if James Munro, Esq., as master, as aforesaid, had signed the deed, as required by law, while in the exercise of the duties of his office, to be delivered by him to the defendant, Young, upon his complying with the contract of purchase on his part, the plaintiff would have been warranted in completing the contract by delivering to defendant the said conveyance, upon defendant's executing the bond and mortgage required by terms of sale, and that the plaintiff would have been, under these circumstances, in a position to have fulfilled the agreement on the part of the vendor, and that the transaction would have related back, and have taken effect as of the time when it should have been completed, and that such act would have been confirmed by the court. (13) That, under the circumstances of this case, the plaintiff has such right and interest in the contract as would entitle him to maintain an action for specific performance. (14) That the successor in office of the master who made the sale is invested with sufficient right and interest in the uncompleted sale to enable him to compel the purchaser to comply with his contract. (15) That the act of the legislature approved March 22, 1878, (16 St. at Large, p. 608,) and cited by his honor as if in 18 St. at Large, p. 608, applies to the present case. (16) That the duties of James Munro, as late master as aforesaid, were governed by the said act of the legislature of 1841. (18) That the right to take proceedings in equity is such chose in action as is mentioned in the act of 1841. (19) That Munro, late master, at the expiration of his term of office, had a right to bring an action in equity against the defendant to compel him to complete his contract, and that this right passed to, and was transferred to, the plaintiff. (20) That, notwithstanding the irregularity in this case, the court can grant relief therein. (21) That this action may be regarded as an action to foreclose a contract, and that the plaintiff had a right to enforce it. (22) That there were no laches on the part of the plaintiff or of James Munro, as late master. (23) That the delay in completing the contract was attributable to the defendant, even after the absolute refusal of the defendant to comply. (24) That the complaint states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. (25) That the plaintiff is entitled to the relief demanded in the complaint. (26) That his honor further erred in adjudging and decreeing that the defendant specifically perform said alleged agreement respecting the said purchase, by executing and delivering his bond to the plaintiff, as master of this court, conditioned for the payment of $168.75, payable in two equal annual installments, with interest from the 1st day of January, 1883, payable annually: that is to say, $84.37 on the 1st day of January, 1884, and all interest then due, and the remaining sum of $84.37, and all interest then due, on the 1st day of January, 1885, together with a mortgage of said lot. (27) That the defendant pay the costs of this action. (28) That in case the defendant failed to execute and deliver said bond and mortgage, or failed to pay the credit portion of the said purchase money, said lot be sold by the master.

Before undertaking to consider in their order the numerous grounds of appeal here presented for our consideration, it may not be amiss to recall some of the facts upon which this action is predicated, although they are very fully and accurately set forth in the decree of the circuit judge, which decree, in full, will accompany this case. James Munro, as master for Union county, under a decree of the court of common pleas, on its equity side, exposed for sale at public auction a lot of land containing four acres, situated in the town of Union, and constituting a part of the real estate owned by Dr. A. Wallace Thomson at the time of his death, on the first Monday of January, 1883, for one-fourth of the purchase money to be paid in cash, and the balance on a credit of one and two years, in equal installments, with interest on the credit portion from the 1st January, 1883, and at such sale the defendant, John L. Young, became the purchaser, at the price of $225. Col. Young paid the one-fourth of his bid in cash to the master, but, although requested by said master to complete his purchase, neglected so to do. He, however, offered to pay this credit portion to the master, but refused to pay any interest. His offer was declined by the master. Thus the matter stood (Young being in possession of the land) until 1891, (January,) when the present plaintiff, Christopher H. Peake, was duly appointed master for Union. Although the law contemplated a surrender by Munro to Peake, within less than 30 days after Peake duly qualified as such master, of all the assets of the office of the master, yet, no doubt by an arrangement between these gentlemen,—the outgoing and incoming master,—Mr. Munro did not formally assign the contract of Young for his said purchase until early in the year 1892. Efforts were then made by both these gentlemen to induce Col. Young to close up this matter by giving his bond and mortgage. They tendered to him deeds for the lot of land in question. At last, Col. Young flatly refused to comply with his bid, still holding possession of the lot of land in question. Peake, as master, then brought this action against Young, as defendant, reciting all the foregoing facts, and demanding a judgment of the court against the defendant, by which the defendant should be required to perform said agreement, and pay to the plaintiff the balance of the purchase money, with interest thereon, and costs, and, upon his failure to do so, that the premises be sold, and the proceeds of sale applied to the payment of the same, and the costs, and that the defendant be required to pay any deficiency. In his answer the defendant admits that he bid off said land at the sale thereof made by Munro as master, and that he paid the one-fourth of the purchase money, but denies all the other allegations. The defendant further pleads that the cause of action did not arise within the six years immediately preceding the commencement of plaintiff's action. He also presented an oral demurrer that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Judge Izlar heard the testimony in open court. The plaintiff alone introduced testimony. The defendant offered none. The testimony offered corroborated all these facts pleaded in the complaint. By his decree, Judge Izlar adjudged that the defendant should perform his contract of purchase, in accordance with the terms of the original decree for sale; that the plaintiff, as master, should execute and deliver to the defendant a deed of conveyance of the premises, but that said deed should be delivered simultaneously with the execution of bond and mortgage by defendant; and for costs to be paid by defendant. However, in case the defendant failed to complete his observance of his duty in the premises by either executing the bond and mortgage, or by paying in cash, on or before 1st February, 1893, that the lot of land should be sold by the master on sales day in March, 1893, or on some convenient sales day thereafter, and apply the proceeds of sale to the payment of the costs of the action, and to the satisfaction of the amount due by Col. Young on his contract of purchase, and in case of deficiency the defendant shall pay the same.

The 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th grounds of appeal relate to the findings of fact by the circuit judge. The rule announced by this court so often sanctions such findings by the circuit judge, unless without any testimony to support them, or when such findings are manifestly against the weight of the testimony. A careful study of the testimony, as set out in the case, convinces us that the circuit judge has made no mistake here, and therefore these four grounds of appeal are dismissed.

By reading the allegations of the complaint, it is manifest that the action is one for the specific performance of a contract, and therefore the fifth ground of appeal is dismissed; but, even if this action should be held not to come within the strict rules in equity governing instances when that court would decree a specific performance of the contract, still the plaintiff would not be without a remedy in a court of equity, as we shall hereafter undertake to maintain, and hence the sixth ground of appeal is not meritorious.

Now, as to the ninth ground of appeal, it must be dismissed, for when the legislature of this state created the office of master for Union county and devolved upon the officer (master) duties similar to those exercised in most respects by commissioners in equity under our former statutes, and James Munro was duly appointed such master for Union county, whose term of office having expired on 1st January, 1891, at which time the plaintiff was commissioned and qualified as master, of course such plaintiff became the successor in office of the said James Munro. Where the court of equity for Union county ordered the master, who was at that time James Munro, to sell the land in dispute, although no words of explicit direction were then used for James Munro, as said master, to execute a conveyance of the land to the purchaser thereof, the law implies the grant of such power by the court. The direction to sell, and take the bond and mortgage from the purchaser, imports the duty of conveying to such purchaser. Young v. Teague, Bailey, Eq. 22. Also, section 790 of the General Statutes of this state. The tenth ground of appeal must therefore be dismissed.

The proof in this case was overwhelming, and without any contradiction,—indeed, the answer of defendant admitted,—that at the sale of this land the defendant was not only entered upon the book of sales kept by the master as the purchaser, but the defendant actually paid a part of the purchase money. The eleventh ground of appeal must therefore be dismissed.

The twelfth ground of appeal relates to the enunciation by the circuit court of a sound piece of law, not applying, however, to the state of facts proved in this case, for James Munro did not execute any deed of conveyance to the defendant during his term of office. If he had done so, there would exist no necessity for the execution of a new deed by the present master. This ground of appeal is dismissed. Besides all this, when the decree appealed from is read as a whole, objections here raised are shown to be groundless. We scarcely deem it necessary to name and consider separately, and in their order, the 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 18th, 19th, 21st, 22d, 23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, and 28th grounds of appeal, though we shall not overlook any of them.

Let us examine carefully some of the elements that go to make up as much of the present controversy as we now purpose considering, and which are connected with these grounds of appeal. The condition of the estate of the late Dr. Wallace Thomson rendered it necessary that the personal assets of his estate in the hands of his administrators for the payment of such intestate's debts should be reinforced or aided by the sale of the lands owned by such intestate at his death. The law having transferred the title to such lands to the only heir at law of the intestate, Aurelius Wallace Thompson, a complaint was filed on the equity side of the court of common pleas for Union county by such administrator, against such heir at law, setting forth this necessity for the sale of such lands; and, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, sale by the master, of such lands, was ordered. We need not repeat that the terms of such decretal order required the master to sell for one-fourth in cash, and the balance on a credit. Now, when John L. Young purchased the four acres in dispute, and his name was duly entered upon the book of sales by the master, he became amenable to the control of that court in that cause. He became, so to speak, a party to that cause. Ror. Jud. Sales, § 148; Tompkins v. Tompkins, (S. C.) 18 S. E. Rep. 233. Such purchaser could have been proceeded against by rule to show cause why he had not complied with his bid. Halg v. Commissioners, 1 Desaus. Eq. 112. If James Munro, while master, had prayed for such process,—rule to show cause,—it would have been the easiest and speediest course, but this was not done. Munro ceased to be master on 1st January, 1891, and the present plaintiff became entitled, as his successor, to the moneys on hand, books, papers, etc., of the office. Section 457 of the General Statutes of this state. Now, the book of sales was transferred, and also the money paid by the defendant on his contract of purchase; so that the present plaintiff was, in the eye of the law, clothed with all the rights of his predecessor in office, as against Young. The plaintiff, under a misconception of his powers, offered to convey to Young; but, without an order therefor, he was powerless in this respect, for he had not made the sale. Thus we have before us a valid power in the master, Munro, to sell to Young; an actual contract by Young to purchase; the payment by Young of a part of the purchase money on his contract to purchase; the fact that Young had been let into possession of the land; no power in Munro to convey after he ceased to be master; no power in Peake, his successor, to convey; and no refusal on the part of Young to complete his purchase until after Peake had qualified, and entered upon the duties of his office, as master, as the successor in office of Munro. What power over this land did Young have? He was in possession, and had paid part of the purchase money. What power in his office, as master, did Peake have, to force Young to comply?

Where one, under a contract to purchase, is let into possession of land, and from any cause the owner of the fee declines to go further in the proposed sale, such possession of the would-be purchaser, is, in the eye of the law, after such declination of the owner, merely permissive of the true owner, and the relation of tenant at will is created by the law, as to such would-be purchaser's possession; but where one is let into possession under a contract to sell, evidence of which contract to purchase is reduced to writing, and such purchaser has paid part of the purchase money, a different rule prevails. In the latter case, the one who sells, and who holds the title, is declared to hold the title in trust for the purchaser, and the purchaser has an equitable claim for title, and, in addition, the vendor holds the legal title to protect his money due. As the doctrine is stated by Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, in section 1260, when, speaking of a vendor before delivery of title, though possession has been surrendered to the vendee, he says: "In the latter, although possession may have been delivered to the vendee, and although, under the doctrine of conversion, the vendee may have acquired an equitable estate, yet the vendor retains the legal title, and the vendee cannot prejudice that legal title, or do anything by which it shall be divested, except by performing the very obligation on his part which the retention of the legal title was intended to secure,—namely, by paying the price according to the terms of the contract." So, in the case at bar, while Young, under his contract to purchase, evidenced by the entry on the sales book of the master, Munro, payment of part of the purchase money under such contract, and being let into possession of the land sold, has the right to treat the legal title as being held as his equitable estate, yet he has no legal title to the land, and cannot have, until the payment of the purchase money under his contract for such purchase. But the vendor has the right to enforce the payment of such purchase money, and cannot be called upon to convey the legal title until such payment is made. Now, here, who has created a breach of duty? Is it not, clearly, Young, the purchaser? Did the master, acting for the court, ever refuse to make title if Young would comply with his contract for this purchase? The court of common pleas, sitting as a court of equity, has complete control of this sale; and inasmuch as justice to all parties concerned required an allegation of the facts should be made to the court, in order that the rights and interests of all concerned should be subserved, and as the pleadings in an action, and testimony thereunder, are the methods recognized in law, whereby these results may follow, we can see no good reason for withholding our approval of the plaintiff's course to the defendant, by instituting this action. Defendant seems to question plaintiff's course without an order therefor. Parties in interest, such as creditors, might raise such a question, as the master, to a certain extent, is trustee for them. He is to receive, under the law, payment from the purchaser; and we cannot view with disapproval his honest efforts, in a legal manner, to enforce a payment so long delayed by this defendant.

We do not feel called upon—nor do we deem it pertinent to a proper decision of the legitimate issues growing out of this action, for us—to decide whether the act of 1840 governs the master, or his predecessor in office. We fail to find such irregularity on the plaintiff's part, in this action, as to shut him off from the relief he seeks, for it seems to us he has waited but a reasonably short time on the defendant, Young, before he tried conclusions with him in court. The patient forbearance of Munro seems to have been wasted upon the defendant here. Indeed, the previous master, Munro, was entirely too patient. His duty would have been better answered by a prompt report to the court of this negligence of Young. This waiting policy has nothing to commend it, where the rights of others may be jeopardized. Let all these exceptions we have enumerated under this branch of the discussion be overruled.

We also agree with the circuit judge in the matter embraced in the twenty-first exception. We see no reason why this action may not be regarded in the nature of a foreclosure. This exception is overruled.

As to the twenty-seventh exception, it may be remarked that in chancery cases it is usually in the discretion of the circuit judge to affix the liability for costs when he makes up his decree. If we chose to express an opinion, we would venture the remark that the defendant richly deserves this penalty for his long-continued and persistent neglect of duty.

Before leaving the case, we should state that when the circuit judge, in his decree, provided that if the defendant failed to deliver his bond and mortgage, or failed to pay the credit portion of said purchase money, said lot should be sold by the master, he evinced a nice regard to the rights of others, as affected by the defendant. When the defendant admitted in his answer that he did bid off that parcel of land sold under an order of court, and had paid part of the purchase money, and these facts were supplemented by the facts proved at the trial, the circuit judge was justified in this order.

The statute of limitations, interposed by the defendant, might have been of some benefit to him, if plaintiff had been unwise enough to sue him for the money due, on the law side of the court; but here, in analogy to the action of the court when a mortgage is being foreclosed, (Gibbes v. Railroad Co., 13 S. C. 253; McCaughrin v. Williams, 15 S. C. 505; Nichols v. Briggs, 18 S. C. 484,) the lapse of six years is of no avail. And it is well recognized as a principle of equity that the same rule that obtains in a court of law does not find admission in a court of equity, when such issues are raised as are here presented. The authorities cited in the circuit decree seem to be conclusive on this point. See, also, the case of Blackwell v. Ryan, 21 S. C. 123. All the exceptions of defendant are overruled. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McIVER, C. J., and McGOWAN, J., concur.

MOORE v. TRIMMIER et al.

APPEAL—REMAND AND PROCEEDINGS BELOW.

A case involving the order in which several tracts of land, owned by different parties, should be subjected to the satisfaction of a judgment, was decided by the supreme court on the theory that the judgment was a lien on the land of S., as appeared by the record on appeal. Plaintiff, an owner of one of the pieces of land subject to the judgment, applied for a rehearing, alleging that the court had overlooked the fact that the lien on the land of S. had been released, which was denied. The petition of S. for an amendment of the record to show this fact, and for a rehearing, was also denied, but he was permitted to make such application as he might be advised in the lower court. The case was then remanded for ascertainment of certain equities. Thereafter, an order of the supreme court permitted plaintiff to raise in the lower court the issue of damages resulting from the release of the lien of the judgment on the land of S. Held, that this order could not avail plaintiff, for the reason, if there were no other, that the lower court thereafter, by consent of all parties, entered an order, on application of S., which, after reciting that prior to the commencement of the action the lien of the judgment on the land of S. had been released, and that this fact was not brought to the attention of the court at the former hearing, discharged it, but further provided that it was not to affect the rights of any of the other parties to the action, "as heretofore determined * * * by the judgment of the supreme court."

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Spartanburg county; James F. Izlar, Judge.

Action by Baxter H. Moore against Margaret L. Trimmier, administratrix, and others, to enjoin the sale of certain land to satisfy a judgment before certain other land was exhausted. A judgment of the supreme court on a former appeal (11 S. E. 548, 552, 32 S. C. 511) determined the order in which the different pieces of property involved could be proceeded against, and remanded the case for the ascertainment of certain equities. From a judgment determining these values, and finding that the judgment could be enforced against plaintiff's property for a certain amount, plaintiff appeals.

R. K. Carson and Duncan & Sanders, for appellant. Bomar & Simpson, for respondents.

McIVER, C. J. This is the second appeal in this case, and for a detailed statement of the facts of the case, as originally presented, reference must be had to 32 S. C. 511, 11 S. E. 548, 552, where the same are fully set forth. It is sufficient to say that one of the main questions presented by the former appeal was as to the order in which the lands of John Winsmith, the judgment debtor,—which were covered by various mortgages, and some of which had been sold by such debtor to different persons at different times,—should be subjected to the payment of the Trimmier judgment, which was confessedly the oldest lien on all of the lands. The court, having determined the order in which the several tracts of land should be subjected to the payment of the Trimmier judgment,—making the equity of redemption which still remained in the judgment debtor, in the Tom Wofford tract, at the time of the sales to Mills & Hunter, first liable, before resorting to the two tracts last mentioned, but not thinking it just that the amount thereof should be tested by the sale of the Tom Wofford tract, subsequently made, under the judgment of foreclosure of the Floyd mortgage, which covered both the Tom Wofford tract and the Nimrod Moore tract, for the reasons stated in the former opinion,—directed that the amount or value of such equity of redemption should be ascertained by testimony; and the same inquiry was directed as to the value of the equity of redemption in the 7-acre tract and in the 20-acre tract. When the case was remanded to the circuit court for the purpose of making the inquiries as directed, by consent of all parties defendant, an order was passed by that court on the 2d of August, 1892, directing that it be referred to the master "to take testimony, and decide all issues now existing, or that can be properly and legally raised, between the parties to this action, or any of them, and that he make his report thereon to this court, with leave to any party to this action to file exceptions to said report." In pursuance of this order the master took the testimony which is set out in the case, and made his report, likewise set out, to which exceptions were filed by the plaintiff, as well as by the defendant Trimmier. The case was heard by his honor, Judge Izlar, upon this report and the exceptions, who rendered judgment overruling all the exceptions but one, and confirming the report as modified by this exception, which will be hereinafter explained. From this judgment, plaintiff appeals upon the several grounds set out in the record, but which we do not deem it necessary to set out in detail.

Before going into any discussion of the questions raised by the appeal, it may be well to state certain other facts appearing in the case, and in the report of the former appeal. The opinion in the former appeal was filed on the 17th of April, 1890, and in due time two petitions for a rehearing were filed,—one by the plaintiff, a copy of which is set out in the case prepared for the argument of this appeal, and the other by C. Eber Smith, one of the defendants. On the 2d May, 1890, the petition of the plaintiff was dismissed, and on the same day this court made a special order, the terms of which may be seen by reference to 32 S. C., at pages 527, 528, 11 S. E. 552, 553,—and which should be carefully examined, for a proper understanding of the present appeal,—whereby the petition was dismissed without prejudice to the right of the petitioner to make such application as he may be advised to the circuit court for relief. It will be observed that in granting this order this court was unusually careful to avoid committing itself upon the question whether the petitioner, Smith, could then obtain the relief sought, but left that question entirely open, to be first decided by the circuit court, with the right of either party to appeal from such decision. In pursuance of this order, application was made to the circuit court, and an order was granted on the 13th of February, 1892, by consent of all parties to this action, which, after reciting that prior to the commencement of this action the judgment creditor, Trimmier, had released the Nimrod Moore tract, owned by C. Eber Smith, from the lien of his judgment, and that the fact of such release having been executed was not brought to the attention of the court at the former hearing, discharged the Nimrod Moore tract from the lien of the Trimmier judgment. This order, however, contains these words, "it is further ordered and adjudged that this order and judgment is not to affect and disturb the rights of any of the other parties to this action, as heretofore fixed or determined or fixed by the judgment of the supreme court," which are italicised by us, as having, in our judgment, an important bearing upon the questions presented by the present appeal. It furthermore appears that, a short time before the granting of the order of the circuit court just mentioned, an order was obtained from this court, on the 25th of January, 1892, allowing the respondent,—the present appellant,—on the reference heretofore ordered by this court, "to raise the issue of damage to him resulting from the release of C. E. Smith's land from the lien of said judgment, and to set up the equity of credit of the value of Smith's land on said judgment before enforcing it against that of respondent." 35 S. C. 606, 15 S. E. 800. But this court was again careful to avoid committing itself upon the question thus permitted to be raised.

From this recital of the leading circumstances of this somewhat complicated case, supplemented by the facts stated in the former decision above referred to, it seems to us clear that the master took the proper view of his functions in the case, and that all he had authority to do, under the former decision, was to ascertain the true value of the equity of redemption in the Tom Wofford tract and in the 7-acre and 20-acre tracts in the manner prescribed by the former decision, and that his only error, which was rectified by the circuit judge, was in not finding that Trimmier could enforce his judgment, to the extent of $723.50, against the Tom Wofford tract; that being the value of the equity of redemption in that tract, as found by the master, and confirmed by the circuit judge. That result followed necessarily from the former decision, by which it was adjudged that the equity of redemption in the Tom Wofford tract, whatever it might be, should be subjected to the judgment before resorting either to the Mills or Hunter land. It does not seem to us that the order of this court, permitting the present appellant to raise the issue of damage resulting to him from the release of the lien of the Trimmier judgment on Smith's Nimrod Moore tract, can now avail the appellant, for the reason, if there were no other, that, after such order was granted, the order of the circuit court, consented to by all the parties, as is therein recited, and not contradicted by anything that we can find in the case, was granted upon the express condition that such order was not to affect or disturb the rights of any of the other parties to this action, as heretofore determined, as appears by the words hereinbefore italicized, extracted from said order. There was therefore no release of the lien on the Nimrod Moore tract, except upon that condition; and, as appellant's claim rests solely upon such release, it cannot be sustained, except upon the observance of the condition upon which such release was granted, to wit, that the rights of none of the parties should be affected thereby. Indeed, as it seems to us, all of appellant's exceptions, unless it be those designed to raise questions of fact, which are concluded by the concurring judgment of the master and the referee, really raise questions which have already been adjudicated by the former decision in this very case. Now, while this court is quite ready to concede its liability to err, yet, being the tribunal appointed by law for the final adjudication of the legal rights of litigants, when, after due and careful deliberation, it reaches a final judgment unanimously, such judgment should and must be respected as final. In this particular case, this court, after careful and anxious consideration, reached its conclusion and announced its judgment, and then, upon a petition for a rehearing, after a careful review of the case, found no reason to change its conclusion. "Interest republicæ ut sit finis litium."

But we cannot forbear to add that we are not yet convinced that there was any error in the former decision under the facts thus presented, which alone we had any authority to consider. Indeed, if there was any error in the former decision, it was due to the failure of the parties to bring before the court certain facts having an important bearing on the questions presented for decision; notably, the failure to bring before the court the fact that the lien of the Trimmer judgment upon the Nimrod Moore tract had been released before the commencement of this action. So, too, the court did not know, and had no means of ascertaining from the record upon which this case was originally heard, (to which alone resort could properly be had,) that the judgment for the foreclosure of the Floyd mortgage contained a provision that the Tom Wofford tract should first be exhausted before resorting to the Nimrod Moore tract; and, even if that fact had appeared, it is more than questionable whether such a provision could affect the rights of Trimmer, who was not a party to that action for foreclosure. We are not by any means prepared to admit that the fact that C. E. Smith bought, for full value, as

as it now appears, the Nimrod Moore tract, before the judgment of foreclosure of the Floyd mortgage was rendered, would have the effect now claimed for it by appellant, in view of the further fact that, at the time of such purchase, Smith took from the mortgagor a mortgage of another tract, the value of which has never yet been ascertained by any evidence brought before us, for the purpose of indemnifying himself from any loss which he might sustain by reason of the mortgage covering the Nimrod Moore tract. In the absence of any evidence showing the insufficiency of the indemnity thus demanded and obtained when he bought the Nimrod Moore tract, the natural inference would be that it was sufficient; and, if so, then it might be very difficult to establish Smith's equity to throw the whole mortgage debt upon the Tom Wofford tract, especially when that would result in detriment to others. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

CHERAW & C. R. CO. v. MARSHALL.

JUDGMENT—REVIVOR—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES.

1. Act of 1873 gave a judgment lien for 10 years from the date of entry, and contained a provision (Code, § 310) "that plaintiff may at any time, in three years after its active energy has expired, revive the judgment by service of summons on the debtor as provided by law;" but such provision was omitted from the act of 1885, relating to the revival of judgments. Held, that a judgment entered in 1879 could be revived in 1891 under the provision of the act of 1873, as the act of 1885 was prospective in its operation.

2. Though the act of 1873 contains no express provision for the revival of a judgment against the executor of a deceased judgment debtor, the word "debtor," in the phrase "by service of summons on the debtor," includes the personal representative of a deceased judgment debtor.

3. The provision of the act of 1873 (Code, § 310) relating to the revival of judgments, and the provision of such act (Code, § 311) relating to the renewal of executions, are identical, except that section 311 substitutes "his heirs, executors, and administrators" for the phrase "as provided by law," in section 310. Held, that the phrase "as provided by law" should be construed to provide for the revival of a judgment against the executor of a deceased judgment debtor, as the right to revive an execution necessarily involves the right to revive the judgment.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Lancaster county; W. H. Wallace, Judge.

Rule by the Cheraw & Chester Railroad Company, for James T. Marshall, as executor of John W. Marshall, deceased, to show cause why a judgment against deceased should not be revived. Rule dismissed. The judgment creditor appeals. Reversed.

R. E. & R. B. Allison, for appellant. Jones & Williams, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. It seems that the plaintiff company, on or about September 29, 1879, entered a judgment for $200 and costs against one John W. Marshall, who was then living, but departed this life April 16, 1887, leaving in full force a will, of which James T. Marshall qualified as executor; and afterwards, on December 10, 1891, the plaintiff company caused to be issued against James T. Marshall, as executor as aforesaid, a summons to show cause, if any he could, why the said "judgment should not be revived and renewed against him as the executor of the last will and testament of the said John W. Marshall, deceased, according to the form, force, and effect of the former recovery."

James T. Marshall, the executor, showed for cause, by written answer, as follows: "(1) That no such judgment as that described above was ever entered against the defendant as such executor. (2) That this is not the proper proceeding to procure the entry 'revival or renewal' of a judgment against the defendant as such executor, or against John W. Marshall, defendant's testator. (3) That, if it is sought herein to revive a judgment entered against John W. Marshall, defendant's testator, in favor of the Cheraw & Chester Railroad Company, on or about September 26, 1879, as described in the summons herein, then this defendant shows that such judgment was originally entered more than ten years previous to the service of the summons herein, and that the same cannot now be revived in this proceeding, or otherwise. (4) That the said judgment has been paid," etc.

Upon the hearing, his honor, Judge Wallace, dismissed the rule, in the following order: "After hearing the return by the said executor, and it appearing that the said judgment debtor was dead at the time of the issuance of the summons herein, and after hearing argument of counsel, it is considered and adjudged by the court that there is no provision in the act of 1873 for service of summons to revive judgment on the executor of the judgment debtor; and it appearing that the said judgment was obtained on the 26th of September, 1879, and must be revived, if at all, under the act of 1873, therefore, on motion, it is ordered and adjudged that 'good cause' has been shown why said judgment should not be revived, and that said summons or rule be dismissed," etc.

The plaintiff company appeals from this order, upon the following grounds: "First. Because the circuit judge, it is respectfully submitted, erred therein, in holding that there is no provision in the act of 1873 for service of summons to revive judgment on the executor of the judgment debtor. Second. Because he erred therein in ruling that said judgment, being obtained on September 26, 1879, must be revived, if at all, under the act of 1873, and that it cannot be revived thereunder. Third. Because he erred in not holding that said judgment, obtained at the time named, could be revived, under the act of 1873, by service of summons on James T. Marshall, as executor of the last will and testament of John W. Marshall, deceased, the said John W. being then dead. Fourth. Because he erred in holding that there was no law for the revival of a judgment recovered at the time mentioned, except the act of 1873, and that this act was defective, in that it contained no provision for the service of a summons to revive on the executor of a deceased judgment debtor. Fifth. Because he erred in ruling that the act of 1885, and other acts subsequent to 1873, were no authority to authorize 'the service of the summons' on the executor of the judgment debtor. Sixth. Because he erred in holding that there was no law or authority for the revival of said judgment in the courts of this state. Seventh. Because the judge erred in concluding that 'good cause' was shown why said judgment should not be revived, when no evidence was offered against the judgment, and no showing made to counteract the record of same. Eighth. Because, the judgment being good, and no payments on the same, it is unjust in the executor, James T. Marshall, to resist its enforcement, and he should be made to pay the costs of this litigation," etc.

As we understand it, there are but two questions in the case:

First. Was the rule to revive the judgment and renew the execution made in time? The judgment was rendered after 1873, and while the act of that date was the law as to judgments and executions. It gave to a judgment a lien for 10 years from the date of its entry, with this supplemental provision: "Provided, however, that the plaintiff may, at any time, in three years, after its active energy has expired, revive the judgment, with like lien as in the original, for a like period, by service of a summons on the debtor, as provided by law," requiring him to show cause, etc. This provision was omitted in the act of 1885, which was before the 10 years of plaintiff's lien had expired; but this court has held that the latter act (1885) was not intended to apply to judgments previously obtained, and therefore, as we think, the plaintiff had 3 years in addition to the original 10, within which to make application to revive its judgment, and that carried the right down to September, 1892, and before that time, viz. on December 10, 1891, the rule to show cause, etc., was filed, so that the rule was in time. King v. Belcher, 30 S. C. 381, 9 S. E. 359; Ex parte Witte Bros., 32 S. C. 226, 10 S. E. 950.

Second. But the judge further held that as the judgment could only be revived under the act of 1873, and that made no provision for the service of summons on the executor of the judgment debtor, there was no authority whatever for reviving the judgment against the executor. It is true that the act of 1873, in the section we are considering, does not in express terms give the right to serve summons to revive a judgment on the executor of a deceased defendant in execution; nor, as to that matter, does it expressly give the right to the executor of a creditor, in the case of his death, to issue such a summons. But we cannot suppose that the law makers, in the very act of giving the right to revive, intended to deny it in all cases where either party to the record was dead. On the contrary, we cannot doubt that, properly construed, the act does substantially give the right. The words are, "by service of a summons on the debtor." Now, it seems to us that, in view of the manifest intention, the word "debtor" was here used as a generic term, in condensed and general form, to embrace all proceedings necessary to carry into effect the interest on that side, on the familiar principle that, upon the death of a party, his rights or obligations devolve on his personal representatives. This was not an original proceeding against the executor individually, but a step in regard to an obligation incurred by the testator in his lifetime.

Besides, what meaning should be given to the words which immediately follow,—"by service of a summons on the debtor, as provided by law?" It cannot be supposed that the words "as provided by law" were used without some purpose, and it could not have been considered necessary simply to declare that the manner of service on the debtor should be legal, for that was involved in the requirement itself. But it may have been considered proper to use an expression so comprehensive "as provided by law," in order to meet some such state of facts as has occurred here, in the death of the defendant in execution, making it necessary to revive the judgment against his executor, "as required by law." The same act of 1873 not only contains the provision we have been considering as to "reviving judgments," which is 310 of the Code, but also another provision as to the renewing of executions, which is now 311 of the Code. It will be observed, as to "service on the debtor," these two provisions are identical, except for the phrase, in 310, "as provided by law," is substituted, in 311, that of "his heirs, executors, and administrators." We cannot conceive a reason for allowing an execution to be renewed if the judgment on which it issued could not be revived. "The judgment and execution on it are very closely connected. The execution is only process to enforce the judgment, and it cannot have active energy unless the underlying judgment has a lien. The questions as to them are in one sense identical. The claim to renew the execution necessarily involves the right to revive the judgment." See Adams v. Richardson, 32 S. C. 139, 10 S. E. 931; Leitner v. Metz, 32 S. C. 387, 10 S. E. 1082; Bolt v. Dawkins, 16 S. C. 198. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded to the circuit court, for such further proceedings as may be deemed proper.

STATE v. JONES et al.

HABEAS CORPUS—ISSUANCE—HEARING—CONTINUANCE—RETURN—EVIDENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. Under Code, § 1635, providing that, where it appears from the return to a writ of habeas corpus that the party named therein is detained on any criminal accusation, the court may, if he think proper, make no order for the discharge of such party until sufficient notice of the time and place at which the writ shall have been returned or shall be made returnable be given to the district solicitor of the county in which the person prosecuting the writ is detained, the court may, on the return to such writ, continue the cause for a day, to give the solicitor time to examine into it.

2. Where, on the return to a writ of habeas corpus, it appeared that petitioners were in custody on a mittimus, regular in every way, from a justice, for failure to give bond for their appearance at the next term of the superior court to answer a criminal charge of which that court had jurisdiction, the burden was on petitioners to show wherein their detention was illegal, and not on the state to show that they were lawfully in custody, the production of the mittimus being sufficient, prima facie, to show a legal detention.

Application by Thomas Jones and others for certiorari to review the action of Bryan, judge of the superior court, in refusing to discharge petitioners on habeas corpus. Denied.

This is an application for a certiorari to review the action of Bryan, judge, in refusing to discharge the petitioners on habeas corpus. Notice was given, as required by rule 43 of this court, (12 S. E. Rep. ix.) the time being shortened by consent of the attorney general. The petitioners filed a certified copy of the record and proceedings as a part of their application. From them it appears that the petitioners were arrested, and brought before a justice of the peace, upon an affidavit and warrant for unlawfully disposing of mortgaged property, under Code, § 1089, and upon the trial the justice bound them over to the superior court in the sum of $200. Upon their failure to give the bond, they were sent to jail, under a mittimus regular in every respect. The petitioners thereafter applied to the judge for a writ of habeas corpus, upon a petition which sets out that they had been committed to jail by virtue of a mittimus from a justice of the peace, (annexing a copy,) but averring that there was no evidence before the justice that any crime had been committed in said county, and that the committal was made through the ignorance or malpractice of the justice. Upon the return, the sheriff produced the petitioners, and made his return, setting forth the mittimus as the cause of the detention. The court continued the cause till next morning, that the solicitor might have some time to examine into the matter, the petitioners giving bond in the sum of $100 each for their appearance. To this continuance the petitioners, through their counsel, excepted. On the return, it appearing that the detention was upon a mittimus from a justice of the peace, for the failure to give bond on a charge for unlawfully disposing of mortgaged property, the court ruled that the burden was on the petitioners to show that they were illegally restrained of their liberty. To this the petitioners excepted, and appealed. The petitioners refusing to proceed with their evidence, the court refused to discharge them, and they were permitted to go upon their bond already given.

Geo. M. Lindsay and E. C. Smith, for petitioners. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. The learned counsel for the petitioners properly and frankly admitted that this was a case of "novel impression." The continuance of the hearing till the next morning was not subject to exception. It is difficult to see how it injured the petitioners, who were admitted to bail, or how, if injurious, this could be remedied by an appeal. It is res acta, and cannot be undone. Besides, the delay was to give the solicitor opportunity to examine into the case, and was expressly authorized by Code, § 1635.¹

Upon the return of the sheriff, it appeared that the petitioners were in custody upon a mittimus, (which, indeed, was also set out in the application for habeas corpus,) regular in every way, from a justice of the peace, for failure to give bond for their appearance at the next term of the superior court to answer a criminal charge of which that court had jurisdiction. Nothing else appearing, the detention was clearly legal. The court thereupon called upon the petitioners to show wherein it was illegal. They declined to furnish him any evidence, but contended that the burden was upon the state to show that they were lawfully in custody. The state had already done so. It was not called upon to go further till testimony to the contrary was offered. The sheriff knew probably nothing whatever of the detention except the mittimus. He was not called upon to bring up the witnesses, to show what they testified to, or to prove that the petitioners were guilty of the charge. That fact will be inquired into by a grand jury, and afterwards by a petit jury, if a true bill should be found, at the next term of the court. The presumption of innocence applies only upon such trial, and does not avail to furnish a presumption that the detention of a party upon regular process, when the committing officer has jurisdiction, is illegal, and to call upon the state in a proceeding like this to show that the defendant is guilty in order to justify the detention. The detention is to give opportunity for a jury to pass upon the question of the defendant's guilt. In State v. Herndon, 107 N. C. 934, 12 S. E. Rep. 258, the judge refused to hear any evidence, deeming the commitment (there, upon a true bill found by a grand jury) conclusive of probable cause. The court held that the strong presumption was in favor of the correctness of the action of the grand jury, but that it was not conclusive, since there might be other evidence, not before them; hence that it was error to refuse to hear evidence, but that in no event, after indictment found, could the court discharge the prisoner. It might, in a proper case, admit to bail. But here the court did not refuse to hear evidence. It asked for it. The production of the mittimus was sufficient prima facie to show a legal detention. The petitioners had upon them the burden of showing evidence to rebut this, and the court made all the inquiry it was called upon to make (Code, § 1644) when it told them to proceed with their evidence, which they refused to do. If the petitioners had shown that there was no evidence at all before the justice, the judge could examine into the case de novo, unless they had waived the examination before the committing officer, (9 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 197,) and bind over or discharge them; or, if the facts proved did not constitute a crime, he might discharge them, or, if the bail was excessive in amount, reduce it. There may arise cases where the court, ex mero motu, as it has power to do, may issue the writ. (Code, § 1632;) and of course it may in all cases summon witnesses, and investigate whether the prima facie case of legal detention is not rebutted. But the present case does not raise a question of the power to do this. The petitioners are in court. There is nothing that indicates that they are weak, helpless, or ignorant of their rights. Indeed, they are represented by counsel. The judge does not refuse to hear testimony. He calls upon the state to show the cause of the detention. This it does satisfactorily by the sheriff's return. The court then asks the petitioners for their evidence. They refuse to give any. The court could do no otherwise than to refuse to discharge them. Code, § 1645. It seems, indeed, that the petitioners in fact are not even in custody, but are now out on bail. They have no ground to complain in any particular. Petition dismissed.

LONG v. WALDRAVEN et al.

WILLS—CONSTRUCTION—LIFE ESTATE—CHANGE TO FEE BY TESTAMENTARY POWER.

Where testator's will gave to his widow an estate for life in all his property, and the power to dispose of one-third by will, and the widow died intestate, her heirs and next of kin were not entitled to a third interest in testator's property, as the power of disposition did not turn the widow's life estate into a fee.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Winston, Judge.

Action by John M. Long, as executor of John B. Doub, deceased, against Martha S. Waldraven and others, as devisees and legatees under testator's will, and E. C. Dull and others, as next of kin of testator's intestate widow, for a construction of the will. From a decree for the devisees and legatees, the next of kin appeal. Affirmed.

Testator's will provided: "(1) It is my will that my just debts and burial expenses be paid by my executor, hereinafter named, out of my estate, as soon after my decease as shall by him be found convenient. (2) That all my estate, consisting of real and personal property, be given unto my wife, Minerva S. Doub, during her natural life. (3) That after the death of my wife, Minerva S. Doub, my estate shall be equally divided between the heirs of my brothers and sisters, with the exception of one-third of my estate, which I leave at the disposal of my wife, Minerva S. Doub, to be left as she may will."

Jones & Kerner and Watson & Buxton, for appellants. Eller & Starbuck for appellee.

BURWELL, J. The appellants are the next of kin of Minerva S. Doub, whose husband, John B. Doub, by his will, directed that all his estate, consisting of real and personal property, should be given unto his wife during her natural life, and in the third item of his will said: "It is my will that after the death of my wife, Minerva S. Doub, my estate shall be equally divided between the heirs of my brothers and sisters, with the exception of one-third of my estate, which I leave at the disposal of my wife, Minerva S. Doub, to be left as she may will." The testator thus gave to his wife an estate for life in all his property, and the power to dispose of one-third of it by will. She failed to exercise that power.

Her estate in the whole property was distinctly and unequivocally limited by her life. There are no words in the will that in any way enlarge that estate, or enhance her rights in the property while she lived.

"A devise of an estate generally or indefinitely, with a power of disposition over it, carries a fee. But where the estate is given for life, only, the devisee takes only an estate for life, though a power of disposition or to appoint the fee by deed or will be annexed, unless there be some manifest and general intent of the testator which would be defeated by adhering to the particular intent. Words of implication do not merge or destroy an express estate for life, unless it becomes absolutely necessary to uphold some manifest general intent." Church v. Disbrow, 52 Pa. St. 219.

This rule of interpretation has been approved by this court in Bass v. Bass, 78 N. C. 374; Patrick v. Morehead, 85 N. C. 62; and other cases.

We find in this will no words that, either expressly or by implication, manifest any general intent that would be defeated by adhering to the particular intent, so clearly expressed, that his wife should have only an estate for life. She was not to be allowed to consume any part of the corpus of the fund. Had that right been conferred upon her, it would be inconsistent with the notion that a life estate, only, was given. Church v. Disbrow, supra. The testator did not direct that one-third of his estate should, upon the death of his wife, go to whomsoever she should think proper to make her heir or heirs, in which event it might be said, perhaps, as in Shermer v. Shermer, 1 Wash. (Va.) 266, that the wife, by suffering her legal representatives to succeed her, actually made them her heir or heirs, as much so as if she had pointed them out by an express devise. Hence, this case must be added to that line of cases which, as was said in Shermer v. Shermer, supra, tend to prove "that an express estate for life to the wife, with a power to dispose of the fee, shall not turn her estate for life into a fee." What has been said disposes of the only question brought before us by this appeal. Affirmed.

PASS v. SHINE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

INTEREST—RATE AFTER MATURITY OF NOTE—VALIDITY OF AGREEMENT IN MORTGAGE.

An agreement in a mortgage is valid, which requires the note which the mortgage secures, and which specifies no rate of interest, to bear interest after maturity at a legal rate higher than the law allows before maturity on such a note.

Appeal from superior court, Duplin county; Henry R. Bryan, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Pass, as executrix of James C. Pass, against James F. Shine, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. R. Kornegay, for appellant. W. R. Allen, for appellee.

AVERY, J. The defendant might have lawfully agreed, by the terms of the note itself, to pay interest at the rate of 8 per cent. from the date of its execution. By failing to specify a higher rate, he, in contemplation of law, intended that the debt should bear only 6 per cent. interest until maturity. To secure this debt he executed a deed, conveying his own land, in which his wife (now dead) joined. The action is brought against James F. Shine, only, to foreclose the mortgage after default in the payment of the note. We can conceive of no reason why the defendant could not lawfully contract in the deed itself, as he could have agreed in the note, that the rate of interest should be 8 per cent. after maturity. It has generally been conceded by the courts of this country that interest "is allowable as damages for default in the performance of a contract to pay money." 11 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 383. By special agreement a lawful rate may be paid from the date of contracting a debt till it becomes due. The fact that the creditor is content with a lower rate before maturity does not affect his right to demand, under a special agreement, a higher rate, not exceeding the limit fixed by law, after maturity. The judgment is affirmed.

WOOTEN et al. v. OUTLAW et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 7, 1893.)

EVIDENCE—DECLARATIONS.

In an action on a note by the assignee, declarations of the payee that the maker owed him only a certain amount are inadmissible, it not being shown that they were made before the assignment, and therefore against interest.

Appeal from superior court, Duplin county; Bryan, Judge.

Action by Simeon Wooten and others against N. W. Outlaw and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The action was for the foreclosure of a mortgage made by F. M. Outlaw and wife to N. B. Outlaw, and by him assigned to the plaintiff Simeon Wooten. F. M. Outlaw, the mortgagor, is dead, and his widow and heirs at law are the defendants. It was admitted upon the trial that the said F. M. Outlaw executed the note and mortgage as alleged in the complaint, and that they were transferred to the plaintiff Wooten prior to April 15, 1886. The defendants relied upon the sole defense of payment. One Arnett, a witness for the defendants, testified that after the death of F. M. Outlaw he heard N. B. Outlaw say that F. M. Outlaw owed him $70 or $80, and that he heard him say this seven or eight years ago. Upon cross-examination he said it might not have been more than six years since he heard the above conversation. This evidence was objected to by the plaintiffs upon the ground that it was not shown that this conversation occurred prior to the transfer of the note and mortgage to the plaintiff Wooten, and that the declarations of N. B. Outlaw made after the transfer were incompetent. Objection sustained, and the defendants excepted. There was other testimony tending to show credits of $100 and of $25 upon the note, and these credits, as also one of $41.80, were admitted. The issue submitted was, "Has the note declared on been paid?" to which the jury responded, "No." His honor gave judgment for the balance, after deducting the credits above set out and interest, and for foreclosure of the mortgage. Defendants appealed.

H. R. Kornegay, for appellants. W. R. Allen, for appellees.

MacRAE, J. By the admissions of the parties, all other issues except that arising upon the plea of payment were eliminated. Both of the credits claimed by defendants were allowed, and an additional credit of $41.80 was also given. There was no testimony showing the dates of said credits, and a calculation will show that in the judgment these credits were allowed as of the times at which they were admitted in the complaint. As to the credit of $25, the testimony does not enlighten us as to the time it should have been entered, but it will appear to have been given about the same time that the credit of $100 was allowed. The rejected testimony was not competent unless it was made as a declaration against interest, while N. B. Outlaw was the holder of the note and mortgage, and the defendants failed to show that he was still the owner at the time of the alleged declarations. Indeed, the rejection of this testimony can work no harm to the defendants, for, if admitted, it would be consistent with the other testimony in the action. No error.

McCASKILL et al. v. CURRIE.

SETTING ASIDE VERDICT—INCONSISTENT FINDINGS.

In an action to set aside a deed to defendant from R., plaintiff's ancestor, as to a 150-acre tract therein described, the following issues were submitted, and to both the jury answered, "Yes:" Did defendant procure the deed from R. by false representation as to the 150-acre tract? And did defendant, after execution of the deed, without R.'s consent, insert therein the 150-acre tract? Held that, as both findings would support the same judgment for the same party, there was not such inconsistency therein as would warrant the court in setting aside the verdict, and that a judgment should have been rendered for plaintiff. MacRae, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Moore county; Connor, Judge.

Action by John W. McCaskill and others against James L. Currie to set aside a deed of land to defendant executed by Alexander Robinson, plaintiff's ancestor. The court set aside the verdict, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

The following issues were submitted to the jury, to both of which the jury responded, "Yes:" "(1) Did the defendant procure the deed from Alexander Robinson by undue influence or false representation as to the 150-acre tract? (2) Did the defendant, after the execution of the deed, fraudulently, and without the knowledge and consent of Alexander Robinson, insert in said deed the 150-acre tract."

Black & Adams, for appellants. J. W. Hinsdale and W. E. Murchison, for appellee.

AVERY, J. Where the verdict of a jury is either so inconsistent or so indefinite that the court cannot determine, upon the pleadings and findings, what judgment should be rendered in favor of a given party, or which of the parties is entitled to judgment, it must be set aside, and a new trial awarded. Allen v. Sallinger, 105 N. C. 339, 10 S. E. Rep. 1020; Crews v. Crews, 64 N. C. 536. The same result must follow where findings of the jury are irreconcilably inconsistent with the admissions in the pleadings. Tankard v. Tankard, 79 N. C. 54. A careful review of the cases in which this court has given its approval to setting aside verdicts on account of inconsistent findings discloses the fact that the rulings have invariably rested upon the ground that there were two responses to different issues in each case, one of which would support a decree for the defendant, while the other would entitle the plaintiff to recover; so that the court could not proceed to judgment, because there was no principle of law which empowered the judge to choose between two contestants, both of whom had been declared by the jury to be the prevailing party. Mitchell v. Brown, 88 N. C. 156; Bank v. Alexander, 84 N. C. 30; Morrison v. Watson, 95 N. C. 479; Turrentine v. Railroad, 92 N. C. 638; Porter v. Railroad Co., 97 N. C. 66, 2 S. E. Rep. 581; Allen v. Sallinger, supra; Puffer v. Lucas, 107 N. C. 322, 12 S. E. Rep. 130, 464. But when the verdict points out who is the prevailing party, and determines distinctly the facts upon which the nature and measure of his redress depend, the court is not precluded from pronouncing the sentence of the law upon the findings, because, upon two allegations in the complaint, in the nature of separate counts in a declaration, or distinct grounds of action, issues have been framed and responses returned which are not in perfect harmony with each other, when it appears that upon either finding, considered separately, the same party (here the plaintiff) would be entitled to precisely the same judgment. In the case at bar, whether the defendant inserted the description of the 150-acre tract of land in the deed before it was signed, and, by undue influence or false representation, induced the grantor to execute it in that shape, or whether, after execution, he forged the portion of the deed embracing the calls of that tract, in either event the court would declare the deed fraudulent and void as a conveyance of the 150-acre tract, and adjudge that the plaintiff recover the possession, and costs of the action. Indeed, we can readily understand how the jury might have been misled so far as to intend by the response to the first issue to find that the defendant represented to Alexander Robinson that he was conveying only the 80-acre tract, and afterwards altered the deed by inserting the description of the other tract. If the judge who presided in the court below entertained any doubt about the weight of the evidence, and thought that the findings of the jury upon both issues, together with other circumstances, indicated that they were unduly biased in favor of the plaintiff, he might have set aside the verdict, in the exercise of a sound discretion, and the order would not have been reviewable here. But we do not think that the verdict is so contradictory or inconsistent that the court could not see what judgment should be entered. Mere informality will not vitiate a verdict, if it appears that no injustice will result from an adjudication upon its substance or general purport. Hawkins v. House, 65 N. C. 616; McMahan v. Miller, 82 N. C. 321; Walker v. Mebane, 90 N. C. 259.

We have extended our examination of authorities upon the practice in cases of this kind to the text writers and decisions of other courts, and we have not found any case where two findings, which would support precisely the same judgment in favor of the same party, have been set aside on the ground of inconsistency in the verdict. Potter v. Hiscox, 30 Conn. 518; Hil. New Trials, p. 148. The supreme court of New York, in the case of Hyatt v. Railroad, 6 Hun. 306, held that a verdict was inconsistent where the jury assessed punitive damages against a railway company on account of an assault on the plaintiff by its conductor, who was a codefendant, but did not find a verdict against the conductor, because, ex necessitate, if the conductor was not in fault, the company was not liable. The finding in favor of the conductor necessarily meant that the plaintiff was entitled to recover nothing against the corporation, while the assessment of damages against the company was a basis for a judgment for the amount against it. The verdict was set aside because, in one aspect of it, the plaintiff was entitled to recover, while in another he was not. The test, therefore, is whether there are two phases of a verdict; the one entitling the one party, and the other the adverse party, to a judgment in his favor. The judgment of the court is reversed, and the case remanded, to the end that judgment may be rendered upon the verdict in favor of the plaintiff. Reversed.

MACRAE, J., (dissenting.) I am constrained to dissent from the conclusion reached by a majority of the court, and to concur in the view taken by the learned judge who tried the case below. It seems to me that the responses to the two issues are so inconsistent and illogical that they cannot stand together, and, as the court could not select either one as against the other, both should be rejected. The response to the first issue necessarily negatives the second, for, if the defendant procured the deed from Alexander Robinson by undue influence or false representation as to the 150-acre tract, it was physically impossible that he should have inserted the calls of this tract in the deed after its execution. If, on the other hand, the defendant fraudulently, and without the knowledge and consent of Alexander Robinson, inserted in said deed the 150-acre tract, it was equally impossible that he should have procured the deed from Robinson by undue influence and fraudulent representation as to the 150 acres. So that by the verdict we have, in effect, an affirmative and a negative response to each issue.

ATKINSON v. ASHEVILLE STREET RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

CORPORATIONS — VALIDITY OF FRANCHISE — COLLATERAL ATTACK — PRACTICE ON APPEAL.

1. Plaintiff alleged that, being the owner of a franchise to build and operate a street railway, he delivered an assignment of it in escrow to another person, to be delivered to one D. after the latter had built certain lines of track thereunder, that it was wrongfully delivered to said D. before he had built any lines as agreed, and that defendant company, with full knowledge of the facts, had bought it from D. Plaintiff asked that the assignment to D. be declared void, and that defendant be enjoined from operating under such franchise. The franchise was in terms granted to "F. and his associates, to be known as the A. Company." Held, that defendants could not in that action attack the franchise on the ground that it was an invalid attempt on the part of the city to form a corporation, and at the same time grant a street-railway license thereto.

2. A statement, in the case on appeal, that notice of appeal was waived, cannot be contradicted for the first time on argument in the appellate court.

3. The record need not show that an appeal was duly entered, when it affirmatively appears from the case on appeal, which bears date within the time within which an appeal could be taken, that the appeal was taken, and notice thereof waived.

Appeal from superior court, Buncombe county; John Gray Bynum, Judge.

Action by Natt Atkinson against the Asheville Street-Railway Company to annul the delivery of a certain instrument assigning a franchise, and to restrain defendant from operating under such franchise. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The complaint was as follows:

"The plaintiff, complaining of the defendant, alleges: First. That the city of Asheville is a body politic and corporate, duly chartered and organized under and by virtue of an act of the general assembly of North Carolina, entitled 'An act to amend the charter of the town of Asheville,' ratified the 8th day of March, A. D. 1883, and the acts of which that act is amendatory, and the acts amending the same. Second. That on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1888, the plaintiff was the owner of a certain license privilege and franchise to operate a street railway in the city of Asheville, commonly known as the 'Farrinholt Charter,' the same being a license privilege and franchise granted by the said the city of Asheville, by an ordinance duly enacted, passed, and ratified by the board of aldermen of the said the city of Asheville, to one L. A. Farrinholt and his associates, and by the said L. A. Farrinholt and his associates assigned to plaintiff, for value. A copy of said ordinance is hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and is hereby made a part of this complaint. Third. That on the said 4th day of March, A. D. 1888, the plaintiff was, and ever since has been, the owner of valuable real estate in and near the said city of Asheville, some lots of which lie near Chestnut street and Merrimon avenue, in said city, and some lots of which lie near Depot street, in said city, and all of which would have been greatly enhanced in value by the building and operating of a street railway on said streets and said avenue, and the greatest, if not the only, object the plaintiff had, outside of the general welfare of said city, in purchasing the said Farrinholt charter, was to insure the building and operating of a street railway along said Chestnut and Depot streets and Merrimon avenue; and the plaintiff, in order to prevent the building of other lines of street railroad on only a part of the streets named in the said Farrinholt charter, the building of which would have rendered the building and operating of the street railway on all the streets therein named as aforesaid unprofitable, and in this way would have made it impossible to raise the necessary capital to build a street railroad on the streets therein named as aforesaid, deposited with the said city of Asheville the sum of one thousand dollars as a guaranty that the plaintiff would build, or cause to be built, a railroad on all of said streets so named as aforesaid, (all of which will more fully appear upon reference to said city's receipt for said money, a copy of which is hereto attached, and hereby made a part of this complaint,) and thereby induced the said city to refuse permission to the parties desiring it to build a railway on only a part of said streets, leaving the said Chestnut and Depot streets and Merrimon avenue without railroad facilities, [the said city being about to grant such permission on the ground that the plaintiff, as the said city and said parties alleged, could not command the means to build any road, and that a road on part of said streets was better than no road at all.] Fourth. That in order to accomplish the desire of plaintiff that street railroads should run on all of the streets named in the said Farrinholt charter, and especially that such railroads should be built and operated on said Chestnut and Depot streets and Merrimon avenue, the plaintiff entered into an agreement and contract with one E. D. Davidson, who, as plaintiff is informed and believes, is insolvent, whereby the said E. D. Davidson, in consideration of the assignment to him of the said Farrinholt charter, agreed and bound himself to build and operate a street railroad on all the streets named in the said Farrinholt charter; and, in order to insure the faithful performance of said contract on the part of the said E. D. Davidson, the assignment of the said Farrinholt charter was not delivered to him, but was, by agreement with the said E. D. Davidson, delivered to J. G. Martin to be held by him in escrow, and by him delivered to the said E. D. Davidson only after the said E. D. Davidson had fully complied with his contract in reference to the building and operating of said railroad on said streets named in said Farrinholt charter, and in other respects; and that the said J. G. Martin accepted the trust thus reposed in him, and received the said assignment in escrow for the purposes aforesaid,—all of which will more fully appear by reference to a certain writing, a copy of which is hereto attached and hereby made a part of this complaint, and marked 'Exhibit C.' Fifth. That, notwithstanding the solemn agreement on the part of the said J. G. Martin that he would hold the said assignment for the purposes set forth in said Exhibit C, he has long since delivered said assignment to said E. D. Davidson, although, as the said J. G. Martin well knew, the said E. D. Davidson had not then, nor has he yet, built or begun to build any street railroad or other railroad on the said Chestnut and Depot streets and Merrimon avenue, or either of them, and although no street or other railroad has ever been built or begun by any person or persons, or by any corporation or corporations, on said last-named streets or said last-named avenue; and, the time within which the said E. D. Davidson agreed to build or begin to operate a street railroad on all of the streets named in the said Farrinholt charter having long since expired, the plaintiff has no reason to hope that the said railroad will ever be built on either of said last-named streets or on said last-named avenue, and by the breach of trust on the part of the said J. G. Martin hereinbefore set forth the plaintiff has been greatly damaged. Sixth. That the defendant, which is a corporation chartered and organized by and under the laws of North Carolina, purchased the said license privilege and franchise known as the 'Farrinholt Charter,' as aforesaid, from the said E. D. Davidson, with full knowledge of all the facts hereinbefore alleged. Plaintiff therefore prays judgment that the delivery of the assignment referred to in the foregoing complaint, by J. G. Martin to E. D. Davidson, be, and ever shall be, void, and that the plaintiff is the owner of the license privilege and franchise described in the foregoing complaint, and that the defendant be perpetually enjoined from ever using, exercising, or operating under the said license privilege and franchise, and for such other further relief as the facts set forth in the foregoing complaint will warrant."

Exhibit A was in part as follows: "The following, granting the Asheville Street-Railway and Transfer Company the privilege of building a street-railway system, was unanimously adopted on its first reading, viz.: Be it ordained by the board of aldermen of the city of Asheville that L. A. Farrinholt and his associates, to be known as the Asheville Street-Railway and Transfer Company, are hereby authorized and permitted to make, construct, maintain, and use a single-track railway for the purpose of conducting a general passenger and transfer business, under such rules and subject to such provisions as hereinafter ordained, along the following streets in the city of Asheville. * * *

Summers & Lewis, J. S. Adams, and Chas. A. Moore, for appellant. F. A. Sondley, for appellee.

CLARK, J. The so-called "Farrinholt Charter" is simply a license by the city to lay down a railway track on certain streets mentioned, granted to individuals named, who of course could act as a corporation only upon duly taking out letters of incorporation before the clerk, or obtaining a charter from the general assembly. The question whether such incorporation has been duly obtained or whether those parties have attempted to exercise corporate functions without it, is not raised in this action, and could not be in this collateral way. The city authorities were empowered to issue the license. Elliott, Roads & S. 329, 334;

City of Burlington v. Burlington St. Ry. Co., 31 Amer. Rep. 145; Railroad Co. v. Richmond, 96 U. S. 521. The complaint avers that it was assigned by the plaintiff, then owner of the license, in escrow to Martin, who, in breach of the trust reposed in him, has conveyed it to the defendant, who is endeavoring to operate under it. It was error to hold that a cause of action is not set out. The case on appeal recites: "Plaintiff excepted and appealed. Notice of appeal waived." The judge, in a memorandum appearing in the transcript on appeal, says that his "recollection is that the plaintiff asked an appeal, and, if the failure to make the entries was his inadvertence, he cannot allow plaintiff to be prejudiced," and grants defendant "leave to file counter statement, as it had asked to do." This, it seems, the defendant did not do, and the judge adopted the case on appeal prepared by appellant. The waiver is neither controverted, nor is there a denial that an appeal was in fact taken, though opportunity was given defendant, by leave, to file a counter case. There is nothing beyond the bare suggestion in defendant's printed argument or brief that notice of appeal was not served, and that entry of appeal was not made. But this neither denies taking the appeal nor waiver of notice; nor, if it did, does it do so in a legal mode. If notice was waived, why should it be served? And if appeal was actually taken, whether it was entered or not, becomes less material. If there had been a denial in a legal way, and at the proper time, of a waiver, the court could not recognize the waiver unless in writing. Sondley v. City of Asheville, 112 N. C. 694, 17 S. E. Rep. 534, in which case there were contradictory affidavits, and the court disregarded the alleged verbal agreement, under rule 39, (12 S. E. Rep. ix.) and repeated rulings of this court. Besides, the denial of a waiver should have been made below, and not, for the first time, by a suggestion in the argument in this court, and in contradiction of the case on appeal adopted by the judge. Walker v. Scott, 102 N. C. 487, 9 S. E. Rep. 488, cited in State v. Price, 110 N. C. 599, 15 S. E. Rep. 116. Strictly and properly the record should show that the appeal was duly entered; but that is not imperative if it appears, as here, affirmatively, that the appeal in fact was taken and notice was waived. Fore v. Railroad Co., 101 N. C. 526, 8 S. E. Rep. 335. Here the case on appeal recites that the defendant excepted and appealed, and that notice of appeal was waived. This, not being controverted by the appellee, even if it had not been adopted by the judge, is evidence of those facts. Besides, in addition, the case itself bears date September 10, 1892,—within the time within which the appeal could be taken. This distinguishes this case from Moore v. Vanderburg, 90 N. C. 10; Wilson

v. Seagle, 84 N. C. 112, and Spence v. Tapscott, 92 N. C. 577, relied on by appellee. The motion to dismiss appeal is denied. In dismissing the action below there was error.

STATE v. STAFFORD.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

ASSAULT AND BATTERY—TEACHER AND PUPIL.

1. A warrant against a school-teacher charging that he did unmercifully whip a child, inflicting bruises on her person, sufficiently charges a battery, without setting out the quo animo, which could be shown by way of avoidance if it were pleaded in defense that the parties were teacher and pupil.

2. A warrant charging that defendant inflicted bruises on the person of the child assaulted does not allege serious injury, so as to deprive the justice of the peace of jurisdiction.

3. On appeal from a conviction in a justice's court, the trial being de novo, the superior court, on conviction, may impose a higher or heavier fine than was adjudged below, up to the limit of the justice's power of punishment.

Appeal from superior court, Moore county; Whitaker, Judge.

E. W. Stafford, convicted of assault and battery, appeals. Affirmed.

The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. The defendant, a school-teacher, was convicted before a magistrate for whipping one of his scholars, and fined $40. On appeal to the superior court he was again convicted, and was fined by the judge $50. There were no exceptions to evidence nor to the charge. The only exception taken was to the refusal of a motion to dismiss, made upon the ground of a want of jurisdiction.

We were not favored with an argument on behalf of defendant. It may be that the motion to dismiss was based on the ground that the courts have no jurisdiction in cases of chastisement inflicted by teachers upon their pupils. In State v. Pendergrass, 19 N. C. 365, it is held that the law confides to school masters and teachers a discretionary power in the infliction of punishment upon their pupils, and will not hold them criminally responsible unless the punishment be such as to occasion permanent injury to the child, or be inflicted merely to gratify their own evil passions. Here the warrant charges that the defendant "did unmercifully whip" the child, "inflicting bruises on her person." It is not necessary that the quo animo should be charged. The warrant sufficiently sets out a battery. When the defense is set up that it was inflicted by a teacher upon his pupil, this defense can be invalidated by proof of malice, or anger, or excessiveness. The case on appeal states that there was evidence "tending to show that the punishment was immoderate, and was inflicted to gratify defendant's malice and out of anger." There was evidence for defendant tending to show the contrary, but the case states that the court left the conflicting evidence to the jury with appropriate instructions, to which no exception was taken. The quo animo thus passed upon by the jury distinguishes the facts of this case from those in State v. Pendergrass, supra. If the objection to the jurisdiction proceeded on the ground that the magistrate had no jurisdiction, it is sufficient to say that there is nothing in the warrant nor in the evidence to oust his original jurisdiction. The words in the warrant, "inflicting bruises on her person," are not a sufficient allegation of serious injury to deprive the justice of jurisdiction. The evidence, as far as set out, falls far short of the facts in State v. Huntley, 91 N. C. 617. The trial in the superior court being de novo, it was competent for the judge, in his discretion, to lay a lighter or heavier penalty than the sentence of the justice, provided, of course, he did not exceed the limit of punishment which the magistrate could have imposed. State v. Johnson, 94 N. C. 863. No error.

TRUSTEES OF WADSWORTHVILLE POOR SCHOOL v. JENNINGS.¹

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 29, 1893.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — DISAVOWAL — NOTICE — RECOVERY OF POSSESSION — PRESUMPTION OF GRANT — LIMITATIONS — EXEMPTION OF WADS-WORTHVILLE POOR SCHOOL.

1. Where a tenant for years disavows his tenancy by conveying the leased land by deed in fee simple, the landlord has the right to protect his title by regaining possession without waiting for the termination of the lease.

2. Possession under a deed in fee simple from a tenant, and the recordation of such deed, is a sufficient notice to the landlord of the disavowal of tenancy by the tenant. McIver, C. J., dissenting.

3. Adverse possession for over 20 years under a deed in fee simple from a tenant creates a rebuttable presumption of law of a grant from the landlord. Smith v. Asbell, 2 Stro. 146, followed.

4. Lands held in trust for the Wadsworthville Poor School were leased for years, and the tenant conveyed them by deed in fee simple. Held, that Act Dec. 14, 1805, relieving such lands from the operation of the statutes of limitation, was not a bar to the defense of adverse possession under the deed, where the presumption of a grant from the landlord was not rebutted by the trustees in an action to recover the land. Trustees v. Meetze, 4 Rich. Law, 50, and Same v. McCully, 11 Rich. Law, 429, followed.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Greenville county; James Aldrich, Judge.

Action by the Trustees of Wadsworthville Poor School against L. I. Jennings for the recovery of land. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. A. McCullough, for appellant. Cothran, Wells, Ansel & Cothran and Haynsworth & Parker, for respondent.

POPE, J. Under the will of Thomas Wadsworth, who died in 1791, while a citizen of Charleston, in this state, certain lands within the limits of this commonwealth were devised to trustees to maintain and support a free school for poor children residing within the limits of Maj. Dunlap's battalion of the Saluda regiment, within Laurens county. The general assembly of this state, appreciating the spirit of this deviser, and the better to protect these lands from the rapacity and cupidity of those persons who would likely seek an advantage of the trustees under this will, passed an act on the 14th day of December, 1805, whereby these lands were relieved from the operation of the act of limitation. See 5 St. at Large, 496. Again, at the request of the trustees under the will of Mr. Wadsworth, the general assembly, on the 20th day of December, 1810, passed an act whereby these trustees and their successors in office were incorporated by the name of the Trustees of the Wadsworthville Poor School, with the usual privileges enjoyed by similar corporations. See 5 St. at Large, 621, 622. This corporation, thus created, on the 15th day of April, 1818, leased 330 acres of the lands devised under the will of Thomas Wadsworth unto one Thomas G. Walker for the term of 75 years; the same beginning on the 12th day of December, 1815, and ending on the 12th day of December, 1890. This lease was for valuable consideration, and was by a deed therefor, which deed of lease was duly recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for Greenville district, (now county,) where the said leased land was situated. This lease was by Thomas G. Walker assigned to one David McNeely on the 19th October, 1821, and David McNeely assigned the same to one John P. Pool on the 15th day of February, 1847. Afterwards, John P. Pool, by his deed therefor, conveyed 100 acres in fee simple, as it is agreed by the parties to this appeal, to Fagan E. Martin, but in the deed itself recited all the foregoing facts, and this deed was duly recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance on 30th January, 1850. Under a judgment against Fagan E. Martin, this land was sold, as Martin's property, 6th January, 1857, by the sheriff of Greenville district, to Charles J. Elford. After Mr. Elford's death, and in the settlement of his estate, this land was sold and conveyed by the commissioner in equity to Beeco on the 7th October, 1867. Beeco sold and conveyed to Choice January 21, 1876. Choice sold and conveyed to Davis January 21, 1876. Davis sold and conveyed to Kennemore and Tate December 4, 1879. Kennemore purchased by deed therefor Tate's interest. Kennemore sold and conveyed a part of the land to McGee 1st January, 1891. McGee sold his part by deed therefor to L. I. Jennings on 23d February, 1891. Kennemore sold his part by deed to L. I. Jennings on 23d February, 1891. All these several deeds were duly recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for Greenville county.

On the 25th day of April, 1892, in the court of common pleas for Greenville county, the plaintiff, the Trustees of the Wadsworthville Poor School, brought an action against the defendant, L. I. Jennings, to recover $62\frac{1}{4}$ acres of the land, and in the complaint disclosed plaintiff's title, the lease, and its termination, demanding the recovery of the land, and \$200 as rents and profits. The defendant, in his answer, admitted the possession of the land in controversy, but denied plaintiff's title and right to recover land, or rents and profits; further, that beginning on the 4th December, 1879, he had been in the exclusive and continuous possession of the land sued for, claiming the same as his own adversely to the plaintiff and all the world; further, that he, and those under whom he claims, had been in the continuous, adverse possession of the premises for 40 years, claiming the same as their own, and holding adversely to the whole world; further, purchase for valuable consideration without notice, and adverse possession thereunder for more than 10 years; that Kenne-more, through whom he claimed, had made valuable improvements, in value \$1,000, and that he believed he had a good title in fee in said premises, which sum he claims of the plaintiff; and, lastly, that the defendant, and those under whom he claims, have had exclusive, adverse, and continuous possession of the premises in dispute, claiming a fee-simple title against all the world, for over 20 years.

On the 3d day of December, 1892, the action came on for trial before Judge Aldrich and a jury, in the court of common pleas at Greenville, when a verdict was rendered for the defendant. After a verdict had been found for defendant, plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the minutes. This motion being denied, a judgment was duly entered, from which the plaintiff now appeals upon the following grounds: (1) Because the presiding judge erred in instructing the jury "that if one or more of these purchasers from Walker took a fee-simple deed, and went into possession of it, claiming that he had the entire and exclusive right to that land,—went into it and took possession of it under such deed,—and made it known, or this fact became known, to the trustees, the plaintiff here, then their title by adverse possession began to run," whereas, he should have charged, as argued by the plaintiff, (a) that neither Walker, nor any one claiming through him, could plead adverse possession during the term of the aforesaid lease; (b) that, by reason of the act suspending the statute of limitations as to these lands, no person could plead, as against the plaintiff, title by adverse possession; (c) that before the said Walker, or any one claiming through him, could avail himself of title by prescription or presumption, he would have to show that his holding was not permissive, and this he could not do during the term of the aforesaid lease; and (d) that in no case can a tenant dispute the title of his landlord until he has surrendered possession of the lands to his landlord, giving clear and unequivocal notice of his intention to hold adversely and re-enter in his new capacity. Not until then would he begin to hold adversely. (2) Because his honor erred in instructing the jury: "If the plaintiff had notice of it that there was somebody in possession of their lands, claiming it as their own, they had a right to bring their action against them as trespassers; and if they had a right to sue him, and he was not sued, and they allowed him to stay there for forty years, that trespass would ripen into a good title,"—because (a) plaintiff could not bring action of ejectment until the termination of the said lease; (b) if plaintiff had had such cause of action, that would not convert the holding of the party in possession under that lease from permissive to adverse; (c) there could be no such adverse holding of these lands as could ripen into title; (d) Walker, and all claiming through him, were estopped from disputing plaintiff's title. (3) Because his honor erred in charging the jury: "Did Jennings, or any one of his ancestors, go in there, and take possession under that title, and was that fact known to the trustees? If the trustees knew that such a party was in possession of that land, claiming a title adverse to them, they should have acted, and, if they stood by for 20 or 40 years, they slept on their rights,"—because (a) the said law was wholly inapplicable to the facts proven in this case, inasmuch as there was no proof whatever, either on the part of plaintiff or defendant, that the plaintiff knew at any time that there was any person in possession of these lands, holding adverse to them; (b) they were not estopped from suing for the said lands at any time. (4) His honor erred in charging the jury that the defendant, Jennings, could avail himself, by way of purchase, of any right, title, or interest in any one through whom he claimed might have had by adverse possession, because (a) a person, to avail himself of the plea of title by adverse possession or prescription, must show that he, as well as those through whom he claims, held adversely. (5) His honor erred in instructing the jury, as law applicable to this case: "If one goes into possession of land under color of title, or acquires possession of land, and holds it for 20 years, or when a man has possession of lands, and holds it for 4 or 5 years, and he conveys it to another, who holds it under his title, and so on for 20 years, and you establish a continuous holding for 20 years, if that possession and title was continuous and adverse, as it states here, for the period of 40 years or 20 years, that would presume a grant,"—because (a) there was no room for any such presumptions in this case. (6) Because the charge of his honor was not only erroneous, but conflicting, confusing and misleading, inasmuch as he instructed the jury, in one portion of his charge, that a tenant would have to yield to his landlord the possession of his lands before he could hold adverse to him, and, after having charged that those taking under Walker took subject to his rights and disabilities, in a subsequent portion thereof he charged that if Jennings, or any of his ancestors, went into possession of that land under fee-simple deed, or held it adversely, and the plaintiff knew of that fact, the statute would begin to run against the plaintiff. (7) Because the circuit judge erred in refusing plaintiff's motion for a new trial, as the verdict of the jury was without a jot or tittle of evidence to support it.

It now remains that we should present our conclusions upon the several grounds of appeal. It being an appeal from the law side of the court below, we are, by law, confined to errors of law in the circuit judge, and these errors are confined to his charge to the jury, there being no exceptions to any refusal by the judge to charge any requests on either side.

We have devoted unusual care to the investigation of the principles of the law of real property in this state, for the discussion of the several questions by the respective parties to this appeal have made such a course on our part necessary, by reason of the ability and research of counsel here engaged. Time will not allow us to reproduce the law which was consulted in such investigation in this opinion. That, at times, we were doubtful whether the circuit judge had not erred in some of his instructions to the jury, we freely admit. A careful comparison of the views of the circuit judge with those embodied in the judgments of our own court of last resort in previous similar cases has enabled us to reach a conclusion in accord with that expressed by the circuit judge.

In his charge to the jury in the case at bar by the circuit judge, and from which there is no appeal, the deed from the plaintiff corporation, under which Thomas G. Walker obtained possession of the land in dispute, was declared to be a lease for a term of years, which expired on the 12th day of December, 1890. This lease was duly recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for Greenville county, wherein the land was situated, in 1823,—many years before any rights of the defendant, or those through whom he claims, originated. There can be no question but that a lessee is precluded from a denial of the title of his landlord. Indeed, the possession of the lessee is that of his landlord. It is permissive, and not adverse. It is equally certain that under the law the lessee has no seisin of the land, and without seisin, either actual or constructive, there can be no title to land.

A lessee has no estate in the lands devised to him. His term, under the law, is but a chose in action, or chattel interest. The right of the landlord, as against the lessee or his assigns, to obtain possession of the lands devised, must usually be preceded by an entry thereon. It is in regard to this right of entry by the landlord during the continuance of the lease that so much legal learning has been employed during the last centuries. Herein are involved the doctrines of forfeitures arising from the breach of conditions or covenants contained in the lease, or such covenants running with the land as the law itself implies. In the case at bar the lease expresses no covenants by the lessee. The single covenant is by the plaintiff corporation, whereby possession of the leased premises to Walker, his executors and assigns, is warranted during the term. There is no restriction upon Walker, the original lessee, to assign or sublet the term. Accordingly, he does assign the lease, and by successive assignments, duly made, the lease vests in John P. Pool. By the case it is agreed that Pool, by deed in fee simple, conveyed this leased land to one Fagan E. Martin in the year 1850, and that such deed was duly recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for Greenville county, (then district), and that the said Martin entered into possession under such deed. We would remark, in passing, that we do not mean to commit ourselves to the construction of this deed as amounting to one in fee simple, for of this we may doubt whether, in strictness of law, in view of its terms, anything more than an assignment of the original lease was contemplated or expressed by the parties. The parties to the appeal, however, have stipulated that the terms of this deed were those usual in one conveying an estate in fee simple, and we suppose we are bound to give effect to their agreements; and this we the more readily do, inasmuch as the entire deed is not exhibited in the case. In 1857, C. J. Elford, at sheriff's sale, purchased Martin's entire estate in the land. His deed therefor was duly recorded. Elford, that year, (1857,) conveyed to one Thomas H. Cole as in fee simple. This deed was duly recorded. Said Cole reconveyed to Elford by deed in fee simple in 1867, which deed was duly recorded. Elford having died in the year 1867, the court of equity, under a bill filed by his widow and executrix as complainant against his heirs at law and creditors as defendants, sold the lands, and a deed in the form of a fee-simple deed was made to the purchaser, one Miles R. Beeco, for this land, which deed was duly recorded. Beeco entered upon possession under his deed. And so deeds in fee simple were made from purchaser to purchaser, successively, until title rested in the present defendant. Valuable improvements were placed upon the premises by one of the intermediate purchasers.

It is contended by the appellant that, inasmuch as he has traced title to itself and thereafter by lease, the possession of the lands to one Walker, whose assignment was traced as far and into one John P. Pool, although Pool conveyed by a deed in fee simple to one Fagan E. Martin, (from whom such possession was derived by others, successively, by deeds in fee simple, down to the defendant,) the possession of defendant is plaintiff's possession, and he is entitled to recover, the lease having expired before action brought. To establish this proposition he maintains, most earnestly, that as, by the terms of the original lease, Walker was allowed to assign his term, and did actually do so, such assignee was, by operation of law, bound to hold possession for the original landlord. Such does seem to be the law governing leasehold estates. This distinction exists between a subletting and an assignment of the lease: If a lessee sublets, his tenant is bound to his lessor; but, if a lessee assigns the lease, then the original lessee is evicted, and the relation of landlord and tenant subsists between the owner as landlord, and the assignee as lessee, subject to all the provisions of the original lease. By an examination of the lease in the case at bar, it will be found that no covenant is expressed that possession will be surrendered by the lessee or his assignee, to the landlord, at the expiration of the lease, to wit, on the 12th day of December, 1890. On investigation, we find that it is an open question in this country whether a covenant runs with the land to surrender the demised land at the end of the term in the hands of an assignee, and when the lease contains no such covenant, is implied by law. So it was held in Massachusetts, (Sargent v. Smith, 12 Gray, 428,) though an English case holds directly that such a covenant is not implied by law, (Doe v. Seaton, 2 Crompt. M. & R. 730.) Still, it is settled law that at the expiration of the term the landlord may regain possession of his lands on demand, if he can; by suit, if he must. Hence, it would seem that the appellant can maintain this proposition. The authorities directly hold that a lessee can legally only assign such an interest as is covered by his lease, and that this is true, no matter what may be the form of the deed whereby he (the lessee) conveys. Mr. Tyler, in his work on Ejectment and Adverse Possession, at page 208, says: "When the relation of landlord and tenant is once established, it attaches to all persons who succeed to the possession of the premises through or under the first tenant, and they are all as much bound by the covenants and agreements of the original lessee as though they were their own." Again, at page 881, the same author holds: "And the rule that where the relation of landlord and tenant exists, a conveyance by the latter of the demised premises cannot operate as the basis of an adverse possession, so as to bar the former of his ejectment, means the conventional relation of landlord and tenant, when some rent or return is in fact reserved to the former, not a relation arising from mere operation of law, as when one makes a grant, and by the omission of the technical word 'heirs' an estate for life only passes." So, too, Mr. Washburn, in his work on the Law of Real Property, at page 486, says: "So, if a tenant under a lease were to convey the estate in fee to a third party, he would have no better right to contest the title of the lessor than the lessee himself." Mr. Angell, in his work on Limitations, thus states the rule, (page 456:) "It seems to be also settled that, when the relation of landlord and tenant is once established, it attaches to all who may succeed the tenant, immediately or remotely, and that a succeeding tenant is as much disqualified to set up his possession against the original landlord as the first tenant." Nor do we perceive any difficulty to the plaintiff corporation by the purchase by Elford, at sheriff's sale, of Fagan E. Martin's interest in the land; for unquestionably, if Martin, as assignee of the lease, held the lands in question as a tenant to the original landlord, (the plaintiff corporation,) the sheriff could only legally convey such an estate as was in Martin, and Elford would, by his purchase, assume all the relations to the landlord, with all their legal consequences, and is estopped from denying the tenancy. Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 50.

With all these concessions, however, the appellant does not find his way clear to a recovery, for such provisions only apply to a continuous, unbroken tenancy, wherein the relation of landlord and tenant subsists, as such, in law and fact; to those instances where an adverse use of the leased premises do not operate as a bar to their recovery by the landlord. The appellant, with ability, contends that, in order to enable a tenant to controvert his landlord's title, he must first deliver up possession of the leased premises to his landlord; that the tenant cannot disclaim his tenancy, or put himself in the position of an adverse claimant, or originate in another any such adverse holding while the tenant withholds possession from his landlord. Indeed, he goes so far as to suggest that the doctrine of disclaimer, and also surrender by parol, can never be applied to the relation of landlord and tenant created by deed, but that such doctrines only apply to such instances as tenancies at will, or such as are created by parol. He cites the cases of Love v. Dennis, Harp. 70; Whaley v. Whaley, 1 Speer, 225; Syme v. Sanders, 4 Strob. 196; Wilson v. Weathersby, 1 Nott. & McC. 373; Williams v. Morris, 95 U. S. 444; Floyd v. Mintsey, 7 Rich. Law. 188; Thomson v. Peake, Id. 353. It must be admitted that these cases are instances of tenancies not created by deed. He would include, also, Willison v. Watkins, supra, and Zeller's Lessee v. Eckert, 4 How. 289; but, as we remember these two cases last cited, in the former possession was obtained by Willison under a power of attorney from the owner; and, in the latter, possession was derived by devisor's widow under a provision of her husband's will, by which he devised the fee to his son, but carved out an estate for years for his widow; and in both these cases the United States supreme court sustained the title of the tenant, and those claiming under him, under a disclaimer of landlord's title and other circumstances.

Under the view we take of the law of this state governing cases of the character of that at bar, we are not left to deal with all these refinements of the law; for we take it that it is now fully established that wherever the relation of landlord and tenant is terminated by any hostile act,—such as the conveyance of the lands demised to the tenant for years, during such term, to another in fee simple,—it becomes the bounden duty of the landlord to protect his title by regaining possession; that the statute of limitations cuts no figure as affording a protection against the rights of the landlord, for the simple reason that statutes of limitations only apply to those instances where the possession is tortious ab initio, whereas in the other instance we shall hereafter unfold the possession ab initio is not tortious.

It need not be that the first possession shall be under deed, though in the case at bar it was so. The theory of the law, in such cases, is that the possession of the land is such as includes a seisin of the premises, and such seisin in the person in possession of the land is incompatible with possession as a tenant, and after the lapse of 20 years such possession under a claim of title will draw to it the presumption of a grant from the true owner in fee. Of course, this possession must be adverse, open, continuous. The court of last resort in this state, in an action wherein the present plaintiff corporation was plaintiff, (Trustees v. Meetze, 4 Rich. Law, 50,) held that the deed of Rall, the lessee of plaintiff, whereby he conveyed the land demised to him unto Meetze by a fee-simple deed, was a disclaimer of Rall's tenancy, and the plaintiff might have sued without notice to quit, and before the termination of the lease; but in the case cited Meetze failed in his defense because the 20 years had not elapsed since the making of the deed from Rall to him. The doctrine of presumption of title arising from great lapse of time—20 years or more—has been recognized and enforced in this state for many years, and in many cases. McClure v. Hill, 2 Mill, Const. 425; Smith v. Asbell, 2 Strob. 141; McLeod v. Rogers, 2 Rich. Law, 22; Trustees v. McCully, 11 Rich. Law, 429; Thompson v. Brannon, 14 S. C. 552. In the case in 11 Rich. Law, 429, Judge Wardlaw, in delivering the opinion of the court, among other things, said: "The presumption is founded upon the supposed acquiescence of the person shown to have been the former owner, and infers such transfer of his right as legalized the enjoyment." But it is apprehended that the presumption need not necessarily be founded upon the supposed acquiescence of the person shown to have been the former owner. It may be bottomed upon the presumption of any other title to the premises, which could, by being united to possession, give good title to lands.

It may be well to notice the distinction as to the extent and effect of this presumption as drawn by Judge Wardlaw in the case in 11 Rich. Law, 429, and that on the same subject by Judge Evans in Smith v. Asbell, 2 Strob. 148. Judge Wardlaw seems to give force to the presumption as one of fact that by operation of law has acquired such an artificial force that the jury may be instructed to allow it a controlling influence. His words, in this connection, are: "The presumption of title arising from long, continuous possession, unquestioned and unexplained, was not held to be a presumption juris et de jure, irrefutable, such as the court might make, nor even one that the jury were bound to make without regard to the circumstances which contradicted it; but it was considered a presumption of fact to which an artificial force is ascribed by the law, and which the jury were recommended to make, not because they believed the fact, but because it is wise and expedient to respect what is consecrated by time, and to give the same measure to all in the same condition, by giving effect to the fixed period of 20 years as a rule, instead of producing the uncertainty and inequality which must result from the various impressions which circumstantial evidence makes upon various minds. See McClure v. Hill, 2 Mill, Const. 425; Hillary v. Waller, 12 Ves. 268. This presumption is like the presumption of the payment of a bond after twenty years unexplained, and like the presumption of right that arises from the enjoyment of an easement for twenty years." Judge Evans, in the case cited from 2 Strob. 148, said: "In the elementary books (see Starkie, Ev. pt. 4, p. 1240) presumptions are said to be of three kinds: First. Presumptions of law, which correspond with the praesumptio juris et de jure of the civilians. These are conclusive, and cannot be rebutted. Second. Presumptions of law and fact. These are like the praesumptio juris of the civil law. Of these the presumption of payment of a bond or of a grant after 20 years is an illustration. The third kind are presumptions of fact, and are mere inferences, calculated to produce belief, and have no legal efficacy beyond their tendency to satisfy the mind of the truth of the alleged fact. * * *

But presumptions of law are like the statutes of limitations. They are artificial rules, which have a legal effect independent of any belief, and stand in the place of proof until the contrary be shown. The presumption in the case under consideration, if it exists, belongs to this class, and the question we are to decide is whether there was anything in the case which required of the circuit court the instruction to the jury that they might presume the existence of the deed in question. The rule laid down in McClure v. Hill, 2 Mill, Const. 420, is that a continuous, adverse possession of twenty years raises the presumption of a grant in the absence of any of those facts which go to rebut the presumption. This rule has been followed in all the subsequent cases. * * * The facts necessary to authorize the presumption are that the possession was adverse, and that it was continuous for twenty years." The distinction between the views of these two judges, both eminent and safe advisors, seems to us to consist in this: That Judge Wardlaw seems to leave it as a fact to be treated of by the jury as they may deem best; or, in other words, that the jury are at liberty to disregard it in making up their verdict. Not so with Judge Evans, for, if the presumption is not rebutted by proof of facts that negative its existence, the jury must accept it as conclusive in an issue of title. It seems to us the views of Judge Evans are more consistent than those of Judge Wardlaw, for, if the presumption arises from possession for 20 years, which is adverse, open, and continuous during those years, and which presumption is not rebutted by proof of any facts, it should be regarded as a rule of law, and not, therefore, to be disregarded by the jury. By this course the same measure is meted out to all alike.

The propriety of such a rule is very well set forth in the opinion of Mr. Justice Baldwin in Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 52, 53, who had referred to the cases of mortgagor retaining possession after breach of condition; the cases of tenants in common where one tenant, whose possession was for all other tenants in common, denies the tenure, ousts the other tenants, and receives all the rents and profits to his own exclusive use; and also trustees, who disavow their trusts; and those cases of fraud after its discovery, —then said: "All these principles bear directly on the case now before us. They are well settled and unquestioned rules in all courts of law and equity, and necessarily lead to the same conclusion to which this court has arrived. The relations created by a lease are not more sacred than those of a trust or of a mortgage. By setting up or attorning to a title adverse to his landlord, the tenant commits a fraud as much as by the breach of any other trust. Why, then, should the statute not protect him as well as any other fraudulent trustee from the time the fraud is discovered or known to the landlord? If he suffers the tenant to retain possession twenty years after a tenancy is disavowed, and cannot account for his delay in bringing his suit, why should he be exempted from the operation of the statute more than the mortgagor or the mortgagee? We can perceive no good reasons for allowing this peculiar and exclusive privilege to a lessor. We can find no rule of law or equity which makes it a matter of duty to do it, and have no hesitation in deciding that in this case the statute of limitations is a bar to the plaintiff's action." Before going further, it may be well to recur a moment to the proposition of law regulating the force and effect of presumptions, for in that connection we remarked that they were rebuttable by proof of facts inconsistent with such presumptions. We mean that if, when such a presumption is relied upon, it is proved that during the pendency of the lease and during the period of time claimed to raise the presumption, any admission of title in the landlord, such as the payment of rent, or like circumstance, can be proved, it will rebut such presumption. Any proof in fact that negatives the adverse holding and its continuity, will defeat the presumption.

As before remarked, the legislature of this state has prevented any plea of the statute of limitations to defeat the plaintiff corporation's rights in these Wadsworth lands, but by two decisions of the court of last resort in this state, and to both of which actions this plaintiff corporation was party plaintiff, (we refer to Trustees v. Meetze, supra, and to Trustees v. McCully, supra,) it was held that although the statute of limitations could not be pleaded to bar such plaintiff corporations, yet that the legislature did not interdict the defense of the presumption of title or grant arising from 20 years' adverse, open, and continuous possession, which was not rebutted by proof of facts inconsistent with such presumption. In the latter case just cited it was held: "The presumption is independent of the statute of limitations. It applies to subjects not within the statute, and it depends upon principles which would operate if there was no such statute. * * * The period of twenty years was originally adopted in analogy to the English statute of limitations, but it has no connection with our statute. It would be a great stretch of the special indulgence given by the suspending act to say that thereby the plaintiff was not only shielded against the effect of ten years' possession, (five in 1805,) but was indemnified against all the effect of time and acquiescence."

Again, it has seemed to us that the character of this adverse holding, originating in the possession of the premises under a deed purporting to convey these premises in fee simple, and promptly placed upon record in the office of the registry of mesne conveyance in the proper county more than 40 years before this action was brought, is entitled to great weight. Not such as obtains from a matter of record as it is known in the law. The registry of deeds does not rank in this way; for only judgments of courts of record, when entered upon the records of such courts, can claim this distinction. But we mean that notice is given by recording in the office of the registry of mesne conveyance, and especially the deed from a vendor to a vendee. By a deed of conveyance in fee simple the vendor separates himself from the land conveyed, and the vendee under such deed has no further connection with his vendor, the purchase money having been paid. Chief Justice Marshall, in Blight's Lessee v. Rochester, 7 Wheat. 535, very aptly brings this in view when he says, at page 547: "The propriety of applying the doctrines between lessor and lessee to a vendor and vendee may well be doubted. The vendee acquires the property for himself, and his faith is not pledged to maintain the title of the vendor. The rights of the vendor are intended to be extinguished by the sale, and he has no continuing interest in the maintenance of his title, unless he should be called upon, in consequence of some covenant of warranty in his deed. The property having become, by the sale, the property of the vendee, he has a right to fortify that title by the purchase of any other which may protect him in the quiet enjoyment of the premises. No principle of morality restrains him from doing this, nor is either the letter or the spirit of the contract violated by it."

We have endeavored to make our meaning plain in regard to the effect of these deeds of conveyance in fee simple. We regard the first of such conveyances as a fraud upon the rights of the landlord, and as giving him a right of action to recover possession of such leased premises immediately after the execution of such deed, and that such right of action, if brought at any time within 20 years immediately following the execution of such deed, would have restored the land demised to the plaintiff corporation. This brings us up squarely to the question, when was he bound to take notice of such deed? Unquestionably, if the fact of the execution of the deed had been brought to the actual attention of the plaintiff corporation at its date, he would have been so bound. But will not the possession be under the deed, and its being recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for Greenville county, have a similar effect? We think so.

It was unfortunate for the plaintiff corporation that the rent for the term was a sum in gross paid by the tenant at the beginning of the lease, for the reservation of a yearly rent or "one barley corn" was purely nominal. If the rent had been reserved to be paid annually, the landlord would have looked more closely after his rights in the premises. But the landlord and his tenant had the right to contract as they did, and, if these misfortunes had not occurred, the landlord's right to have recovered the demised premises at the expiration of the lease (1890) would have been unquestioned. The grand object of the creation of the trustees into a body corporate was to enable them all the more readily to discharge the trusts created by the will of Thomas Wadsworth, deceased. The corporation is liable, under the law, to sue, and to be sued. They can recover their rights under the law as well as can private individuals, and they are as liable to lose those rights by a failure to sue as are private individuals, except as affected by statutes of limitations. This presumption would have matured against a private individual. So it will against such corporation. We must overrule all the grounds of appeal numbered, respectively, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

The appellant complains that the circuit judge should have granted a new trial. So far as this request of appellant relates to questions of fact, this court is powerless to interfere. So far as it relates to misconceptions of the law by the circuit judge, from what we have already said, no error is to be imputed to the judge. It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McGOWAN, J. Under the authority of the decided cases, I concur.

McIVER, O. J. I concur in the result reached in this case, though, I must confess, after much hesitation. It seems to me that, inasmuch as a grantor cannot convey any greater estate or interest than that which is vested in him, the several conveyances, purporting to be deeds in fee simple, operated only as assignments of the original lease to Walker; and hence the several holders under those deeds, including the defendant, held under that lease, and their possession was, therefore, permissive, and not adverse. At least this was so until some act was done amounting to a forfeiture of the lease, of which the plaintiff had notice, more than 20 years before the commencement of this action. I was unable to see how the plaintiff could maintain an action against any one of the several holders of the land before the termination of the lease, for all that the defendant would have to do in such a case would be to throw himself upon his rights as assignee of the lease, and thus defeat the action. But the case of Trustees v. Meetze, 4 Rich. Law, 50, decides, as I understand it, that the lease to Rall "did not prevent the plaintiffs from suing the defendant, whose possession under the conveyance in fee simple from Rall was clearly adverse. The conveyance in fee simple was a disclaimer of Rall's tenancy, and the plaintiffs might sue without notice to quit, and before the termination of the lease," provided the plaintiffs had notice of such adverse holding; for it will be observed that the third instruction to the jury (affirmed by the court of appeals) was that, "if Rall's possession was permissive, his declaration to Taylor (even if made after the supposed lease) that he would claim under the statute of limitations, could not convert his permissive possession into an adverse possession, without notice to the plaintiffs of such adverse holding." This case, therefore, is decisive of the point, and my doubts must yield to its authority.

Another point of doubt is the question of notice to the plaintiff that the several parties were claiming to hold the land adversely under the fee-simple deeds. I do not think that the record of these deeds operated as constructive notice to the plaintiff, for, as I understand the rule, a party is bound to look up, but not down, the line. As is said in 20 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 596: "The operation of the record as notice is prospective and not retrospective." Hence as is there said: "A prior mortgagee cannot be charged with notice of, and cannot be affected by a subsequent mortgage or deed by the mere record thereof." See, also, Lake v. Shumate, 20 S. C. 32, to the same effect. The jury having been instructed in accordance with this view, it then became a pure question of fact as to whether the plaintiff had actual notice, and, if they erred in their finding as to such fact, such error is beyond our reach. The remedy was by a motion before the circuit judge for a new trial, which seems to have been unsuccessfully resorted to. If in fact there was no evidence of such notice, (which I must say seems to me was the case,) then the circuit judge should have granted a new trial; but, even if there was error in this respect, this court has often held that it was without jurisdiction to correct such error.

G. OBER & SONS CO. v. BLALOCK.

SALE—WARRANTY—PLEADINGS—WITNESS.

1. The right of a foreign corporation to sue in the courts of South Carolina cannot be questioned by a general demurrer.

2. The board of trustees of Clemson College having, by act of the legislature, been made the custodian of records of the former department of agriculture, the president of that board is competent to identify the record of the analysis of certain fertilizers made by the department of agriculture.

3. Where a fertilizer sold contains the ingredients represented, the seller is not liable to the buyer for a failure of the article to produce the desired results, in the absence of an express warranty as to such results.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Laurens county; J. J. Norton, Judge.

Action by the G. Ober & Sons Company against James S. Blalock for the price of goods sold and delivered. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

After verdict for plaintiff, defendant moved for a new trial on the grounds (1) that the verdict of the jury is against the weight of evidence; (2) for errors in the charge of the presiding judge; and (3) error on the part of the jury, in finding interest for plaintiff on the amount. This motion was overruled, and judgment was entered on the verdict.

Following are defendant's assignments of error:

"(1) Because the presiding judge erred in refusing to sustain the oral demurrer to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; complaint showing on its face that the action was brought in the name of a foreign corporation, that the contract was made in this state by said corporation, and yet failing to show that, under its charter, it had the right to make such a contract, and had the right to sue in the courts of this state.

"(2) Because he erred in not sustaining the said demurrer, when it did not appear from the complaint that the plaintiff ever made any contract with defendant.

"(3) Because the presiding judge erred in stating in open court, during the progress of this trial, that the plaintiff had proved that the guano furnished to the defendant did contain the ingredients that it professed that it contained, when it is submitted that was the question of fact in the case, and one which he should have left the jury to decide.

"(4) Because he erred in stating, during the progress of the trial, that the plaintiff company agreed to furnish to the defendant certain fertilizer, of known ingredients, and did not agree to guaranty any results, there being no evidence to support such a conclusion.

"(5) Because he erred in stating, during the progress of the trial: 'It seems to me that the state chemist being appointed for the further protection of the farmer, and having examined the fertilizer, it is presumed to be correct, and that presumption must be overcome.'

"(6) Because he erred in stating that the tags showed that the state chemist had examined the guano, and that it was all right.

"(7) Because he erred in allowing R. W. Simpson, a witness for the plaintiff, to testify as to the analysis made by the state chemist.

"(8) Because the presiding judge erred in charging the jury that the defendant's attorneys conceded that, if the guano was properly compounded, then there was no guaranty as to results.

"(9) Because he erred in charging the jury that the defendant's counsel admitted that the brand of guano used by defendant produced good results in other places.

"(10) Because he erred in charging the jury: 'I charge you that, if you find that the guano purchased by Mr. Blalock did contain the ingredients which he alleges that it contained,—at least, so much of the valuable ingredients as he alleges that it contained,—then you ought to find a verdict for the plaintiff.'

"(11) Because he erred in charging the jury: 'If you think that the fertilizer did not wholly fail, but failed in part, to combine the constituent elements,—that is, that they were not in such proportions as to be of full value, if it had been partly compounded according to the formula, but were yet of some value to Mr. Blalock,—then you ought to find so much as you think they were of value to him.'

"(12) Because he erred in refusing to charge defendant's first, second, and third requests to charge.

"(13) Because he erred in charging the jury that if the guano used by defendant came up to the analysis, and if it contained the ingredients it was warranted to contain, the said defendant would be bound to pay for it, even though it proved to be of no value to him whatever.

"(14) Because he erred in charging the jury: 'I suppose that your common sense would teach you that, to make the seller of fertilizers responsible for the benefit to be derived by the purchaser from it, it must have been used under circumstances which would produce a proper result. If there was a season without rain, for instance, entirely, of course no amount of fertilization would make the cotton sprout in the hill, and grow, or if, as soon as the cotton was up, there should be no more rain, of course the plant would wither away and die.'—it being respectfully submitted that such language was in the nature of an argument to the jury, and testimony in behalf of the plaintiff.

"(15) Because he erred in charging plaintiff's first, second, and third requests to charge.

"(16) Because he erred in refusing to grant the motion for a new trial nisi on the ground that the jury improperly gave the plaintiff interest on its claim.

"(17) Because the presiding judge erred in charging, after reading the contract set out in the complaint: 'That I construe to be a contract for the delivery of a certain article—that is, Farmers' Standard Phosphate—manufactured by, or under the formula of, G. Ober & Sons Company. It is not stated in the contract what the ingredients should be. It is not stated what the results should be. But we have evidence outside of that what the formula, or what per cent. of the different valuable substances in this fertilizer should be, and we have no statement of any guaranteed results.'

"(18) Because he erred in charging the jury that, as a matter of law, there was no implied warranty of good results, on the part of plaintiff, as to the guano."

Ferguson & Featherstone, for appellant.
Simpson & Barksdale, for respondent.

McGOWAN, J. The plaintiff, (respondent,) according to the allegations of the complaint, is a body corporate and politic, by and under the laws of the state of Maryland, and is competent to sue in the courts of the state of South Carolina. The corporation was the manufacturer of a certain brand of fertilizer, known as "Farmers' Standard Phosphate," and on January 13, 1890, sold to James S. Blalock 10 tons of said fertilizer at $25 per ton, delivered at Goldsville, S. C. The contract is set out in full in the complaint, and is in the form of a proposition in writing, accepted by the defendant, as follows: "Baltimore. January 13, 1890. Dear Sir: We will ship you ten tons of our Farmers' Standard Phosphate, or as much more as may be mutually satisfactory, at twenty-five dollars per ton of two thousand (2,000) pounds, in bags, on board of cars or boat at Goldsville, S. C., to be settled for by your note or notes, to average due November 1, 1890, and payable at our office, Baltimore, Md.," etc. This offer was accepted in writing. The article was furnished according to the contract, but Blalock declined to give his note, and refused to pay for the fertilizer. The plaintiff brought his action on the contract, and the defendant interposed the defense that the fertilizer proved to be worthless,—produced no good "results,"—and set up a counterclaim for damages sustained by reason of the alleged worthlessness of the guano. The issues were tried before Judge Norton and a jury. Under the charge of the judge, the jury found for the plaintiff the amount sued for, and interest from the time the note was to have been given. The defendant moved for a new trial on the grounds stated in the brief, but the motion was refused, and the case comes to this court upon various exceptions. Both parties made requests to charge, some of which were charged, and others refused, in whole or in part. They are all in the record, and we will only consider such of them as are objected to, in connection with the exceptions. The exceptions are long and numerous, (18 in number,) and we will endeavor to condense them by following the classification adopted in the argument of appellant's counsel.

Exception 1, relating to the refusal of the judge to sustain the oral demurrer, and 12, complaining of error in refusing to charge defendant's first and second requests, will be considered together. The first of these requests was "that the plaintiff must show that, under its charter, it has the right to make such a contract as is sued on here, and, if it fails to show that by the evidence, the jury should find for the defendant." The second request was "that the plaintiff must show by the evidence that it has the right, under its charter, to sue in the courts of South Carolina, and if it fails to show this the jury should find for the defendant," etc.

First, then, as to the oral demurrer: The complaint alleged that the plaintiff was a corporation of Maryland, and competent to sue in the courts of South Carolina. These were matters which related to the plaintiff's right to sue, but were really no part of its cause of action, and therefore could not be put in issue by a mere "general denial," but for that purpose a specific denial was necessary. There was no specific denial here as to the plaintiff being a corporation with the right to sue in this state, for the statement, "no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief," etc., is only another form of a general denial. As to these points, then, the defendant made no adequate issue. They were, in effect, admitted by the pleadings, and, of course, the judge was right in overruling, to that extent, the oral demurrer. See Steamship Co. v. Rodgers, 21 S. C. 27, and Lumber Co. v. Risley, 25 S. C. 309, and authorities cited. But it is urged that the complaint did not allege that the plaintiff corporation had the right to enter into the contract herein stated, in the state of South Carolina, and the general denial must be considered as sufficient to put in issue the whole case, including this right. It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove it before it could recover. As it seems to us, the admission of the right to sue would necessarily carry with it the right to contract. The right insisted on pertains to the right to sue, and not to the plaintiff's cause of action. Besides it is well settled now, in this state, that a corporation created by the laws of one state may lawfully do business in another state, unless forbidden by its charter, or by the laws of such other state. "Nor are we aware of any law or public policy of this state either expressly or impliedly prohibiting such a corporation from doing business in this state." Ex parte Benson, 18 S. C. 43; Kerchner v. Gettys, Id. 525; Bank v. Earle, 13 Pet. 519.

Exception 2 was not pressed, and 3, 4, 5, and 6 complain that the judge expressed his opinion on certain facts, as follows: "(1) That the plaintiff had proved that the guano furnished did contain the ingredients that it professed to have. (2) That the company agreed to furnish to the defendant a certain fertilizer, of known ingredients, and did not agree to guaranty results. (3) 'It seems to me that the state chemist, being appointed for the further protection of the farmers, and having examined the fertilizer, it is presumed to be correct, and that presumption must be overcome.' (4) In stating that the tags showed that the state chemist had examined the guano, and that it was all right," etc. The point is made that in the particulars above indicated the judge violated section 28, art. 4, of the constitution, which "prohibits judges from charging juries as to matters of fact." We have read the whole charge carefully, and we think there is some misapprehension as to the precise meaning and extent of the remarks attributed to the judge, taken, as they are, from the context. But, without going into that, we think it is enough to say that it was the duty of the judge to construe the written contract of the parties, and that the remarks were not made in charging the jury, but in hearing argument, and making rulings as to the admissibility of evidence, during the progress of the case. The judge was not expressing an opinion upon any of the points made, which, by any possibility, could reach and influence the jury, especially as, in his charge to the jury, he carefully explained all the points referred to. See State v. Atkinson, 33 S. C. 101, 11 S. E. Rep. 693, and State v. Turner, 36 S. C. 534, 15 S. E. Rep. 602.

Exception 7 charges that the judge erred in allowing R. W. Simpson, a witness for the plaintiff, to testify as to the analysis made by the state chemist. It does not seem to be denied that Mr. Simpson was a competent witness, and that he could prove the record of the analysis which showed the ingredients, and by whom made. The witness testified as follows: "Am president of the board of trustees of Clemson College. The board has in its possession, and under its control, the books and records of the department formerly known as the 'Department of Agriculture for South Carolina.' These books and records show the inspection and analysis of such fertilizers as were inspected in South Carolina during the seasons of 1889 and 1890. They show the inspection and analysis of the Farmers' Standard Phosphate manufactured by G. Ober & Sons Company for the season of 1889 and 1890. It was inspected March 1, 1890, at Grier, S. C., by S. W. Vause, agent of the department of agriculture. I have, amongst the books and records above referred to, a record of the inspection and analysis of the Farmers' Standard Phosphate for the season of 1889 and 1890, [giving full copy of analysis by Prof. Burney, of the South Carolina College,]" etc. By an act of the legislature, December, 1890, the board of trustees of Clemson College was made the custodian and keeper of all the books and records of the former department of agriculture. "Attested copies of records, signed by the keepers of such records respectively, shall be deemed and allowed as good evidence, in any of the courts of this state as the original could or might have been if produced to the said courts." See section 2217 of the General Statutes.

Exceptions 8 and 9, concerning alleged statements of the judge as to what he understood to have been "admitted" by defendant's counsel, were withdrawn. •

Exceptions 10, 13, 15, 17, and 18, and so much of 11 as relates to defendant's third request to charge, virtually raise but one question of law, and may be considered together. The judge was requested to charge "that in this state a sound price warrants a sound commodity, and, if the commodity should prove to be of no value, the party buying has a right to refuse to pay for same, and set up the failure of consideration as a defense." The judge charged that the request was true, as a legal proposition, but whether it is applicable to a particular case, or not, depends upon the circumstances. "There could be no doubt if Mr. Blalock, accustomed to the use of fertilizers, was informed that a fertilizer, with certain ingredients, was offered him, and that plaintiffs guarantied that it should contain these ingredients, and nothing more,—no other guaranty being made than that it contained these certain ingredients, and nothing more,—then Mr. Blalock took his fertilizer at his own risk; and if it proved to be of no value whatever, if it contained the ingredients that it was warranted to contain, manipulated in the way that it had been warranted to be manipulated, he would be bound for it, although the circumstances under which he used it was [made it] of no value whatever to him. I suppose that your common sense would teach you that, to make the seller of fertilizers responsible for the benefit to be derived by the purchaser from it, it must have been used under circumstances which would produce a proper result. If there was a season without rain, for instance, entirely, of course no amount of fertilization would make the cotton sprout in the hill and grow, or if, as soon as the cotton was up, there should be no more rain, of course the plant would wither away and die. So that all, under any circumstances, a seller of the fertilizer could be held to do, would be that, under suitable circumstances, it would produce a given result. But when he undertakes to guaranty that it contains certain elements, and don't guaranty anything else, then I charge you that he is not responsible for the results, unless he makes some further representation as to results, as was done by Mr. Robson in the case that I have just called to your attention, against Dr. Miller," etc. Was this error? The contract was in writing, and it was the duty of the judge to give it construction. It was short and plain,—so many tons of the Farmers' Standard Phosphate for so many dollars. Calling the article by its commercial name could not create any difficulty. The article was known to be a fertilizer compounded of certain ingredients, and the contract would have been no more clear and explicit if it had expressly mentioned all the ingredients known to be contained in its composition. The judge charged that the contract was, in effect, an express warranty that the article contained all the elements known to constitute what was called the "Farmers' Standard Phosphate," compounded by the formula of G. Ober & Sons Company, and no more; that it was silent as to anticipated results from its use. This was certainly the proper construction of the written contract. If so, the question arises whether, in addition to the express contract, the law will imply another, insuring good results from the application of the article. As we understand, it is only in cases where there is no express warranty that the law will imply one, or set up what is sometimes erroneously called the "equitable condition of the sale." The general rule, very clearly, is that, where the contract is reduced to writing, parol evidence is inadmissible to show that anything else was intended than what was expressed. The presumption always is, in the absence of proof, that the parties to any written agreement between them have, upon the subject-matter, expressed their whole agreement. Besides, there would seem to be an inherent difficulty, from the uncertainty incident to the subject, in attempting to estimate the fruits of the application of a fertilizer, for the results must always depend largely upon the manner of its application, the character of the soil, the seasons, climate, culture, etc. It is insisted, however, that the rule is not always applicable, and it does seem that there is an exception in the case where the express warranty goes only to the title, as in Wells v. Speer, 1 McCord, 421. But this case was restricted by that of McLaughlin v. Horton, 1 Hill, (S. C.) 383, as applicable "only to a case where the express warranty is silent, for, if there is any stipulation in the written contract in relation to the quality of the thing sold, the law will imply nothing." Heyward v. Wallace, 4 Stob. 181. There certainly were, in the contract here, "express stipulations" as to the quality of the article,—indeed a warranty of the ingredients necessary to make the article sold,—and we therefore concur with the judge, and think he committed no error. The result might have been different if the plaintiff here had warranted results, as was done by the plaintiffs in the case cited by the circuit judge, of Robson v. Miller, 12 S. C. 586. The learned counsel for the defendant cites some cases from our sister state of Georgia which seem to favor the view so strongly urged by them,—particularly, the case of Wilcox v. Owens, 64 Ga. 601. But these cases were decided under the Code of that state, which, as we understand it, materially changed the general law upon the subject. It is stated in one of the cases that section 2651 of their Code provides as follows: "The seller, however, in all cases (unless expressly or from the nature of the transaction excepted,) warrants: (1) that he has a valid title and the right to sell; (2) that the article sold is marketable and reasonably suited to the use intended," etc. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be affirmed.

McIVER, C. J., and POPE, J., concur.

SULLIVAN v. SUSONG et al.

(Supreme Court of South Carolina. Nov. 28, 1893.)

ATTORNEY — AUTHORITY TO ACCEPT SERVICE OF SUMMONS — ACTION AGAINST PARTNERSHIP — DEATH OF PARTNER BEFORE JUDGMENT — EFFECT.

1. Authority of an attorney to accept service of summons for a partnership, of which the members are nonresidents, is sufficiently shown by the signing of a bond prepared by the attorney by each of the partners, a statement in an affidavit by one partner of their knowledge that the attorney appeared and was acting for them, the attendance of two of the partners at the beginning of the trial, and the upholding of the attorney by the partners during five years of litigation.

2. The acceptance by an attorney of service of summons for a partnership need not be in the firm name, or in that of each member thereof "per" the attorney.

3. A written admission of service of summons by the duly-authorized attorney for defendant is binding on defendant.

4. Where a partner dies pending an action against the partnership, and his death is not suggested on the record, nor his personal representative substituted, before the rendition of a judgment for plaintiff, the judgment is a lien on the partnership assets, and binding on the surviving partners personally; and plaintiff may, by order of court, make the personal representative of the deceased partner a party to the action, and such representative may then show any reason why the judgment should not bind the estate of the deceased partner.

Appeal from common pleas circuit court of Aiken county; J. H. Hudson, Judge.

Action by W. E. Sullivan against G. W. Susong, W. A. Susong, A. E. Susong, D. L. Boyd, and James H. Rumbough, as partners under the firm name of Susong & Co. Judgment for plaintiff. From an order denying a motion to vacate the judgment and attachments issued shortly after service of summons, W. A. Susong, A. E. Susong, D. L. Boyd, and A. J. Mosely, as administrator of G. W. Susong, deceased, appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Haynsworth & Parker, for appellants. Henderson Bros., for respondent.

POPE, J. An action was commenced by the plaintiff against the defendants, G. W. Susong, W. A. Susong, A. E. Susong, D. L. Boyd, and James H. Rumbough, as composing the firm of Susong & Co., on the 17th June, 1887, in the court of common pleas for Aiken county, in this state. Service was made upon the defendants by an acceptance of their attorney at law, W. C. Benet, Esq., on the 1st day of July, 1887, in writing. The object of the action was to recover by the plaintiff of the firm of Susong & Co. the sum of $10,518.28 for services rendered such firm, under a contract in writing, in the construction of the Atlantic, Greenville & Western Railway Company. An answer was duly filed to such complaint on behalf of the defendants by their said attorney at law. Before the answer was filed, a writ in attachment had been issued to the counties of Aiken, Edgefield, Abbeville, Laurens, and Greenville, in this state, under an affidavit that defendants were nonresidents, but had property in this state; and before the attachments were released by the plaintiff, and as a condition precedent thereto, a bond in the penal sum of $21,050 was made and signed by each defendant, with Alexander Stuart and James T. Williams as sureties, wherein it was recited that the defendants before named constituted the firm of Susong & Co., and that each of them was a nonresident of South Carolina, but that their sureties, Stuart and Williams, were residents in this state, to wit, in the city of Greenville, state of South Carolina, and each one of the parties before named was bound in the sum as aforesaid unto the plaintiff, who was a creditor suing the said Susong & Co. for the sum of $10,518.28, with interest and costs, and which plaintiff had attached the property of the said Susong & Co., besides the property of certain of the members of said firm, in this state, conditioned to pay "the amount of the judgment that may be recovered against the said Susong & Co., defendants' debtors, in the action brought by the said W. E. Sullivan against said Susong & Co." in the court of common pleas for Aiken county for $10,518.28. This bond was dated the 27th July, A. D. 1887. A very stubbornly contested litigation was conducted, extending through a period of nearly five years, in which three appeals were carried to the supreme court of this state, (9 S. E. 156; 15 S. E. 377,) but ultimately the plaintiff recovered a judgment for $11,375.62 and costs, which was affirmed by the supreme court on the 9th day of May, 1892. 15 S. E. 377.

On September 24, 1892, A. J. Mosely, as administrator of the estate of George W. Susong, deceased, served a notice upon the plaintiff that he would move the court of common pleas for Aiken county, at its term next ensuing after date of notice: (1) For an order vacating the judgment in this case "upon the ground that the said George W. Susong departed this life before the hearing and rendering of judgment herein, and no order was made allowing the action to proceed against his representative or successor in interest, nor was his death suggested upon the records." (2) For an order vacating and discharging the attachments issued herein (a) upon the ground that said attachments are void, in that they were issued at or about the time of issuing the summons in this action, and before service of the same, and said summons was not served personally upon this defendant, or, indeed, upon any of the persons named as defendants, within 30 days after issuing said attachments, and no publication thereof was commenced in said time; (b) upon the ground that the attachments were irregular, in that the attachment bond given by the plaintiff was not proved or acknowledged as required by law, and also in other respects apparent upon said papers.

At the same time (24th September, 1892) the defendants W. A. Susong, A. E. Susong, and D. L. Boyd served a notice upon the plaintiff that at the time noticed by A. J. Mosely, as administrator of the estate of G. W. Susong, they would move: (1) For an order vacating the judgment, as to them, upon the ground that the summons herein has never been served upon them, either personally or by publication, and that the court did not have jurisdiction to render said judgment, and upon the ground that G. W. Susong, the only defendant herein who submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the court, died before the hearing of this case, and judgment was rendered without the making of an order allowing the action to proceed against his representative or successor in interest. (2) To vacate the acceptance of service of the summons and complaint, and the answer filed herein, in so far as they purport to bind them, upon the ground that said acceptance and answer were unauthorized. (3) For an order vacating the attachments issued herein (a, b) upon the same grounds set forth in the notice of A. J. Mosely as administrator; (c) upon the ground that the said attachments were improvidently issued as to these defendants, in that they were not indebted to plaintiff in any amount.

The issues thus tendered came on to be heard before his honor, Judge Hudson, upon quite an array of affidavits for and against the said issues of fact, and on the 4th day of November, 1892, the circuit judge made and filed his decision as follows:

"This matter was submitted to me in open court at Aiken upon the call of the calendar, and argued before me, by consent of counsel, at Waltherborough. The defendants W. A. Susong, A. E. Susong, D. L. Boyd, and James H. Rumbough gave notice of a motion to vacate and set aside a judgment against Susong & Co. in favor of this plaintiff in the aforesaid action for $11,375.82 on the 14th July, 1890, by the clerk of the court of Aiken county, in pursuance of a decree of Judge Fraser, which has since been affirmed by the supreme court; also, a motion to vacate the attachment which was issued at the commencement of this action, as against the defendants, as nonresidents, and levied on their property in this state. A. J. Mosely, clerk of the court at Greenville, as administrator of G. W. Susong, (who, it seems, died before Judge Fraser's decree,) joins in said motion. At the hearing the motions were withdrawn as to the defendant James H. Rumbough. The grounds on which it is insisted that the judgment must be vacated are that the defendants were nonresidents, and were not served personally or by publication, and that W. C. Benet, Esq., who accepted service for them, was not authorized so to do. The summons and attachment were issued on the 17th

June, 1887. The attachment was levied on property of the defendants in several counties in this state. An order for publication of the summons was granted on the 20th June, 1887. On July 1, 1887, within 30 days from the issuance of the summons and the granting of the attachment, W. C. Benet, Esq., a reputable attorney at the bar, accepted due service of the summons for all the defendants. If he were authorized so to do, then this was equivalent to personal service on the defendants. One mode of proof of personal service, as laid down in our Code, (section 159, subd. 4.) is 'the written admission of the defendants,' and written admission by a duly-authorized attorney is admission by the principal of said attorney. Reed v. Reed, 19 S. C. 551. That Mr. Benet had the authority to do what he did, is presumed; and, as a matter of fact, I find, after a careful examination of all the testimony and the argument, that he was fully authorized and empowered by each of the defendants to accept service of the summons in this action for them, which he did in due form within the 30 days from the issuance of the summons. Plaintiff's attorney applied to him, asking if he had authority and would accept service for said defendants. He said he would write to them for instructions, and afterwards, in pursuance of such instructions, he accepted service. Besides this, if this authorized acceptance and appearance needed ratification, there is abundant proof of such ratification by all the defendants. An answer was filed for them. A hot litigation ensued, promoted and counseled by them, which lasted five years, in various tribunals, in which some of them personally appeared, aiding their counsel, Mr. Benet, and of which all of them had knowledge. On the 27th July, 1887, a formal bond, prepared by Mr. Benet, for the release of the attachment, was executed, as the preponderance of the testimony shows, by all the defendants, and the property attached in Greenville released, the benefit of which was reaped by the defendants. These matters, and others in the case, clearly amount to an estoppel against the defendants from questioning Mr. Benet's alleged want of authority to accept service for them, and he is estopped by his own act.

"Mosely, as administrator of George W. Susong, joins in the motion to vacate the judgment on the further ground (and the other defendants claim the benefit of his motion) that his intestate died prior to the rendition of the judgment, and that such judgment should be vacated as to him, and for said reasons as to all, no person having been substituted on the record in his place. This position is not tenable. The action was against the defendants as partners. When G. W. Susong died, his other partners, as survivors of the firm, owned the partnership assets subject to the claims of creditors, and to the right of the administrators of a deceased partner to call them to an account.

But no revival of the said suit was necessary. It could proceed as against the concern. Besides this, the judgment is against the partnership. The defendants were joint debtors, and no effort is now being made to enforce the judgment against the separate property of G. W. Susong. As to the contention that A. E. Susong and W. E. Susong were not members of the firm, that matter is settled against them by the testimony, and especially by their powers of attorney to G. W. Susong, which show they were partners.

"The motions to vacate the judgments must be denied as to all the defendants, and also as to Mosely, the administrator of G. W. Susong, and so must be the motions to vacate attachment. Even if said motion could be entertained after the rendition of the judgment, still, as it appears by my aforesaid finding of fact that when Mr. Benet, on the 1st of July, 1887, within 30 days from the issuance of the attachment, was fully authorized to perform said act, then it follows that such written acceptance, being so authorized, bound the defendants, and each of them, and stands in lieu of personal service upon them, and is such personal service. All questions as to the formal execution of the attachment bond, and its acceptance by and acknowledgment before the clerk, were abandoned at the hearing. Wherefore, it is ordered that the motions herein made to vacate the judgment and attachment herein be, and the same are hereby, denied, with costs."

From this decretal order of Judge Hudson, the appellants urge the following exceptions: "(1) It is submitted that the circuit judge erred in holding that each of the defendants, within thirty days from the issuance of the summons, authorized and empowered W. C. Benet, Esq., to accept service of the summons for them, and in not holding that none of them had given such authority. (2) He erred in holding that the acceptance of service by Mr. Benet was personal service upon the defendants, within the meaning of section 248 of the Code. (3) Because he erred in not holding that the summons in this action had not been personally served upon the defendants, or publication commenced within thirty days after the issuance of the warrant of attachment, as required by law, and in not adjudging, therefore, that the said attachment was void. (4) He erred in holding that the acceptance of service by Mr. Benet was satisfied by all the defendants, and that they were estopped from disputing that he had originally authority; it being submitted that there is no evidence to show that they ever knew that he had accepted service of the summons, and that they had done no act of ratification. (5) Because, though assuming that the acts of the defendants were a sufficient ratification of the acceptance by Mr. Benet to validate the judgment, yet it is submitted that these acts did not occur within thirty days after the issuance of the attachment, and therefore could not, and did not, operate to validate said attachment, and his honor erred in not so holding. (6) Because he erred in holding that after the death of G. W. Susong the action could proceed against the defendants as though the said G. W. Susong were still living. (7) Because he erred in not holding that said action could not proceed after the death of G. W. Susong until his death was suggested on the record, or his administrator substituted, or, after one year, on supplemental complaint. (8) Because he erred in not setting aside the said judgment; it appearing that the said Geo. W. Susong had died before rendition of the judgment, that his death had not been suggested on the record, that his administrator had not been made a party to the suit, and that no supplemental complaint had been filed. (9) Because he erred in holding that the judgment, as it now stands, is a judgment against the partnership only, and that no effort is now being made to enforce the judgment against the property of Geo. W. Susong, it being submitted that the judgment, as it now stands, not only affects the property of the partnership, but of each partner and of Geo. W. Susong, including his real estate in the city of Greenville, and should have been set aside as to him and the other appellants."

The appellants have followed the practice recognized and enforced by this court in the cases of Crocker v. Allen, 34 S. C. 452, 13 S. E. 650, and Gillam v. Arnold, 35 S. C. 612, 14 S. E. 938. As the court said in the latter case, "when the relief sought consists in setting aside a judgment for some alleged defect in the proceedings by which it was recovered, it would seem to be eminently fit and proper that the question should be determined by the court, and in the case in which the judgment was recovered." It remains now for us to consider the grounds of exception to the order of the circuit judge, which denied them the relief they sought:

It is claimed by the appellants in their first five exceptions that there was error in holding that Mr. Benet, within the 30 days immediately ensuing the issuance of the summons, accepted service for the defendants of the summons in the case at bar. Wherever these exceptions relate to questions of fact, this court has repeatedly decided that such findings of the circuit judge will not be interfered with, unless without any testimony to support them, or where such findings are manifestly against the weight of the testimony. We have examined the case with care, and find that there was testimony to support this finding of fact by the judge. To begin with, there is, in writing, indorsed upon the summons itself, an admission by Mr. Benet that he accepts such service of the summons and complaint for Susong & Co., defendants, on the 1st of July, 1887. Then on the 27th day of July, 1887, we find that Mr. Benet prepared the bond in the attachment proceedings for his clients, Susong & Co., to sign, and that each one of them did sign such bond so prepared. Then we find, upon an examination of the bond itself, a direct and palpable admission by each member of this firm of Susong & Co. that the action of plaintiff against them as defendants had been begun in the court at Aiken for the exact sum sued for. Then we find in the affidavit of James H. Rumbough, one of that firm of Susong & Co., "that whilst it is true that he did not specifically, for himself, [italics ours,] authorize W. C. Benet to appear for him in said case of Sullivan v. Susong & Co., yet he knew that said Benet had appeared for the firm of Susong & Co. in said case, and answered for them, and said fact was well known to all the firm, [italics ours.] Said case was vigorously fought by the firm, and it was known that Mr. Benet was acting for us, [italics ours.]" Besides, two of the firm—George W. Susong and David L. Boyd—attended the trial of the cause, at its beginning, upholding while there, with might and main, the hands of their active and able attorney, Mr. Benet. It is idle, at this late day, with these facts in testimony at the hearing before the circuit judge on the motions made by appellants herein, to say there was no testimony to support this finding of the circuit judge. Was such finding against the manifest weight of the testimony? We cannot so find, in view of the facts testified to.

But appellants say the form in which the acceptance was made by Mr. Benet is utterly unavailing, because, as they say, it should have been signed by Susong & Co. or rather each individual member of such firm per Mr. Benet, and in support of such proposition they cite as authority Pryor v. Coulter, 1 Bailey, 517; Welsh v. Parish, 1 Hill, (S. C.) 154; Fash v. Ross, 2 Hill, (S. C.) 294; Taylor v. McLean, 1 McMul. 352; Moore v. Cooper, 1 Speer, 87; Webster v. Brown, 2 S. C. 431; De Walt v. Kinard, 19 S. C. 292; Johnson v. Johnson, 27 S. C. 316, 3 S. E. 606. We have examined these cases, and such examination shows that Pryor v. Coulter, supra; Welsh v. Parish, supra; Webster v. Brown, supra; De Walt v. Kinard, supra; and Johnson v. Johnson, supra,—were instances where deeds, either of conveyance or by way of mortgage, were in question, and in each of these the court held that, in order to make the deed executed by an agent for a principal effectual as the principal's deed, it must be signed and sealed in the name of the principal by the agent. But the cases of Fash v. Ross, supra; Taylor v. McLean, supra; and Moore v. Cooper, supra,—being instances where the agent signed notes, instead of the principal, have each been overruled by the court of errors of this state in the case of Robertson v. Pope, 1 Rich. Law, 501. In the case last cited the court said:

"But there is a wide distinction between the technical, formal execution of a deed, and the making of a parol contract. The one rests upon the technical, artificial rule that it must appear from the deed that the sealing and delivery was in the name of the principal. In a parol contract, it is sufficient if it appear that it was intended to be made for the principal." Thus it appears that this position of appellants is unfounded. The appellants, in their argument, very aptly distinguish between the power, in law, of an attorney under his general authority, and that derived by him under a special power, and very properly announce the rule to be that an attorney can only accept service for parties of a summons—the original process in a cause whereby jurisdiction of the person of a defendant is acquired by a court in a cause therein pending—under a special authority from such proposed defendant. All this is admitted by the circuit judge; and we understand him to hold, in the case at bar, that Mr. Benet was clothed by these defendants with this special power to accept service for them. It would, it seems to us, be a strange conclusion, in view of the testimony here, to allow these defendants, after an acceptance by their attorney of service of this original process, and putting in an answer with their knowledge and consent, and conducting a litigation for five years, nearly, and then, after a decision against them is reached, that, upon their present showing, they should now be allowed to repudiate such agency by their attorney. This court has had occasion more than once, recently, to declare the law to be that, where nonresidents appear and answer an action, they are forever afterwards precluded from a denial of the service of a summons. Chafee v. Telegraph Co., 35 S. C. 378, 14 S. E. 764; Meinhard v. Youngblood, 37 S. C. 235, 236, 15 S. E. 950. But it is suggested by appellants that, although this may be, yet the time at which this ratification may be had, if beyond the 30 days in which, by a statute of this state, such a harsh remedy as an attachment may be obtained, is of prime importance. In other words, appellants insist that an attachment cannot be supported if the summons is not served personally, or its equivalent, within 30 days after it is issued. This is true, but in the case at bar the summons was issued on the 17th June, 1887, and actually served. If Mr. Benet's acceptance is a service, on the 1st day of July, 1887, which was within the 30 days fixed by the statute as imperatively necessary in case of an attachment. This is no promise to accept, that Mr. Benet has made. This is no request in writing to delay the service. On the contrary, it is an actual, hard, admitted fact of this attorney's acceptance in writing on the summons itself, within the period fixed by the statute. Did Mr. Benet have the power, under the law, to accept this service? In the case of Reed v. Reed, 19 S. C. 551, the present chief justice stated: "The question, therefore, is narrowed down to the inquiry whether the admission of service by the attorneys of defendant amounts to the same thing as a written admission of service by himself in propria persona, for while the Code does not, in terms, provide that the written admission of service by the defendant may be by one duly authorized so to do by the defendant, yet we suppose that, upon well-settled principles, an admission so made would be binding upon the defendant." We are perfectly satisfied, still, with this enunciation of the law on this subject. It follows, therefore, that it was in the power of Mr. Benet, as the attorney for the defendants Susong & Co., if he had special authority so to do, to accept legal service for these, his clients. Having already determined that he was clothed by the defendants with such special authority, his acceptance of service of the summons was complete. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to add anything more on this point. These exceptions, therefore, are overruled.

The next three exceptions are more serious, and have caused us much reflection. While it is true that a partnership is an entity somewhat distinct from the entity of each member of it, yet for some purposes, and in some particulars, each member is a part—an essential part—of a firm. It is because of this character affixed by the law to partnerships that business enterprises made up by several persons are made corporate bodies by the authority of the state. Here these five gentlemen—the three Susongs, D. L. Boyd, and James H. Rumbough—entered into a partnership, and this partnership entered into this contract with the plaintiff. The action at bar was properly begun by the service of a summons upon each partner. At one time they were all in court in this action. Up to this point we have hereinbefore agreed with the plaintiff. But George W. Susong departed this life in 1888 or 1889, before any judgment had been rendered in the action. Could this action be continued thereafter without the presence of George W. Susong, or his personal representative? There would be no difficulty if the judgment rendered against this firm only bound the partnership assets, for we cannot see that the surviving partners, being already parties to the action, would not support such judgment against the firm. The mere absence of an entry upon the process suggesting the death of one partner would scarcely be regarded as a fatal vice in the judgment. That suggestion is proper in all such cases, and should have been entered on the record, but it is not incurable, for the court could order it done nunc pro tunc. The true difficulty consists in the dual character of a judgment against a firm. It binds,—that is, a lien upon,—on the one hand, the partnership property, and, on the other hand, is a lien upon the property of each individual partner. At this point we may refer to the decision of the court of appeals in this state, (Kuhne v. Law, 14 Rich. Law, 27,) where Judge Wardlaw, as the organ of the court, among other things, said: "At law, the firm, and every partner in it, is bound for a partnership debt. The liability is said to be joint and several, but the contract is joint only. Suits against partners severally could not be sustained. Each of them is the agent of the others, and the law makes no distinction between an execution against them as partners, and one against them as joint contractors acting each for himself. See cases cited, Bank v. Hodges, 11 Rich. Law, 730. Either execution has a lien upon the goods of every one of them, and satisfaction of either execution may be executed from any one of them, leaving him to compel contribution from the others." This case just cited was one from a law court, as distinguished from a court of equity. The case, from its importance, was heard by the court of errors; and while no decision was announced by the court of errors, but the judgment was from the court of appeals, we are informed in the decision itself: "The court of errors attained no satisfactory conclusion respecting the rule which should prevail in equity on the distribution of separate effects between separate and partnership creditors; but the judges were nearly, if not entirely, unanimous in the opinion that at law the supposed preference given to a separate creditor should not be allowed to prevail against a prior lien acquired by a partnership creditor." The court of appeals overruled Roberts v. Roberts, 8 Rich. Law, 15, wherein a different rule had been recognized.

In the case at bar, it is quite true that no separate creditor raises any question as to the judgment now in question; but the administrator, by law, represents all the creditors, and we conceive it to be in the line of his duty to such creditors to intervene, so that justice may be subverted, and the principles of law upheld. Such administrator has been quite tardy in making his appearance in this action, and he has given no reason or excuse for this tardiness. Still, he now complains, and we are not called upon to decide the effect of his slowness in putting in his appearance. While, at law, he is not a necessary party to a judgment against a firm of which his intestate was a party, if such judgment could be restricted to a lien on the partnership assets, still, in equity, where it is hoped that an end may be reached in its judgment, which will include the liability of the partnership to its creditors as well as that of the individual members composing the firm, he would be a necessary party. To follow this view to its full logical result, and thereby upset this judgment, so that its finality as to the four surviving members of the firm of Susong & Co. should be destroyed, would be a very harsh conclusion. Courts are not children's play houses. A law suit is a solemn thing. It is pre-eminent a practical thing. When this, the court of last resort in this state, is called upon to declare the freedom of the survivors of a partnership from a judgment to which they were parties, simply because another, who was a party, has died since the suit began, it is asking too much. Such a step would be monstrous. The words of the dean of the New York University Law School,—Austin Abbott,—in a recent article entitled "Lawlessness and the Reason of the Law," where he says, "The time is ripe for a systematic effort to bring disputed questions and conflicts of legal authorities directly to the test afforded by the bearing of the law on public welfare, * * *" are pregnant with meaning. In the light of our duty, we are inclined to adopt the course here that will hold these survivors—A. E. Susong, W. A. Susong, D. L. Boyd, and James H. Rumbough—bound by this judgment and the attachment, and to remand the case to the circuit court, with directions that plaintiff, by a simple order of the court served upon A. J. Mosely as administrator of the estate of George W. Susong, deceased, make him a party to this action, in which he shall be allowed to show, if he can, any reason why the judgment should not include the estate of George W. Susong, deceased,—the lien of the attachment still being preserved,—but this litigation between the plaintiff and such administrator not to affect in any manner the judgment already obtained against the said four survivors of Susong & Co., either as to its lien on the partnership assets, or as to their personal liability thereunder, or as to the lien of the attached property. The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be modified in accordance with the directions herein contained, but in all other respects it is affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—CONTINUANCE.

Defendant, a few days before trial, issued a summons for a witness, who resided in the same town, to be delivered to the sheriff. The summons was returned "Not found." Defendant made affidavit to the materiality of the witness, and the necessity for his presence at the trial. The court overruled the motion for continuance upon the sole ground that the statements of the prisoner under oath were not to be credited. Held, error.

Error to corporation court of Norfolk.

John Welsh was indicted and tried for larceny against his exception, he making a motion for a continuance, which was overruled.

He was convicted, and brings error from the judgment. Reversed.

John Neely, for plaintiff in error. ' R. Taylor Scott, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

LACY, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the corporation court of Norfolk city. The plaintiff in error was indicted in the corporation court of Norfolk city for grand larceny on the 7th day of March, 1893, and on the 24th day of the same month he was tried by a jury, and convicted, and his term of imprisonment fixed at seven years in the penitentiary. The accused moved the court to set aside the said verdict, and grant to him a new trial; but the court overruled the motion, and rendered judgment in accordance with the verdict, and the prisoner excepted. The prisoner thereupon brought the case here by writ of error. There were two exceptions taken by the plaintiff in error to the rulings of the court, which are assigned as error here. The first is that on the calling of the case the defendant moved the court to continue the case on the ground of the absence of a witness wanted in his defense, and in support of the motion filed the following affidavit: "John Welsh, the defendant, being first duly sworn, says that upon the trial of the above-mentioned indictment he desires to introduce Sidney Hoffheimer as a witness in his behalf; that said Hoffheimer was present in the city of Norfolk at the time of the occurrences which constitute the subject of said indictment; that he is a material witness for the defendant, and can prove facts not within the knowledge of any other witness procurable by the defendant; that this defendant has caused to be issued subpoenas for the attendance of this witness, returnable to the first day of this term and to this day, directed to the sergeant of the city of Norfolk, which subpoenas have been returned 'Not found;' that said witness has not been kept from attendance by the solicitation or procurement of this defendant, or by any connivance of his, and that he has used every effort in his power, in addition to the issuing of process as aforesaid, to secure his attendance." Subscribed and sworn to the same day. The court overruled this motion, and ordered the trial to proceed, and the defendant was found guilty by the jury, as stated above.

In support of his motion to set aside the verdict and grant him a new trial the defendant filed another affidavit, as follows: "John Welsh, the defendant, being first duly sworn, says that Sidney Hoffheimer, the witness mentioned by him in a previous affidavit, filed upon his motion for a continuance of this case, is a resident of the city of Norfolk, and, as this defendant believes, is only temporarily out of the said city. This defendant believes that the attendance of the said Hoffheimer can be procured at the May term next of this court. He says that the said Hoffheimer was present at the time when and place where the larceny charged in the indictment is alleged to have been committed by this defendant, and this defendant verily believes from statements subsequently made by said Hoffheimer to him that he will swear that this defendant did not commit the same." Subscribed and sworn to the 31st day of March, 1893. But the court refused to allow the said affidavit to be filed, or to consider the same in connection with said motion for a new trial, to which action and ruling of the court the prisoner again excepted, and filed his bill of exceptions. The defendant filed a third bill of exceptions to the action of the court in overruling his motion to set aside the verdict and grant to him a new trial. This is the whole case, as it appears here; and the main question is whether the court below erred in refusing to continue the case on the motion of the defendant on account of the absence of a material witness.

The rule upon which the court proceeds in considering a motion for a continuance is well settled, and has often been the subject of decision in this court. In Hewitt's Case, 17 Grat. 629, Judge Moncure said on this subject: "A motion for a continuance is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, under all the circumstances of the case; and though an appellate court will supervise the action of an inferior court on such a motion, it will not reverse a judgment on that ground, unless such action was plainly erroneous. As a general rule, when a witness for a party fails to appear at the time appointed for a trial, if such party show that a subpoena for a witness has been returned executed, or, if not so returned, was delivered to the proper officer of the county or corporation in which the witness resides a reasonable time before the time for the trial, and shall swear that the witness is material, and that he cannot safely go to trial without his testimony, a continuance ought to be granted. The party thus shows prima facie that he is not ready for trial, though he has used due diligence to be so; and, in the absence of anything to show the contrary, the court ought to give him credit for honesty of intention, and continue the case, if there be reasonable ground to believe that the attendance of the witness at the next term of the court can be secured; especially if the case has not been before continued for the same cause. But circumstances may satisfy the court that the real purpose of the party in moving for a continuance is to delay or evade the trial, and not to prepare for it; and in such case, of course, the motion ought to be overruled." See 3 Rob. Pr. (Old.) pp. 140, 141; Savage, C. J., in People v. Vermilyea, 7 Cow. 383; State v. Lewis, 1 Bay, 1; Com. v. Knapp, 9 Pick. 515; Russell's Case, 28 Grat. 936; opinion of Burks, J., citing and approving Judge Moncure's opinion in Hewitt's Case, supra; Gwatkin v. Com., 10 Leigh, 687; Walton's Case, 32 Grat. 863, opinion of Judge Moncure,—a case very similar to this case; Hook v. Nanny, 4 Hen. & M. 157, note; Higginbotham v. Chamberlayne, 4 Munf. 547; Deford v. Hayes, 6 Munf. 390; Harris v. Harris, 2 Leigh, 584; Harman v. Howe, 27 Grat. 676; Bland & Giles County Judge Case, 33 Grat. 447. The authorities on this subject are collated in an admirable article in 3 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 804, 821.

In this case only a few days had elapsed between the indictment and the trial. A summons for the witness had been placed in the hands of the sheriff for the witness, who resided in the same town. It was returned "Not found," and the witness was not present. No lack of diligence appears or is hinted at on the part of the prisoner. He made affidavit in due form to the materiality of the witness, and the necessity for his presence at the trial to prevent a miscarriage of justice. The court overruled the motion for a continuance upon the sole ground, as appears from these circumstances, that the statements of the prisoner under oath and uncontradicted were not credited by the court; because, if the statements had been credited by the court, it is not reasonable to consider that the motion would have been overruled by the court. We think the court erred in refusing to continue the case under these circumstances. The court should have given the prisoner credit for honesty of intention, as is said in all the cases, and ought to have continued the case. For this error of the said court the said judgment must be reversed and annulled, and the case remanded for a new trial to be had therein.

INJURY TO RAILROAD EMPLOYEE — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DISOBEDIENCE OF ORDERS.

1. The conductor of a freight train, contrary to the rules of the company, allowed certain cars to be shifted and run down grade without an engine attached. Subsequently, while the conductor was between said cars, a brakeman, without objection from the conductor, caused another car to run down in the same way, which, by reason of defective brakes, could not be controlled, and struck the first cars with such violence that the conductor was injured. Held, that there was no cause of action against the company.

2. Railroad companies have a right to presume that cars delivered to them by connecting lines are in proper condition.

3. Conductors of freight trains, who are required by the rules of the company to inspect all cars which they pick up in transit, cannot maintain actions for injuries caused by their failure to do so.

Error from circuit court, Culpeper county.

Action by David Dudley against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company for personal injuries. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant brings error. Reversed.

Wm. H. Payne and J. C. Gibson, for plaintiff in error. F. L. Smith and Edmund Burke, for defendant in error.

FAUNTLEROY, J. The petition of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company represents that it is aggrieved by the verdict of the jury, and the judgment of the circuit court of Culpeper county thereon, rendered on the 25th of March, 1892, in a suit pending in that court, in which one David Dudley is plaintiff and the petitioner is defendant. A transcript of the record, including a certificate of all the evidence adduced before the jury at the trial, is exhibited. After the evidence was all in, a multitude of instructions were presented upon both sides, some of which were granted to plaintiff and defendant. The jury rendered a verdict for the sum of $9,000 damages against the defendant, which verdict the defendant moved the court to set aside, because the verdict was contrary to the law and evidence, because of misdirection by the court, because the verdict was excessive, and because of misconduct on the part of the jury; which said motions the court overruled, and entered judgment upon the verdict. A demurrer to the declaration the court had likewise overruled. It appears from the record that on the 12th of December, 1889, the plaintiff below, (defendant in error here,) a freight conductor in the employ of the defendant company, was conducting a freight train from Charlottesville to Alexandria. At Culpeper, an intermediate station, he received a telegraphic order to shift certain stock cars then in and upon a side track of the defendant's road, north of its station at Culpeper, to another side track of the defendant, south of its station at Culpeper, and also to take into his train a certain car, loaded with spokes, which was in and upon the side track north of Culpeper. The conductor (Dudley) who received this order directed his men, including a brakeman named Munday, to go and shift the cars; and he addressed himself to the undertaking of the removal of a car which obstructed a street in the town of Culpeper. The men whom he had ordered and sent to shift the cars attempted to effect the shifting by dropping them down the track without the grasp or control of the engine, and his attention was called to the fact that two of the cars so dropped down the track were running down the grade without any one upon them,—running "wild," in railroad parlance. The conductor, Dudley, pursued, overtook, and stopped these cars, and was in between them, endeavoring to get a coupling pin out of the drawhead of one of them, when Munday, whom he had sent to do the shifting, removed the wooden chock from under the car loaded with spokes as it stood at the head of the grade, where it had been left when pushed out of the siding, and put his shoulder to start it, when it went down the grade, gathering momentum so rapidly that it got beyond the control of the brake, and ran with great velocity and violence against the cars which Dudley had stopped, and caught and mashed and severely hurt him between the cars, where he had placed himself in the endeavor to extricate the coupling pin, as aforesaid; whereupon he exclaimed: "My God, Munday, you have killed me! How often have I told you about this before." Dudley was an old conductor, with 22 years' experience in railroad service. He was engaged at the time of his injury in his regular and appointed work, which he was paid to perform. By the rules of the company, which were placed in his hands in the form of a regular book, and by special orders, constantly repeated, he was instructed generally and particularly as to his duties. He represented the company, commanded the crew and the train, and was responsible for the protection of the company's property. By the rules of the company, as well as ex necessitate, a train once launched upon its career must be under the absolute control of one person, whom all connected with the conduct of the train are in duty bound to obey. The law requires and approves this order and discipline. See Moon v. Railroad Co., 78 Va. 745-750; Johnson's Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 84 Va. 713, 5 S. E. 707; Ayers' Adm'r v. Railroad Co., 84 Va. 679, 5 S. E. 582; Railroad Co. v. Rudd, 88 Va. 648, 14 S. E. 361. Proper rules must be made, and the conductor must obey and enforce them. Railroad Co. v. Donnelly, 88 Va. 858, 14 S. E. 692. Dudley was injured 60 miles from a terminal point, while his train was out upon its run, and while he was in absolute command. The order which set the cars in motion down grade, without the control and grasp of an engine, in gross violation of the express and especial rules of the company, and which injured him, was given by him to Munday, whom he knew and declared to be an open, reckless, and frequent violator of that particular rule Z, which explicitly forbids the attempt to shift cars without the connection and control of an engine, yet whose disobedience and reckless violation of the rules of the company he never reported. He turns his train and his own special duty over to his reckless subordinate, absents himself from the operation and direction of the shifting, and observes the car flying wildly down the grade of the track, and hears the shout: "Look out! There goes a car down the main track without brakes on it." He pursues this car, leaps upon it, and rides it down to its destination. He knew that it was moving in gross violation of the general orders and express rule of the company, yet with this disobedience of orders by his subordinates under his eyes, with the general and special rules of the company in his pocket, he did not give even a hint of disapproval of any sort of the dangerous disobedience and misconduct of his subordinates until he is injured by it, between the cars, where he had placed himself, in violation of the rules of the company made to protect him and the property of the company from injury, and which common experience and prudence advised him was a most perilous position. While in this perilous position, his disobedient subordinates, encouraged by the approval of his silence, launched car after car—four in all—down grade, in defiance of rule Z, without even a forbidding word or wave of the hand from him, until one heavily loaded goes wildly down the descending grade, acquiring too much momentum to be controlled by its brake, which Munday applied to it, and plunges against the cars which he had stopped, and between which he had placed himself; when he instinctively recognized the cause of his injury by the exclamation: "My God, Munday, you have killed me! How often have I told or warned you of this before." It is clear that if Dudley had been at his proper post of duty, and enforcing obedience to the express and imperative rule of the company as to the only allowable and safe mode of shifting cars, he would not have been hurt. It is clear that if rule Z, so often, so imperatively, and so constantly repeated, had been observed, he would not have been injured. If he had even used reasonable prudence in keeping from between the wild-cat cars, or had simply signaled a forbidding disapproval of what was going on in violation of rules, which it was his special, peculiar, and paramount duty to enforce, he would not have been injured. The company had ordered this conductor into no perilous duty. There was absolutely no danger in shifting cars if rule Z had been observed; and the company had taken every precaution to impress rule Z upon the men, and it was present only in the person of the conductor, who defied and disobeyed its rule, and who had promised to prevent the very disaster which was caused primarily and proximately by his disobedience and gross negligence.

It is claimed that the brake upon the car loaded with spokes was defective, and that this caused the injury; but the answer to this is that the rules of the company made it the express duty of the conductor to see to the careful inspection of all cars which he should put into his train in the transit, and that this duty he did not perform. It was put into his train without inspection, report, or information of any defect whatever. It was carried to Manassas, and thence to its destination. It was a Pennsylvania car, which had brought freight to and carried freight from Culpeper without any discovered or known defect. The railroad companies, in hauling the vast mass of commerce which burdens their roads, have a right to presume that cars delivered to them by connecting lines of great railways are in proper condition. McKinney, Fel. Serv. § 28; Patt. Ry. Law, § 241; 21 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 501, 504; 15 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 196. It is not required that railroad companies shall have inspection shops and special inspectors all along the line of their roads. It is apparent that they are largely dependent upon their conductors, into whose hands their trains are committed, whose duty it is to inspect any cars which they pick up and incorporate into their trains in the transit. This, it does appear, was not done by Dudley or his subordinates en route. But Dudley himself not only did not know anything about the defective brake, but he is quite clear and certain, that in spite of the numerous warnings that he had given to Munday "about this thing before," but which he had practically concealed from his employers. Munday caused the accident, and not a defective brake. Munday himself, who used the brake, knew nothing of any defect; nor did Deland, the engineer. Thornbury, an exceedingly swift and self-contradicted witness, testified that he shouted to Munday "not to start that car; it has no brake on it." In the next sentence he says, "Munday left off the brake," which he had just sworn was not there, and after the car had got far down the hill, and was running rapidly, he says he called to Munday, "not to let it get the start of him. The brake is not in order." When examined as to how he knew about the brake, he said he examined it after the accident, and "had no opportunity to examine it before." And, when confronted with his testimony at a former trial, as to the brake, he admits that "he does not know what was the matter with it." But, even if it were conclusively proved that the brake was defective, the conductor, who was injured by its being set in motion by his own negligence and disobedience of the rules of the company, cannot recover. The promoting and the dominating cause of the injury in this case, which controlled every subsequent event, was the turning of the cars loose upon the track, and ordering the shifting to be done without an engine, in violation of rule Z of the company, and the failure to inspect before incorporating the car in the train. See McKinney, Fel. Serv. § 31; George's Case, 88 Va. 223, 13 S. E. 429.

The foregoing review of the evidence, bringing us to the conclusion that the appellee, Dudley, was the victim of his own gross negligence, and disobedience of the rules of the company, and cannot recover damages for his own wrong, renders it wholly unnecessary to advert to the errors assigned as to the instructions given and refused by the court. We are of opinion that the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the circuit court of Culpeper county are wholly erroneous, and our judgment is to reverse and annul them.

RESCISSION OF CONTRACT—FRAUD—EVIDENCE.

Upon a bill to rescind a sale of land on the ground of misrepresentations by the vendee as to his ability to pay, it appeared that the purchaser expected certain money, as the seller was informed; that, after the contract was executed, but before the purchaser was put in possession, he informed the seller of his being disappointed in his anticipated receipts of money; that the cash payment required was made, but subsequent payments were not, a draft given by the purchaser being protested; and that the seller, though knowing of the other's failure to realize his expectations, sought to enforce the contract. Held, that there was no evidence of fraudulent representations, although present insolvency was proved; and that the seller's remedy was to ask for specific performance and sale of the property. Fauntleroy and Hinton, JJ., dissenting.

Appeal from circuit court, Frederick county.

Bill by J. M. Miller against W. C. Chase to rescind a contract for sale of real estate upon the ground of fraudulent representations as to the latter's ability to pay for the same. From a decree for complainant, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Holmes Conrad, for appellant. John J. Williams, for appellee.

LACY, J. This is an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of Frederick county, rendered in July, 1892. The bill was filed in this cause by the appellee, J. M. Miller, seeking a rescission of a contract between him and the appellant, W. C. Chase, for the sale by Miller to Chase of a tract of land called "Vanduse," situated in the said county, executed April 18, 1892, under which Miller had put Chase in possession; and to reinvest Miller with the title, legal and equitable, and to restore Miller to the possession; to have an account of the payments made by Chase, and for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the land in question; and for an account of the rents, profits, and proceeds of the land; and praying an injunction to enjoin and restrain the defendant and his agents from disposing of any proceeds of the land, leasing or renting or selling the same, or any part thereof, and from cutting wood from the land. The ground upon which the rescission is asked is that the defendant fraudulently deceived the plaintiff as to his means of paying for the land, falsely stating that he had made sales of valuable property, by the proceeds of which he could pay for the land. The defendant demurred and answered. In his answer he denied that he had ever made any false or fraudulent representations as an inducement to the sale; that at the time of the purchase he had, in his opinion, ample means to pay for the land; that he had made some payments, and had used his best ability to make sale of enough of his property to meet this indebtedness, but had been disappointed. The depositions are taken, which show that the seller was anxious to sell and the buyer equally anxious to buy at the price demanded. The dispute between them was not as to the price of the property, but as to the terms of payment. The seller demanded $15,000 for the land, and the buyer agreed to pay that sum for it. But the seller demanded a down payment of $5,000; but the buyer did not agree to this, because, as he stated, it was out of his power to pay so much cash. Finally, at the railway station, when they were awaiting the train upon which the proposed buyer was to depart, the seller suggested that something be put in writing, it appearing that they were agreed as to the amount of the purchase price. The defendant then, in April, 1890, wrote and delivered a contract in writing, which was signed by both, by which the sale was agreed to, but the time of making the cash payment was left to future agreement, and it was provided as to this as follows: "Said sale is made under following conditions, to wit: Said Chase is to pay unto said Miller, on or before the 1st day of July, 1890, the sum of five hundred dollars, being the first payment of the purchase money for the said tract or farm, and to pay the balance, ($14,500,) fourteen thousand five hundred dollars, in payments hereinafter to be determined upon by and between said Miller and Chase: provided, such payments shall not be less than $5,000 five thousand dollars per year, with six per cent. interest from 1st of January, 1891 and said payments to be paid in not less than ——— months from date hereof, and other or residue payments to be paid in full on or before 1st of January, 1893, until the purchase price of $15,000 shall be fully paid as herein mentioned." It was provided also that Chase was not to disturb the tenant then on the farm before the expiration of the crop year, and that Chase was not to have any of the crops of that year unless he paid the $5,000 by the 1st day of November following, and not to pay the taxes unless he got the crops, and that Miller was to have the use of a spring on the farm for life. Miller hesitated, he says, but signed and delivered the contract. Chase departed in a few minutes on the train, but came back before the 1st of June, and was put in possession of the farm, and paid the $500 in a manner satisfactory to Miller by getting the agent of Miller, in selling the land, his son-in-law and nephew Long, to receipt to Miller for $500, and take him on the claim. He gave Miller a draft for $2,000, which was protested, and, except small sums, ($500 in sheep, $150 in a carriage, and $250,—this said to be for crops.) has paid nothing. Chase not complying with his contract, in April, 1891, Miller repudiated it on his part, and brought an action of unlawful detainer in the county court to recover the possession of the land, when and in which action there was verdict and judgment for Miller, which, on Chase's appeal, was affirmed in the circuit court of Frederick county. From this judgment Chase obtained a writ of error to this court, where that controversy is still pending and undetermined; when, in April, 1892, Miller brought this suit to set aside the contract for fraud, as stated above.

The contract having been mutually agreed to in writing, and the terms of it as to payments of the purchase money having been broken by Chase, who, as we have seen, was to pay $5,000 by the 1st of January, 1891, and Chase having been put in possession by Miller, and part of the purchase money having been paid, and a large part due and unpaid, we are not informed why Miller did not seek to have the contract enforced, and the land sold to satisfy the purchase money due and unpaid. It must be borne in mind that Miller is the vendor, and the fraud alleged is as to false representations made by Chase as to his means of making payment; and there is no allegation of insolvency on the part of Chase at the time of making the contract, but present insolvency is charged in the bill, and may be said to be proved, outside of the land, of which, in equity, Chase is regarded as the owner, and Miller as the owner of the purchase money. The contract not having been complied with by Chase, Miller has the right to go into equity, and have it enforced against Chase, and the land subjected to the satisfaction of his debt, for which it stands as security. There is a failure to pay on the part of Chase, and he is, under his contract, liable to pay the debt. But the evidence shows that at the time of entering into the contract Chase had an expectation in South Carolina of a vineyard, as he says; and, as Miller alleges, the ownership of the vineyard was asserted to him. But the evidence shows that before he was put in possession of the tract of land Chase informed Miller that he had been disappointed as to this vineyard, and could not get any money from this source. It seems that Chase had information of a sale of stock, for which he was to get $3,666.66, and on which he drafted in Miller's favor for $2,000 towards the cash payment. But here the sale failed, and Chase failed to realize according to his expectations. What Chase's other expectations were we do not know. He now appears to be insolvent. But the evidence does not sustain the allegations of fraud or of false representations made in the bill. Chase informed Miller before the contract was written of his inability to make any cash payment, and the parties had left Miller's house, where the negotiations were going on; and Chase so stated on his way homeward, when Miller asked for and obtained a written contract with Chase for the sale, time of payment to be thereafter agreed on; and Chase was subsequently put in possession by Miller, after Miller had been informed that the vineyard sale had been a failure. Miller held on to the contract, and sought to obtain a compliance from Chase after he knew all. This suit, therefore, appears to be an effort to claim against a contract, under which, with full knowledge, he asserted his rights. His remedy is for specific enforcement of the contract between himself and his vendee and his debtor. Upon the allegations of the bill there was no insolvency of the purchaser, and subsequent insolvency does not constitute a ground for a rescission of the contract. The action of the circuit court in rescinding the contract and decreeing an account of the partial payments—of the profits of the land—to be offset against them is erroneous, and must be reversed and annulled, and the cause remanded to the circuit court, where the plaintiff may amend his bill as he may be advised.

DANVILLE & W. R. CO. v. BROWN.¹

ALIAS SUMMONS—SERVICE ON DIRECTOR OF CORPORATIONS—CONTINUANCE—NEGLIGENCE OF RAILROAD COMPANY—DAMAGES.

1. Plaintiff, on May 9, 1891, sued out a summons returnable to third Monday in May, when declaration was filed, and case continued for process. July 6, 1891, an alias summons was issued, on which no rules were taken. August 27, 1891, plaintiff sued out alias summons returnable to the third Monday in September, 1891, which was served, and on this last summons rules were taken, on 2d September rules and 1st October rules, and the cause placed on docket at October term. Held, that a motion to quash the process, and remand the cause to rules, was correctly overruled, as, where previous writs have failed for irregularities, plaintiff is entitled to an alias writ.

2. When a person is notified of his appointment as a director of a company, and subsequently receives a summons intended for the company, without remonstrance, he must be presumed to have accepted, unless he expressly declined.

3. Where a summons against a corporation is served on a director, it is no defense that he did not deliver the summons, especially when defendant appears and defends the action.

4. It is no cause for continuance, in an action for negligence, that plaintiff is allowed to amend at bar by inserting a charge that defendant had notice of certain defects in its station platform.

5. The plaintiff received notice from the defendant company that certain goods for him were at its depot. While walking along the passage to the freight room, several boxes of iron, which had been carelessly piled, fell on him. Held, that the plaintiff was a licensee, and defendant company was liable for failure to exercise ordinary care.

6. $7,500 is not an unreasonable verdict against a company, which, by its negligence, causes plaintiff's thigh to be crushed, and his leg shortened.

Fauntleroy, J., dissenting.

Error to circuit court, Henry county.

Action by one Brown against the Danville & Western Railroad Company for personal injuries. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Green & Miller, for plaintiff in error. S. A. Anderson and W. R. Staples, for defendant in error.

HINTON, J. This was an action of tort, brought to recover damages for injuries sustained by the plaintiff at the depot of the defendant company at Martinsville, Va., where he had gone for the purpose of looking for some freight, for which he had received a bill of lading from New York. At the trial the jury returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $7,500, and the company applied for and obtained a writ of error from one of the judges of this court.

The first and chief cause of complaint is that the circuit court refused to quash all the processes, and to remand the case to rules. It appears from the record that the plaintiff, on the 9th day of May, 1891, sued out a summons from the circuit court of Henry county, returnable to the third Monday in May, 1891, when he filed his declaration in the clerk's office, and the case was continued for process. On the 6th day of July, 1891, an alias summons was issued, directed to the sergeant of Danville, on which no rules were taken. On the 27th day of August, 1891, the plaintiff sued out an alias summons returnable to the third Monday in September, 1891, directed to the sheriff of Henry county, which summons was returned as executed by delivering a copy to H. C. Lester, a director of the defendant company, on the 29th of August, 1891; and on this last summons the rules were taken at the 2d September rules and 1st October rules, and the case was placed on the docket for trial at the October term, 1891. When the case was called for trial the defendant company moved the court to quash the process, and remand the cause to rules, and in support of this motion proved the above irregularities. But the court overruled this motion, and this action of the court is made the chief assignment of error in this court. Without going, however, into a lengthy discussion of this point, we think it sufficient to say that this motion was properly overruled, for the reason stated in the brief of counsel for the defendant in error, namely, it was too broad in its scope. If this motion had prevailed, as the counsel very properly say, and the court had quashed all the processes which had been issued, there would have been no case, and nothing to remand to the rules. But, apart from this reason, we think that the process of August 27, 1891, by whatever name it may be called, is good and valid as an original process. The simple circumstance that it is characterized as an "alias writ," and that it runs, "We command you, as we have before," or "at another time commanded you," etc., cannot possibly affect or change its essential character, or render it less effectual as a process for bringing the defendant before the court, and this is all that any original summons does. The only limitation in law upon the power of the plaintiff in a suit to have issued as many writs as he may deem proper is that he is not permitted to harass or vex the defendant with unnecessary costs. But if, as in a case like the present, previous writs, by reason of any irregularity in the service merely, have failed to bring the defendant into court, there seems to be no good reason why he may not issue an alias without being amenable to the charge of unduly vexing the defendant with costs.

The next objection is that H. O. Lester was not a director of the company at the time of serving process on him, and did not inform the company of the fact. But the first of these allegations is not sustained by the record, for he is shown to have received a letter from Mr. Wilcox Brown notifying him of his election on the 3d of August, 1891, whereupon he says he determined to accept at once; and he subsequently evidenced his acceptance by receiving the summons without remonstrance or disclaimer, and by other official acts since. Independently of these acts, he must be presumed to have accepted when notified of his appointment, unless he expressly declined it. Wood, Ry. Law, § 149; Lockwood v. Bank, 9 R. I. 308. And, as to his not having delivered the summons to the company, we cannot perceive how this circumstance, in absence of fraud or collusion,—neither of which are shown,—could possibly affect the right of the plaintiff. He did all that he was required to do. In point of fact, however, this failure of Lester to inform the company does not appear to have worked any harm to the company, for when the case was called the defendant was in court, with its counsel and witnesses, ready for trial; so that it must have been notified of the suit in ample time for necessary preparations for the trial.

The next objection is the refusal of the court to continue the case for the defendant. This motion seems to have been based solely upon the ground that the court permitted the plaintiff to amend his declaration at the bar of the court by inserting the following words: "Of which fact the defendant company had notice, or by the use of reasonable diligence might have had notice,"—an amendment which we consider unnecessary. An averment of notice on the part of the defendant is never required, where the fact lies as much within the knowledge of the defendant as of the plaintiff. 1 Saunderson, Pl. & Ev. 214, 215. And in this case it fully appears that the company's agent had notice that the platform where the accident occurred was used as a passway to the freight room. There was no necessity for averring it, as the knowledge of the agent is the knowledge of the principal.

Upon the facts, there can be no doubt of the correctness of the verdict. The plaintiff, as was customary, was walking, in company with two other persons, along a platform which was used as a passway to the freight room for the purpose of seeing as to some freight which he was expecting, when several boxes of sheet iron, weighing about 800 pounds, which had been carelessly placed on edge, fell over on the plaintiff, breaking his thigh, and occasioning a consequent shortening of the leg. This brings the case directly within the principles announced in Railroad Co. v. White, 84 Va. 505, 5 S. E. 573. The plaintiff was a licensee, and was entitled to have the defendant company exercise ordinary care and prudence towards him. The company plainly failed to discharge its duty in this respect, and is therefore liable.

Finally, there is nothing in the amount of the verdict in this case that discloses either passion or prejudice on the part of the jury, and the judgment of the circuit court must therefore be affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TEL. CO. v. TYLER.¹
(Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Nov. 16, 1893.)

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES — FAILURE TO DELIVER TELEGRAM — PENALTIES — INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Code, § 1292, provides that every telegraph company shall deliver a telegram promptly to the person to whom it is addressed, and that for every failure to forward or deliver a dispatch as promptly as practicable the company shall forfeit $100 to the person sending the dispatch or to the person to whom it was addressed. Held, (1) that a suit to enforce such forfeiture need not be brought in the name of the commonwealth; (2) said statute is not repugnant to the interstate commerce clause of the constitution of the United States.

Error to circuit court, Alleghany county.

Action by J. O. Tyler, plaintiff, against the Western Union Telegraph Company, defendant, to recover $100 forfeiture imposed by statute for failure to deliver a telegraph message promptly. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Stiles & Holladay, for plaintiff in error.
Benj. Haden, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, P. This was an action against the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover a statutory penalty of $100 for the failure of the company to deliver as promptly as practicable a certain dispatch sent from Asheville, in the state of North Carolina, to the plaintiff, at Clifton Forge, in this state. Section 1292 of the Code, under which the action was brought, is as follows: "It shall be the duty of every telegraph or telephone company, upon the arrival of a dispatch at the point to which it is to be transmitted by said company, to deliver it promptly to the person to whom it is addressed, where the regulations of the company require such delivery, or to forward it promptly as directed, where the same is to be forwarded. For every failure to deliver or forward a dispatch as promptly as practicable the company shall forfeit one hundred dollars to the person sending the dispatch, or to the person to whom it was addressed." It is admitted that the dispatch in question was not delivered as promptly as practicable, but the company, nevertheless, denies the plaintiff's right to recover, on two grounds, viz.: (1) Because the action, if maintainable at all, ought to have been in the name of the commonwealth; and (2) because section 1292 of the Code is repugnant to that clause of the constitution of the United States which gives to congress the power to regulate commerce among the several states.

As to the first point, little need be said. Section 712 of the Code provides that "where any statute imposes a fine, unless it be otherwise expressly provided, or would be inconsistent with the manifest intention of the general assembly, it shall be to the commonwealth," etc.; and by section 745 it is provided that "wherever the word 'fine' is used in this chapter it shall be construed to include a pecuniary forfeiture, penalty, and amercement." But these sections upon which the company relies have no application to a case like the present. Section 1292, which gives a right of action in a case of this sort, expressly provides that the forfeiture shall be "to the person sending the dispatch, or to the person to whom it was addressed;" and it would therefore be manifestly inconsistent with the intention of the legislature to hold that the commonwealth has any interest in the penalty sought to be recovered in the present case, or that the action is not properly in the name of the plaintiff.

The next question, then, is whether section 1292, so far as it relates to a case like the present, is unconstitutional. That the power of congress to regulate commerce among the states is unqualified and unlimited, is not disputed. It was so decided in the great case of Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat. 1, and the subsequent decisions to the same effect are very numerous. It must also be conceded that telegraphic communication, like the transportation of passengers and merchandise, is commerce, and that such communication, when had between different states, is interstate commerce. In Telegraph Co. v.

Texas, 105 U. S. 460, it was distinctly decided that a telephone company occupies the same relation to commerce, as a carrier of messages, that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods; that both companies are instruments of commerce; and that their business is commerce itself. See, also, Telegraph Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 7 Sup. Ct. 1126; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 8 Sup. Ct. 1380. Nor is it denied that those subjects of commerce which are national in their nature, admitting of only one uniform system or plan of regulation, such as the transportation of commodities or the transmission of messages between different states, are subject to the exclusive control of congress, and consequently that any regulation thereof by state legislation, whether congress has legislated on the subject or not, is void. Cooley v. Wardens of Port of Philadelphia, 12 How. 299; Welton v. State of Missouri, 91 U. S. 275; Henderson v. Mayor, etc., 92 U. S. 259; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 5 Sup. Ct. 826; Robbins v. Taxing Dist., 120 U. S. 489, 7 Sup. Ct. 592; Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 10 Sup. Ct. 681; Lehigh Val. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 145 U. S. 192, 12 Sup. Ct. 806; Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460; Leloup v. Port of Mobile, 127 U. S. 640, 8 Sup. Ct. 1380.

These principles were acted on by this court in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Com., 88 Va. 85, 13 S. E. 340, and we do not understand them to be controverted in the present case. But does the statute, the validity of which is here drawn in question, amount to a regulation of commerce? In Telegraph Co. v. Pendleton, 122 U. S. 347, 7 Sup. Ct. 1126, a statute of Indiana was held to be repugnant to the commerce clause of the constitution, so far as it attempted to regulate the delivery of dispatches sent from that state into other states, because, as the court said, conflicting legislation would inevitably follow with reference to telegraphic communications between different states, if each state was vested with power to control them beyond its own limits. But that is not the question arising in the present case, nor does the reasoning in that case apply to this. This is an action for the failure to deliver in this state a dispatch sent from another state and deliverable here, under a statute of this state. There is no question as to the extraterritorial operation of the statute, and it will be time enough to decide that question when it arises.

It has been argued with much earnestness that the statute amounts to a regulation of interstate commerce, but we are unable to come to that conclusion. If it can be said to affect commerce at all, it does so only remotely or incidentally. It prescribes no new rule, and imposes no additional duty, and, so far as the delivery of telegrams is concerned, it simply prescribes a penalty for a failure to deliver where the regulations of the company itself require such delivery.

That it would be competent, moreover, for the state to afford redress through her courts, according to the common law, for the negligent failure of a telegraph company to deliver a dispatch sent from another state, is unquestionable; and, if this may be done, it is equally competent for the state to seek by legislation, in advance, to prevent such violation of duty. We think the case is within the principle decided in Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, namely, that "the legislation of a state, not directed against commerce, or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit." This principle was applied and amplified in Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 405, 8 Sup. Ct. 564, and again in Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. Alabama, 128 U. S. 96, 9 Sup. Ct. 28. In the Smith Case, the question was whether a statute of Alabama making it unlawful for any locomotive engineer to drive or operate any train of cars without having been first examined and licensed was in contravention of the commercial power of congress, so far as it applied to engineers employed on interstate trains, and it was held that it was not. After a full consideration of the case, the conclusion announced was (1) that the statute was not, in its nature, a regulation of commerce; (2) that it was properly an act of legislation within the reserved power of the state to regulate the relative rights and duties of persons within the state so as to secure safety of person and property; and (3) that, so far as it affected interstate commerce, it did so only indirectly, and not so as to burden or impede such commerce. In the course of the opinion, it was said, by way of illustration, that a common carrier, although engaged in interstate commerce, is liable according to the local laws of the particular state in which he may be guilty of any nonfeasance or misfeasance, as, for example, for his failure to deliver goods at the proper time and place, or for injuries to passengers, caused by his negligence, and that in neither case would it be a defense that the law giving the right of redress was void as being an unconstitutional regulation of commerce by the state. These views were repeated in the case in 128 U. S., 9 Sup. Ct., above cited, where a statute of Alabama requiring the examination of certain railway employes with respect to their powers of vision was sustained, and held not to be a regulation of commerce. The provisions of the statute, like those of the statute upheld in the Smith Case, were held to be but parts of that local law which governs the relation between carriers of passengers and merchandise, and the public who employ them, which, as respects interstate commerce, are not displaced until they come in conflict with an express enactment of congress; and, after quoting from the opinion in the Smith Case, it was added that what the state may punish or afford redress for, when done, it may seek, by proper precautions in advance, to prevent. In Sherlock v. Alling, supra, the main point was whether a state statute giving a right of action to the personal representative of the deceased, whose death was caused by the wrongful act or omission of another, could be constitutionally applied to the case of a loss of life by a collision between steamboats navigating the Ohio river, engaged in interstate commerce. The defendant's contention was that the statute enlarged the liabilities of parties for such torts, and, if applied to marine torts, would constitute a new burden on commerce. But this view was rejected, and the statute was held a valid addition to and amendment of the general law of the state, which did not, within the meaning of the constitution, place a burden on commerce, or amount to a regulation thereof; and, referring to previous decisions relied on by the defendant, it was said that the legislation adjudged invalid in those cases "created, in the way of tax, license, or condition, a direct burden on commerce, or in some way directly interfered with its freedom."

Tested by these principles, we are of opinion that section 1292 of the Code is not open to the objection that has been urged against it. It is not, in a legal sense, a burden upon, or a regulation of, commerce, nor does it conflict with any act of congress. It is simply, as was the legislation involved in the cases just mentioned, an amendment or enlargement of the local law, which is subject to modification by the legislature, and which regulates the relative rights and duties of telegraph companies, and persons doing business with them, in this state. It is, of course, competent for congress, in the exercise of its plenary power in the matter, to prescribe specific regulations touching foreign or interstate commerce, which regulations would supersede all conflicting local laws which, even indirectly, affect such commerce; but, until some such action is taken by congress, we are obliged to hold that section 1292 is a valid enactment. The following extract from the opinion in Smith v. Alabama is, mutatis mutandis, no less applicable to this case than to that. There it was said: "But for the provisions on the subject found in the local law of each state, there would be no legal obligation on the part of the carrier, whether ex contractu or ex delicto, to those who employ him; or, if the local law is held not to apply where the carrier is engaged in foreign or interstate commerce, then, in the absence of laws passed by congress, or presumed to be adopted by it, there can be no rule of decision based upon rights and duties supposed to grow out of the relation of such carriers to the public or to individuals. In other words, if the law of the particular state does not govern that relation, and prescribe the rights and duties which it implies, then there is, and can be, no law that does, until congress expressly supplies it, or is held by implication to have supplied it, in cases within its jurisdiction over foreign and interstate commerce. The failure of congress to legislate can be construed only as an intention not to disturb what already exists, and is the mode by which it adopts, for cases within the scope of its power, the rule of the state law, which, until displaced, covers the subject." The result of these views is that the judgment complained of must be affirmed.

CRIMINAL LAW—RIGHT TO SPEEDY TRIAL—CONTINUANCE.

Defendant had been imprisoned since September, 1892, during which time he was ready and anxious for a trial, and his case was set for trial on February 15, 1893. The case was called, and he demanded a trial, but the commonwealth's attorney announced that he had made no preparation for trial at that term; that he had recalled processes issued for witnesses; that he could offer no evidence at that term,—though defendant offered to admit evidence taken at former trials, except that of one B., who, being in prison for felony, was incompetent to testify; and that, if ruled to trial, a nolle prosequi would be entered. The court then continued the case to March 16th, the day on which B.'s sentence would expire. Held, that the court erred in such continuance, as there was no good ground therefor, and under Const. art. 1, § 10, and Code, § 4016, the prisoner was entitled to a speedy trial.

Lewis, P., and Lacy, J., dissenting.

Error to county court, Loudoun county.

D. W. Benton was under indictment for larceny, and confined in jail. He demanded a trial, which the court refused, and continued the case to the next term, against prisoner's objection. At the next term, he was tried and convicted. Upon a motion to set the verdict aside, the court ruled against the prisoner, to which ruling he excepted, and brings this appeal. Reversed.

Garrett & Garrett, for plaintiff in error.
R. Taylor Scott, Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

FAUNTLEROY, J. This is a writ of error to a judgment of the county court of Loudoun county, awarded by one of the judges of this court on the 15th of April, 1893, upon the petition of D. W. Benton, plaintiff in error, which was refused by the judge of the circuit court of Loudoun county April 13, 1893.

D. W. Benton, the plaintiff in error, was indicted in the county court of Loudoun county, on the 8th day of August, 1892, for a felony, for which he was tried at the September term, 1892, and convicted, and sentenced to be imprisoned in the penitentiary for a term of two years and six months. Upon a writ of error to this proceeding, the circuit court of Loudoun county set aside this verdict and judgment, and ordered a new trial, which was had at the November, 1892, term of the county court of Loudoun county, wherein he was again convicted and sentenced. He obtained from this court a writ of error and supersedeas to this second conviction and judgment, which, upon the hearing, were reversed and set aside, and a new trial was ordered by this court, which judgment of this court was certified back to, and was received by, the clerk of the said trial court,—the county court of Loudoun county,—at 11:30 A. M. on the 2d day of February, 1893, more than 11 days before the commencement of the February, 1893, term of the said county court of Loudoun county. At an interview on the said 2d day of February, 1893, between the prisoner's counsel and the judge of the said court, at which the attorney for the commonwealth was present and conferring, the case of the prisoner was set for trial to be had on the first day of the then coming February term, 1893, according to the requirement of the statute; and the clerk of the said court, in preparation for the said trial, issued the summonses for the witnesses for the commonwealth, accordingly, for their attendance at the said trial of the prisoner, so set for the first day of the said February term, 1893, by the order of the judge of the said county court of Loudoun county as aforesaid. On that same day, to wit, on the 2d day of February, 1893, the commonwealth's attorney for the county of Loudoun addressed a card to the clerk of the said county court, saying that, when he wanted the witnesses for the commonwealth summoned, he would present the clerk with a list, and the summonses that he (the clerk) had issued he would recall for the present. This the clerk did on the morning of the 3d, and none of the commonwealth's witnesses were summoned. On the 2d day of February, 1893, the commonwealth's attorney stated to the judge of the county court, and to the counsel for the prisoner, that he would not be ready at the next term for trial, and then said that the main reason and the chief reason for a continuance was that R. Welby Barton's time in jail would not expire until the 16th day of March, 1893, (which is an admitted fact,) at which time he would be a competent witness. The said R. Welby Barton was then serving a term of imprisonment for a felony, of which he had been tried and convicted and sentenced in the county court of Loudoun county.

The case was called upon the 13th day of February, 1893, the first day of the term, and the prisoner, who has been in jail since the — day of September, 1892, was set to the bar in the custody of the jailer of the county court of Loudoun county, whereupon the commonwealth's attorney stated he had made no preparation to try the case at this term, and asked for a continuance of the same, to which the prisoner objected, and demanded a trial, offering to admit as true for the trial of the motion and the case, if had today, all the evidence the commonwealth had heretofore offered against him, except that of R. W. Barton and Herbert Wilson, who have been disqualified to testify in any case by the law of Virginia, and are not now competent or admissible witnesses. The commonwealth's attorney stated that he had no evidence to offer to remove the disability of the witness Barton at this time, and acknowledged that if forced to trial, or without the evidence of Barton, at this time, he would enter a nolle prosequi. The demand of the prisoner to be tried was denied by the court, and the continuance, on the motion of the commonwealth's attorney, was granted to the March term, 1893,—the 16th of that month,—to which said action of the county court the prisoner objected and duly excepted, as set forth in his first bill of exceptions. On the 16th day of March, 1893, the case was called for trial, whereupon the prisoner moved the court to dismiss the prosecution, and discharge him, because he had not been tried at the last (February) term of the court, at which time he (the prisoner) was ready for trial, and demanded to be tried, and in support of this motion offered the bill of exceptions taken at the February term to the continuance, which motion the court overruled, and the prisoner duly excepted, as set forth in his first bill of exceptions. The prisoner was then put upon trial, and the jury found him guilty of grand larceny, as charged in the indictment, and fixed his punishment at two years' confinement in the penitentiary. Thereupon, the prisoner moved to set the verdict aside because it was contrary to the law and the evidence, and moved in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, which several motions the court denied, and pronounced judgment upon the verdict.

A motion for a continuance is always within the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised, not arbitrarily, but with due regard to all the circumstances of the case, fairly, and with conformity to the law of the land, enacted in pursuance of the provisions of the constitution of Virginia, (article 1, § 10,) which declares that "In all criminal prosecutions a man hath a right to a speedy trial." In pursuance of this provision of the constitution, the statute (Code 1887, § 4016) enacts: "When an indictment is found against a person for a felony in a court wherein he may be tried, the accused, if in custody * * * shall unless good cause be shown for a continuance be arraigned and tried at the same term" at which an indictment is found. The "speedy trial," and the policy of the law to expedite the trial of criminal cases, forbid that the person accused of crime shall be detained in prison beyond any term of the court at which he may be lawfully tried, unless good cause be shown for a continuance; and Acts 1889-90, p. 79, require the judges of the county courts to set the criminal cases for trial 10 days before the first day of the terms of their courts, the object of which requirement is, as interpreted by this court in the case of Hall v. Com., 15 S. E. 517, to insure a speedy trial, for the benefit of the accused no less than for the commonwealth. When the accused is ready for, and demands, trial by a court wherein he stands indicted, and may be lawfully tried, he is entitled to trial without delay, unless the prosecution shall show good cause for a continuance.

The prisoner, a thrifty young farmer of the county of Loudoun, had been incarcerated in the county jail, and denied the privileges of bail, since September, 1892, upon a felonious charge, for which he was always ready and anxious to be tried, and his case was set for trial on the 15th day of February, 1893,—the first day of the regular term of the county court of Loudoun county, in which he stood indicted,—by the judge of that court, 11 days before the beginning of the term. His case was regularly called, and he, being set to the bar of that court, in the custody of the jailer, demanded to be then and there put upon trial. The commonwealth's attorney announced that he had made no preparation for the trial at that term; that he had peremptorily recalled the processes issued by the clerk ten days before for the summoning of the witnesses for the commonwealth, and that he could not offer any testimony to convict the prisoner at that term of the court, even though the prisoner offered to admit as true the statements of all the commonwealth's witnesses who had not been summoned, except that of R. Welby Barton, who was then a convicted felon, serving out his term of imprisonment, and incompetent to testify in a court of justice; that, if ruled to trial at that term of the court, he would enter a nolle prosequi. Upon this statement the court granted the motion of the commonwealth's attorney, and continued the case until the March term of that court, and denied the prisoner's demand for a trial at that term of the court. This arbitrary continuance was granted by the court solely upon the ground suggested by the commonwealth's attorney,—that he could not convict the prisoner without the testimony of one R. W. Barton, a convicted felon, whose term of imprisonment would expire on the 16th day of March, 1893, and who, by his own confession, was an accomplice in the crime charged against the prisoner, for which he had been given immunity from arrest or prosecution as an approver or state's evidence. If the court could thus, by its own arbitrary action, deny to the prisoner the trial set for the 15th day of February, and then demanded by him, and remand him to jail until the 16th day of March, 1893, to await the expiration of the term of imprisonment of a convicted felon, where is the limit of the discretion and the line of demarcation which will restrain a judge from holding a prisoner bound and incarcerated indefinitely upon a charge of which the law presumes him innocent, to await the expiration of the longest term of any felon undergoing the penalty of his crime? The principle is the same, whether the time be for 30 days or for 30 months.

The county court of Loudoun county, at its February, 1893, term, without good cause or warrant of law, continued the prisoner's case till the 16th day of March, 1893, and thus denied to him the speedy trial guaranteed to him by the law and constitution of Virginia. No person can be arbitrarily held and imprisoned without trial. In the case of U. S. v. Fox, 3 Mont. 513, Fox was indicted at the November term, 1879, for forgery, etc. At that term, two juries failed to agree, and were, with the consent of the defendant, discharged. At the March term following, 1880, the United States was not ready for trial, because congress had failed to appropriate money with which the marshal could defray the expenses of summoning witnesses, and the witnesses were not summoned, and because of the absence of these witnesses the trial court continued the case. Fox applied by habeas corpus to be discharged, and his motion was overruled by the trial judge; but the supreme court reversed the trial judge, and discharged the prisoner. In the case of Klock v. People, 2 Parker, Crim. R. 676, the court held that it was not allowable, and was a denial of a "speedy trial," for a public prosecutor to arrest the trial of a prisoner, so as to enable him to try the accused at a subsequent term, solely because he finds himself unprepared with the evidence to convict, when his condition is not the result of improper practice on the part of the prisoner, or some one acting with or for him, and that it was a denial of a speedy trial if the prosecution had neglected or failed to procure the attendance of witnesses who had not been summoned, and that it is not material to inquire for what reason the prosecution so failed or neglected to prepare for trial; the fact of such failure or neglect is sufficient.

For the foregoing reasons, we are of opinion to reverse the judgment of the county court of Loudoun county, and this renders it unnecessary to state and analyze the evidence upon which the prisoner was convicted. It is sufficient to say that it was, in character and certainty, wholly insufficient to warrant the verdict of guilty, consisting mainly and essentially of the uncorroborated statements (vague and indefinite, as to the value of the property alleged to have been stolen) of the witness R. W. Barton, a released felon, that day only out of jail, and a self-confessed accomplice in the crime which he had every motive to fasten upon D. W. Benton, as the consideration for his own immunity from prosecution and punishment for it by the commonwealth. The county court of Loudoun county erred in overruling the motion of the prisoner to set the verdict aside on the ground that it was contrary to the law and the evidence, and in overruling the motion in arrest of judgment. The verdict must be set aside, and the judgment reversed and annulled.

OSBURN et al. v. THROCKMORTON.¹

MARRIED WOMAN—TRANSFER OF SEPARATE PROPERTY—VALIDITY.

1. Where a woman consents to the transfer of her separate estate to her husband, and its investment in a certain manner, she cannot avoid the transaction on the ground of ignorance of the law affecting the subject.

2. Under the married woman's act of April 4, 1877, a married woman may bestow her separate property upon her husband.

Fauntleroy, J., dissenting.

Appeal from circuit court, Loudoun county; James Keith, Judge.

Bill by James B. Throckmorton to enjoin one Osburn, trustee, and others from selling certain property under a deed of trust. From a decree for complainant, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John M. Orr, for appellants. Ed. Nichols and Alexander & Tibbs, for appellee.

LACY, J. This is an appeal from two decrees of the circuit court of Loudoun county, rendered respectively at the January term, 1891, and the October term, 1891. The bill was filed in this case in December, 1890, to enjoin Osburn, trustee, from selling a tract of land in Loudoun county, conveyed to him as trustee by deed dated March 8, 1876, executed by James B. Throckmorton and Eliza J. Throckmorton, his wife, to secure the payment to Joseph Lodge of the debt therein mentioned of $2,000, due by note executed by the said James B. Throckmorton, dated March 8, 1876. The ground stated in the bill upon which the injunction is sought is as follows: The said Joseph Lodge died in the year 1877, after having made his will, by which said Osburn, trustee, was appointed the executor of the same. That during the first year of said executor's administration of said estate the said $2,000 was fully settled, and was charged in his executorial account as settled and collected, and the account confirmed more than 10 years before, and the said bond evidencing said debt was surrendered to the debtor as paid. But the trust deed executed to secure the same by inadvertence was not released, though discharged in fact, and no trust remained to be executed by said trustee. That, nevertheless, the said Osburn, trustee, had advertised the said land for sale, as was shown by copy of advertisement exhibited with the bill, reciting in the said advertisement that the said debt secured by the said deed was now the property of the appellant Annie E. Throckmorton under the provisions of the said Lodge's will, of which he is the executor. The complainant averred that the will of Lodge contained no such provision, and that, being the executor of the Lodge will, Osburn, trustee, was disqualified from acting as trustee under the deed. The injunction was awarded by the judge of the Loudoun county circuit court in accordance with the prayer of the bill in December, 1890. At the January term, 1891, of the said court, the defendant Osburn, trustee, demurred to the bill for want of equity, and for want of Mrs. Annie E. Throckmorton as a party, she being a proper party, and answered: That he admitted that the debt was due by James B. Throckmorton, and note given and secured by trust deed, as stated in the bill, conveying the said tract of land to him as trustee. That Lodge died, and made his will, and appointed him executor thereof, etc., as charged in the bill; but denied that the said debt had been paid, and the bond delivered as settled to the debtor, stating that he, as trustee, had been required by Annie E. Throckmorton, the owner of the debt secured under the said deed, to execute the same by the sale of the said land. That it is true that the will of Lodge did not mention the said debt, and provide that it should be paid to Annie E. Throckmorton, but that it became her property under the said will, her mother, Mary A. Humphrey, being entitled to a portion of his estate under the will; and that she had died, and left three children, to wit, Abner Edward Humphrey, Virginia, wife of Volney Osburn, and said Annie, then the wife of Mason Throckmorton, son of said James B. Throckmorton, the complainant; and that said Annie E. was entitled to one-third of the said legacy to her mother, which, under the laws of Virginia, in July, 1877, was her separate property. That under the distribution of the estate this bond in question was allotted to the children of Mary C. Humphrey, and was then allotted to Annie E., and received by her husband, Mason Throckmorton, and taken into his possession, and his (Osburn's) connection with the said bond as executor ceased when he assented to this legacy, and he had no further concern with it, and was, therefore, not disqualified by reason of his being executor from acting as trustee to execute the said trust,—and moved the dissolution of the injunction awarded in the case. A decree in the said court, rendered on the 22d day of October, 1890, in a cause in the said court between Mason Throckmorton and his wife, whereby a divorce a vinculo matrimonii was granted the husband against the said Annie, his wife, was exhibited with the said answer; and at the January term, 1891, a decree was rendered in the said cause, whereby the demurrer to the bill was overruled, and on his motion leave was given the plaintiff, James B. Throckmorton, to amend his bill, making Annie E. Throckmorton a party defendant thereto, which was filed accordingly; and it was set forth by way of amendment that the whole of the said $2,000 bond did not pass to said Annie as her share, but that $827.05 was in excess of her share, and was due to the said Abner Edward, and he paid this to him by a new bond for that amount, with security, which was accepted by said Abner, and surrendered on his part. The residue belonged to Annie. The bill then states how, in detail, the debt was paid to Mason, about which Annie was consulted with reference to the payment of the said debt to her husband by a conveyance to him of property and land, and that the said settlement made December 25, 1878, was with her knowledge, and had her approval and consent, and he (the complainant) had never heard from her a word of dissent or disapproval until about the time the land was advertised for sale. That up to 1885 the relations of Mason and Annie to each other as husband and wife were such as are usual between husband and wife. That in 1878, Mason bought a tract of land worth $1,600, and had the deed made to his said wife, without her knowledge until he informed her, which is still hers; and he gave her large sums, stated in the bill, exceeding, with the said land, the amount received in the said Lodge debt by her husband. In 1890, Mason and Annie were divorced, and Annie required to pay the costs. That there had been a complete settlement between him and Mason, with which Annie had remained satisfied until the disagreement between her and her husband. Annie answered, and made general denials of consent on her part to the delivery to her husband of her property in question, and emphasizes her ignorance of her rights under the act of 4th of April, 1877, known as the "Married Woman's Act," and that the said act made this property her separate estate. But in the evidence it is shown that she knew all about it, and was a party to its delivery to her husband, and to the purchase of the Throckmorton place, subject to liens on it, belonging to her husband's mother. And in her deposition she admits that she knew that it was handed to her husband, and on cross-examination that she gave her consent to its investment in the farm, and that she was present at the division of the Lodge estate and delivery of the J. B. Throckmorton note to her husband. In the suit of Throckmorton v. Throckmorton, referred to above, and decided in this court April 10, 1890, which was a suit between the said Mason and Annie, his wife, for divorce a vinculo matrimonii, and reported in 86 Va. 768, 11 S. E. 289, the said Annie asserted her claims against her husband for large sums of money belonging to her, amounting to $10,000, which he had received for her, and which sums included the debt in question here, as she says in her deposition in this case. In that suit her claim was decided against her, and her husband was divorced at her costs.

The first question we are to consider is the effect of this transfer of her rights by the married woman to her husband, and consenting to its investment in a particular manner, or to its use by him. Can the transaction be avoided upon the ground that she was ignorant of the law affecting the subject? If upon the mere ground of ignorance of the law men were admitted to overhaul or extinguish their most solemn contracts, and especially those which have been executed by a complete performance, there would be much embarrassing litigation in all judicial tribunals, and no small danger of injustice from the nature and difficulty of the proper proofs. Lyon v. Richmond, 2 Johns. Ch. 51, 60; Shotwell v. Murray, 1 Johns. Ch. 512; Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 169, 170; Story, Eq. Jur. § 111. The presumption is, that every person is acquainted with his own rights, provided he has had a reasonable opportunity to know them; and nothing can be more liable to abuse than to permit a person to reclaim his property upon the mere pretense that at the time of parting with it he was ignorant of the law, acting on his title. Proctor v. Thrall, 22 Vt. 262. Ignorance of the law does not affect agreements in courts of equity, nor excuse from the legal consequences of particular acts. 1 Fonbl. Eq. c. 2, § 7, note 2; 1 Madd. Ch. Pr. 60; Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 1 Pet. 1, 15, 16; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 112, 113, 115, 116. A married woman possessed of separate property, as to which she has a general right of disposal, may bestow it upon her husband as well as upon a stranger, and courts of equity will sanction such disposition when made by the wife. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1395-1397. And, as was said by this court in Beecher v. Wilson, 84 Va. 813, 6 S. E. 209, the married woman's act of April 4, 1877, does not prevent a wife from giving her property to her husband if she pleases; nor does it abrogate the presumption that under circumstances such as obtained in this case she has done so. (Opinion by Fauntleroy, J.)

It is further insisted by the appellee that the decree of the circuit court perpetually enjoining the sale is right for another reason. In the divorce suit of Throckmorton v. Throckmorton, supra, the question as to property rights of the wife was raised, and by the decree in that cause they were disposed of by the decree of absolute divorce, without settling the property rights, and the rights of property were left where they were at the date of the decree. Porter v. Porter, 27 Grat. 599. These rights certainly might have been disposed of in the divorce suit, and so the matter is res adjudicata. Campbell v. Campbell, 22 Grat. 666; Findlay v. Trigg, 83 Va. 543, 3 S. E. 142. The debt in controversy having been fully paid and discharged, the appellee is entitled to hold the land free and released from the lien of the trust deed; and it was the duty of the creditor within 90 days to have entered upon the margin of the book where such deed is recorded a release thereof, under our statute, and for failure to do so he is liable to a fine of $20. Code Va. § 2498. There was no error in the decree of the circuit court complained of, and appealed from here, and the same is affirmed.

HOLLIS v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—ERROR IN TRANSMISSION OF MESSAGE—DAMAGES—NONSUIT.

1. The measure of damages against a telegraph company for deviating from the terms of a message correctly reporting the state of the market for a particular article, which the receiver of the message is induced by it to send forward for sale, is the difference between the actual state of the market and the terms of the message, as erroneously transmitted, overstating it, provided the plaintiff's actual loss amounts to that much.

2. The plaintiff's correspondent, in reply to a message inquiring as to the state of the market for watermelons, furnished to the company a message in these terms: "No melons on the market. Will bring twelve to fifteen dollars per hundred." As transmitted by the company, and delivered to the plaintiff, it read thus: "No melons on the market. Will bring twenty to twelve dollars per hundred." At the trial the evidence in behalf of the plaintiff (the sender of the message being the witness) was: "I sent a dispatch, and it did give the correct market price of melons at the time. I do not remember the exact words of it, but it quoted melons at fifteen to twenty cents." In fact the message did not so quote them. Held, that a jury could infer from this evidence that the market was, not as the witness remembered it, but as this message stated,—that is, from $12 to $15 per 100, an average of 13½ cents per melon,—and that, as the average per melon indicated by the erroneous message was 16 cents, the plaintiff's loss may have amounted to 2½ cents per melon. Held, further, that the plaintiff's misconduct or negligence in trying to sell the melons himself, instead of employing a proper agent to do so, would not affect his right to recover, inasmuch as he realized less than the actual market price, and nothing appears to suggest even a possibility that more than the market price could have been realized. He should be treated as having obtained the market price, no matter how much less he did obtain, or what caused him to do so.

3. In such case the state of the market at the point at which the watermelons were at the time the dispatch was received, and any actual sales which the plaintiff made, or could have made, at that point, had no relevancy on the question of measuring his damages, the state of the market from which the dispatch was sent being alone relevant.

4. The court erred in granting a nonsuit.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Taylor county; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by James A. Hollis against the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover damages for transmitting a message erroneously. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

W. S. Wallace, for plaintiff in error. Gustin, Guerry & Hall, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. By an error of the company, the price of watermelons was overstated in the message. As the message was acted upon by Hollis, he had a right to expect that the market in Atlanta was as the message which he received represented it. As it was not so in fact, his damage would be measured by the difference between the market he had a right to expect and the one which actually existed, provided his loss amounted to that much. If his loss amounted to less, of course the amount of his loss would be the amount of his recovery.

2. The message furnished to the company for transmission quoted melons at $12 to $15 per 100. As transmitted by the company and delivered to the plaintiff, it quoted them at $20 to $12 per 100. The sender of the message testified at the trial that his message gave the correct market price of melons at the time; that he did not remember the exact words of it, but "it quoted melons at fifteen to twenty cents." It did not so quote them, for the exact contents of the message were in evidence or agreed upon, and the equivalent of its terms was 12 to 15 cents.

The jury could well have inferred that the market price was as stated in the message, and not as the witness remembered it at the trial. The average of the terms of the message, correctly quoted, would be $13\frac{1}{2}$ cents per melon, and the average per melon indicated by the erroneous message which was delivered was 16 cents. There is no evidence of any change in the market from the time the dispatch was sent until the plaintiff's melons arrived in Atlanta and were put upon the market. His loss, therefore, may have amounted to $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per melon. It was contended that he had barred himself from recovering anything by mismanaging the melons in Atlanta, endeavoring to sell them himself, instead of intrusting the sale to a competent person, and that his loss was the result of his own fault; but there is no pretense that he could have obtained, by any sort of management, more than the market price. Let him be treated, therefore, as having realized that price, and still he would be entitled to be compensated for the balance of his loss, which was the difference between that price and the one that could have been obtained, had the market been as the erroneous dispatch represented it. Very likely, the failure to find the market which he was entitled to expect was the cause why he undertook to manipulate the melons in person, and did not employ a competent agent to do so for him. Had the market been as represented, he might have felt himself able to afford to undergo the expense of employing an agent to sell, and probably would have done so. The loss which he sustained by not employing such an agent could not have been more than the actual market price, and we have already said that so much of his loss as was covered by that price he must bear, no matter what occasioned it. It is certain that the erroneous dispatch did not occasion it, and for that reason the telegraph company is not chargeable with any part of it. But the fair presumption is that, had the market price been as high as the erroneous dispatch quoted it, that price could and would have been realized on the plaintiff's shipment. In fixing upon the averages of the two readings of the message, and applying them to the case, we have assumed that the plaintiff's melons were average melons; there being nothing in the evidence to the contrary, or certainly nothing to show that they were below the average. If it appeared that they were melons of the lowest class, such as would have been worth, as a whole, only 12 cents apiece, then there would have been no loss at all, for the reason that it is the minimum mentioned in both readings of the dispatch. So, if it appeared that the melons were all of the highest class, it would, for a similar reason, be improper to apply to them the average of the prices, but the loss should be estimated with reference to the highest price named in the erroneous reading; that is, 20 cents each. We only say that on the present state of the evidence, as we find it in the record, the jury could hold the company responsible for loss at the rate of $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per melon. We will add that if the market had declined in the interval between the sending of the dispatch and the time the melons arrived and were put upon the market, this decline should be taken into the account, and proper allowance be made for it. What that allowance would or should be, we have not considered, because no evidence of a decline is before us.

3. At the time the erroneous message was received, the watermelons were already loaded in cars, and were standing on the side track of the railway at Butler, in Taylor county. On the day before, the plaintiff had sold a car load of melons at that place for $68, (20 cents each,) and after he received the dispatch he was offered $70 per car load for those on the side track; and the plaintiff testified that, but for the dispatch, he would not have shipped these melons to Atlanta, but would have sold them in Butler. We consider these facts wholly irrelevant on the question of measuring his damages. The basis of measurement which we have suggested gives him the full benefit of the market which the erroneous message indicated, and therefore of the one which he was entitled to expect. If he gets this, it matters not what opportunities he had to dispose of the melons at Butler, or what the price of them there was. By acting on the dispatch, he cut loose from all advantages which the Butler market afforded as to the melons shipped, and threw himself upon the Atlanta market. Let him realize the difference between what the Atlanta market was in fact, and what the company, by introducing an error into the message, represented it to be, and any possible injury which he could have sustained by the error will be repaired.

4. As there was evidence from which the jury could have arrived at a finding of some amount in favor of the plaintiff, the court erred in granting a nonsuit. Judgment reversed.

BELL v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Nov. 9, 1892.)

INTOXICATING LIQUORS — LOCAL OPTION — CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT — UNLAWFUL SALES — EVIDENCE.

1. The title of an act being "To prohibit the sale of alcoholic, spirituous or malt liquors, or intoxicating bitters," in a named county, and the enacting clause, which prescribes a penalty, corresponding therewith, the act is not rendered unconstitutional by another clause, which describes all the liquors contemplated as "intoxicating liquors;" alcoholic liquors, spirituous liquors, malt liquors, and intoxicating bitters being comprehended in the phrase "intoxicating liquors."

2. The special local option law for Monroe county, enacted in 1882, does not vary the prior general law touching the granting of licenses to retail spirituous liquors; the one relates to prohibiting sales altogether, and the other to regulating sales, or making them lawful on certain conditions.

3. The evidence in behalf of the state, fairly construed, showing that the liquor sold was not whisky, but rice beer, and there being no evidence that rice beer is a malt liquor, or that it is intoxicating, the verdict was without evidence to support it. In the present state of public information, courts cannot notice judicially that rice beer is intoxicating. Whether it is or not is a question of fact for the jury on evidence adduced at the trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Monroe county; J. S. Boynton, Judge.

Jordan Bell was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and brings error. Reversed.

Cabaniss & Willingham and Harrison & Peeples, for plaintiff in error. John J. Hunt, Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The act in question is found in the Acts of 1882-83, p. 548. The title is as follows: "An act to prohibit the sale of alcoholic, spirituous or malt liquors, or intoxicating bitters in the county of Monroe, after submitting the same to the qualified voters of said county, to provide a penalty, and for other purposes." The enacting clause, prescribing a penalty, reads thus: "That should a majority of the votes cast at said election have upon them the words 'Against the sale of liquor,' then and in that event the provisions of this act shall go into effect on the first day of January, 1883, and on and after that day it shall not be lawful for any person or persons to sell, directly or indirectly, any alcoholic, spirituous or malt liquors or intoxicating bitters in any quantity in said county of Monroe, and any persons violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished as described in section 4310 of the Code of Georgia." A preceding clause declares "that an election shall be held in the county of Monroe on Thursday, the twenty-first day of December, 1882, to determine whether intoxicating liquors shall any longer be sold in said county." There can be no doubt that the phrase "intoxicating liquors" embraces all the "liquors" mentioned, first, in the title, and then in the penalty clause, of the act. If it be capable of embracing more, as well as these, the act is not vitiated thereby; for it shows on its face that the legislature did not intend the phrase to include any but the liquors specially enumerated. Taking the whole act together, no court could rationally hold that the legislature meant to prohibit the sale of any liquor not comprehended in the description "alcoholic, spirituous, malt liquors, or intoxicating bitters." Moreover, we doubt whether, considering the wide range of the word "alcoholic," any intoxicating liquor used as a beverage lies outside of this enumeration. Alcohol is understood to be the intoxicating principle in all liquors capable of producing intoxication, and, rather than declare a statute unconstitutional for want of conformity to its title, the adjective "alcoholic" might perhaps be construed as synonymous or coextensive with the adjective "intoxicating." But, granting that "intoxicating" is broader than "alcoholic," it is not, as used in this statute, broader than this and all the other descriptive words combined. The result is that nothing in the body of the act is substantially different from what is contained in the title.

2. The act is a special law, but it in no wise varies the prior general law touching the granting of licenses to retail spirituous liquors. The special law prohibits sales in Monroe county altogether, or provides for it; the general law, as contained in section 1419 of the Code, relates to regulating sales, or making them lawful on certain conditions. Special local option laws could be constitutionally enacted in this state until a general local option law was passed, which was done later.

3. The indictment charged the sale of "a quantity of whisky and intoxicating liquor." Fairly construed, the evidence failed to show the sale of any whisky, but did show the sale of rice beer. What is rice beer, and what is its effect when taken into the human stomach? The evidence, as brought here, throws no light upon these questions. Rice beer is not shown to be a malt liquor, nor is it shown to be intoxicating. In the present state of public information, courts cannot notice judicially that it is one or the other. Some beverages, such as whisky, brandy, etc., are in such common and notorious use as intoxicants that no proof is requisite to stamp them with this character; but rice beer is comparatively a rare liquor. Whether it will produce intoxication or not ought to be proved. Were it shown to be a malt liquor, this would suffice; but the evidence is silent both as to how it is produced and what effect attends its use. Without at least some slight evidence tending to give it character, the jury could not rightly treat it as a prohibited article of sale. The question was one of fact for the jury to decide, and they have decided it adversely to the accused, without any evidence to guide them. For this reason alone the court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

REDDING v. STATE.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS—INDICTMENT—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT—UNLAWFUL SALES.

1. The constitutional questions in this case are the same as those ruled upon in Bell v. State, 18 S. E. 288, (just decided.) Other questions on the indictment are ruled in principle by Carter v. State, 68 Ga. 826; Hill v. Mayor, etc., 72 Ga. 314; and Williams v. State, (Ga.) 15 S. E. 552.

2. The evidence being that the accused, a practicing physician, sold a half pint of whisky to a certain person, who went to his store and said he was sick, and thought whisky would help him, there being no evidence that the person was in fact sick, or that he was a patient under treatment by the accused, who did nothing but examine him, and then sell him the whisky, the jury were warranted in finding that the transaction was not within the exception of the statute which allows practicing physicians to furnish liquors as medicine to their patients under treatment. There was no error in denying the application for a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Monroe county; J. S. Boynton, Judge.

C. E. Redding was convicted of selling intoxicating liquors unlawfully, and from an order denying a new trial he brings error. Affirmed.

Cabaniss & Willingham and Harrison & Peebles, for plaintiff in error. John J. Hunt, Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The constitutional questions raised by demurrer to the indictment are ruled by the decision in Bell v. State, 18 S. E. 288, (this term.) The act on which the indictment is based is not unconstitutional for either of the causes specified in the demurrer. Other questions on the indictment are ruled in principle by Carter v. State, 68 Ga. 826; Hill v. Mayor, etc., 72 Ga. 314; and Williams v. State, (Ga.) 15 S. E. 552. The indictment was not insufficient by reason of any of the deficiencies imputed to it.

2. The accused sought to protect himself under the exception in the statute which allows practicing physicians to furnish liquors as medicine to their patients under treatment. There was no evidence to uphold this theory, save that the person to whom the whisky was furnished said he was sick. It does not appear that any prescription or treatment was applied for, furnished, or paid for. The patient selected his own medicine, paid for it, received it, and administered it to himself. The accused—doubtless as matter of form—examined him, and then sold him the whisky. A man professing to be sick wanted whisky because he thought it would help him. The doctor examined him, but what he thought either as to the sickness or the remedy no one but himself knows or ever knew, save from his own statement at the trial, and as might be inferred from the fact that he furnished the whisky, and received pay for it. The jury could well conclude that this was more like selling whisky than practicing medicine. The exception in the statute does not contemplate that a physician may take a thirsty man under treatment for the sole purpose of supplying him with the desired beverage. But the only ground of the motion for a new trial was that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment. Of course, there was no error in denying this motion. Judgment affirmed.

RICHMOND & D. R. CO. v. MITCHELL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 15, 1893.)

INJURIES TO EMPLOYEE—LAW OF FORUM—DEGREE OF CARE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—RULES OF MASTER—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. In the trial of an action for a tort committed in another state, the rules of evidence applicable to a tort of like class, committed in this state, are to be administered, whether the rules of evidence in the other state be the same as in this or not.

2. So far as appears, the degree of diligence due respectively between employer and employee under the laws of Alabama is not more than ordinary diligence. Ordinary diligence is that care which every prudent man exercises under the same or similar circumstances.

3. Inasmuch as the plaintiff below, when he undertook to make the coupling, knew that the supply of hands ordinarily requisite to the occasion was deficient, and nevertheless consented without objection to make the coupling, and inasmuch as the mode of making it, and the care and diligence to be exercised, would in no way, after the plaintiff engaged in the work, be affected by the want of more hands, the deficiency was irrelevant to the issue on trial, and it was error to give in charge to the jury anything whatever on that subject.

4. A written or printed rule, carefully prepared, which prohibits brakemen "from coupling or uncoupling cars except with a stick," and declares that "brakemen or others must not go between the cars under any circumstances for the purpose of coupling or uncoupling, or adjusting pins, etc., when an engine is attached to such cars or train," does not apply to a case in which the engine was not attached to any car or train, and in which the brakeman stationed himself, in the way usually practiced by employees, upon the footboard of the pilot on the tender, and while there attempted to withdraw with his hand, without using a stick, a pin and link from the coupling apparatus of the engine, the engine and tender moving backwards at the time towards a standing car in the rear, for the purpose of being coupled thereto.

5. It is error for the court to assume that there is a conflict in the evidence, when there is none, and to charge the jury on that subject, even though such charge be connected with relevant and correct propositions of law applicable to the case. This ruling applies to the eighth ground of the motion for a new trial.

6. In view of the evidence and the true law applicable thereto, there was no error in refusing any of the requests to charge the jury, made by counsel for the company.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by W. J. Mitchell against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company. Plaintiff was employed by defendant as a brakeman, and was injured while coupling cars in the state of Alabama. There was judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a new trial defendant brings error. Reversed.

Jackson, Leftwich & Black and E. Womack, for plaintiff in error. Glenn & Slaton, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. Touching the evidence requisite to make a prima facie case in behalf of the plaintiff below, the court gave in charge to the jury the rule of law applicable in this state between the parties where the action is against a railroad company for a personal injury sustained by one of its employes in consequence of the negligence of the company or of a coemployee. This was correct, although the injury sued for was sustained in the state of Alabama. The quantity or degree of evidence requisite to sustain an action or to change the burden of proof is determined by the law of the forum, and not by the law of the place where the cause of action arose. It belongs not to the law of rights, but to the law of remedy. It is matter of procedure and practice, or of the law of evidence in its relations thereto. What evidence, and how much, will suffice for verifying in the courts of this state a right to recover in a given action or class of actions, is determined by the laws of this state, and them alone. These courts often have to look elsewhere for the law of rights, but they never look elsewhere for the law of remedies, or for any part of the same. A tort committed in Alabama is proved here just as the same class of torts, when committed here, are proved. The same presumptions prevail, and the same measure and degree of evidence will shift the burden of proof from the plaintiff to the defendant.

2. The court instructed the jury that the degree of diligence to which the plaintiff was entitled while engaged in the service of the railway company in Alabama was ordinary diligence, and that the company was entitled to a like degree from him. Nothing appears, either as matter of law or evidence, tending to show that in that state any higher degree is due from either to the other. In defining ordinary diligence the court said it is that care which every prudent man exercises under the same or similar circumstances. This was correct.

3. The charge of the court touching a deficiency in the supply of hands was irrelevant to the issue and to the facts in evidence. When the plaintiff undertook to make the coupling he knew that the supply of hands ordinarily requisite to the service was deficient. With this knowledge, and without objection, he consented to make the coupling. No change in the supply occurred between that time and the time of his injury. He has no right now to blame the company, or to excuse himself on account of any deficiency in the supply of which he had knowledge when he consented to make that particular coupling, and engaged in the work of making it. The mode of making it, and the care and diligence to be exercised by him, underwent no variation in consequence of anything that happened after he consented to make it. If the number of hands on whose co-operation he relied, or had a right to rely, had been diminished without his knowledge after that consent was given, he would have had a right to complain; but, as nothing of the sort occurred, his duty was to make the coupling in a proper manner if he could, and, if he could not, to leave it unmade. He certainly had no reason to think that the company desired him to do anything which could not be done in the usual manner, and by the exercise of ordinary diligence on his part. The evidence that he consented to make the coupling is found in the fact that, without objection, he undertook to make it, and was injured in the attempt. If some one else, ought to have been present to do the work, or aid in doing it, and he meant to make that an excuse for not succeeding in it, in the event he failed, he ought to have made that an excuse for not trying to do it, and should have forborne the attempt.

4. As part of his contract of employment with the company the plaintiff subscribed to an instrument of writing declaring as follows: "I fully understand that the rules of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company positively prohibit brakemen from coupling or uncoupling cars, except with a stick, and that brakemen or others must not go between the cars, under any circumstances, for the purpose of coupling or uncoupling or adjusting pins, etc., when an engine is attached to said cars or train; and in consideration of being employed by said company I hereby agree to be bound by such rule, and waive all or any liability of said company to me for any results of disobedience or infraction thereof. I have read the above carefully and fully understand it." It may be fairly presumed that the rules referred to and quoted from in the contract were carefully prepared, deliberately adopted, and embodied in some written or printed document. It is allowable, therefore, to notice the phraseology critically in order to ascertain whether or not, fairly construed, that phraseology embraces such a coupling as was attempted in this case. The plaintiff was neither coupling nor uncoupling cars, nor did he go between the cars, nor was the engine attached to any cars or train. The evidence is, in substance, that the plaintiff, who was a brakeman, stationed himself, in the way usually practiced by employes, upon the foot-board of the pilot on the tender, and while there attempted to withdraw with his hand, without using a stick, a pin and link from the coupling apparatus of the engine; the engine and tender being in motion backwards at the time towards a standing car in the rear, for the purpose of being coupled thereto. Certainly the rules as quoted do not, by their letter, cover such a transaction as that in which the plaintiff was engaged. It is said, however, that they do cover it in spirit and intention. This seems to be altogether too doubtful, for, as we have already said, there is a presumption that such rules would be carefully considered and accurately expressed, and we may add that they ought to be construed more strongly against the party who made and adopted them than against one who merely assented to and agreed to be bound by them when they were presented to him as a basis of contract. The strong probability is that in preparing the rules such a case as the present, though it might frequently occur, was overlooked, and therefore was not provided for. We think this is the truth of the matter, and we hold with confidence that the rules have no application to the present case.

5. In charging the jury as set out in the eighth ground of the motion for a new trial the court assumed that by possibility the jury might find a conflict in the evidence, the language of the charge being: "And if you find from the evidence in this case that there is a conflict between the plaintiff and the defendant on any material issue in the case, and you should find that there is a witness or witnesses accessible whose evidence would throw light upon that issue, and that witness or those witnesses were not introduced or accounted for, that circumstance may be considered by you in passing upon that issue; and this rule of law is applicable to both plaintiff and defendant in this case." We have scrutinized the evidence very carefully, and there is no conflict in it on any material issue, and no charge upon the subject was appropriate. No harm would have been done by an instruction merely to reconcile conflicts in the evidence, if any existed, and if the jury could reconcile them; but to put the jury on the lookout for other witnesses, witnesses not introduced or accounted for, was rather a dangerous thing; and every one knows to which of the parties it was dangerous. It is true that this irrelevant charge was connected with and immediately followed certain relevant and correct propositions of law applicable to the case, but they were not on this same subject; and, this being so, the fusing of them with this in the same ground of the motion for a new trial, and without pointing out wherein the error consists, will not constrain this court to pretermit the whole ground, more especially where there is to be a new trial on account of another error which the trial court committed.

6. We have read and considered the requests to charge the jury made by counsel for the company, and no error is discoverable in the refusal of the court to charge as requested. But the court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

RICHMOND & D. R. CO. v. BELL.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. May 22, 1893.)
INJURIES TO EMPLOYE — RULES OF MASTER—NEW TRIAL—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. Touching the rule of the company which is involved in this case, the decision in Railroad Co. v. Mitchell, 18 S. E. 290, (this term,) applies.

2. On its merits the case is a very weak one, and the trial court, in the exercise of the legal discretion which the law confides to it, might well have granted a new trial; but there was no manifest abuse of discretion, and, this being so, the judgment must be and is affirmed. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Mack Bell against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company. Plaintiff had judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

The following is the official report:

Bell sued the railroad company for damages for injuries sustained by him while coupling cars for it. He obtained a verdict for $500. Defendant's motion for a new trial was overruled, to which it excepted. The motion contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc., and to the charge of the court. Also because the court erred in overruling the motion for nonsuit made by defendant, defendant alleging that this action was error, in that the evidence of plaintiff showed beyond a doubt that he was violating a rule of the railroad company, which he admitted, at the time he was hurt. Because the court erred in, of its own motion, and without the objection of plaintiff's counsel, refusing to allow in evidence the statements of O'Toole, regular conductor in charge of the engine at the time plaintiff was hurt, and of the brakeman, Patterson, both statements being made immediately after the accident. Movant alleged that while it was true these statements did not constitute admissible evidence, if the objection were made by counsel for plaintiff, yet without said objection the court did not have the right to refuse to admit them. What these statements were is not set out in the motion nor in the bill of exceptions. What appear to be such statements are in the brief of evidence sent up in the record, and are therein followed by a statement that they were refused by the court. This ground was approved with the following explanation: The same character of evidence was offered by defendant before these statements were offered, and the evidence was objected to by plaintiff's counsel, and rejected. When these statements were offered by defendant the court rejected them, adhering to its former ruling as to such evidence. One objection of counsel to the same character of evidence was deemed by the court sufficient. Also that the verdict was contrary to the following charge: "If you find from the evidence in this case that the defendant had a rule which prohibited the employes from coupling and uncoupling cars and adjusting pins while attached to the engine, and the plaintiff had knowledge of such rules, or should have known it by the exercise of ordinary diligence, (and in this instance I charge you he had such knowledge, because he had the rules, and had contracted to obey them,) and he violated such rules, and on that account he was hurt, he could not recover, notwithstanding you should find that the other employes frequently or customarily disregarded such rule. To make this reply (that is, that other employes frequently or customarily disregard such rules) available as an excuse for the nonobservance of a rule by the plaintiff, you must believe from the evidence that the defendant, knowing the practice of the employes to disregard the rules, acquiesced in it in such way as to sanction or as to be held practically to have abrogated it. If the plaintiff had orders always to couple and uncouple cars with sticks, and not to adjust pins to cars when attached to engines, he should not have taken any license from the conduct of other employes, as long as he had reason to think that the rule was still in force, and that he was expected to abide by it. If you find that the rule was disregarded so often and by so many of defendant's employes, with the knowledge of the defendant, that the plaintiff was authorized to believe that the rule was not in force, then a violation of it would not bar his recovery." Movant further alleged that the verdict was contrary to the above charge, because no evidence was introduced, except that of plaintiff himself, going to show that employes of defendant had so frequently and customarily disregarded the rule in regard to coupling cars and going between the same when in motion as to have abrogated it, and that the preponderance of evidence was that said rule was still in force. Movant also alleged, in this connection, that the court did not leave to the jury the question as to whether or not said rule was reasonable, but left to them simply the question as to whether or not it had been so disregarded as to have amounted to an abrogation of the same.

Jackson, Leftwich & Black, for plaintiff in error. P. F. Smith and W. W. Gaines, for defendant in error.

PER CURIAM. Judgment affirmed.

HALL v. CARLISLE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 24, 1893.)

PRACTICE IN JUSTICE'S COURT — TRIAL AFTER REMAND.

When, on certiorari from the verdict of a jury rendered in a justice's court, the case is remanded for a new trial, the new trial must be had by another jury, and not by the presiding justice. If the plaintiff refuses to try by jury, and the justice for that reason dismisses the case, no appeal on the judgment of dismissal lies to the superior court, and dismissal of the appeal in the latter court is not erroneous.

Error from superior court, Talbot county; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Action by Jesse D. Hall against B. S. Carlisle. From a judgment dismissing his appeal from the court of a justice of the peace, plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Jesse J. Bull, for plaintiff in error. Willis & Persons and Morgan McMichael, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. In a justice's court, no case can reach a jury, except by appeal, and nobody but a jury can try an appeal. The only trial which can be had by the presiding justice of the peace must take place before appeal. The justice is the organ of trial appealed from, not the one appealed to. Here there was an appeal from a judgment of the justice. It was tried by a jury, and, on certiorari from the verdict of the jury to the superior court, a new trial was ordered. The plaintiff refused, after the case was remanded to the justice's court, to proceed to try it by jury. This was a virtual abandonment of the case, and the justice rightly dismissed it. It would be a perversion of the law of appeal to apply it to this judgment of dismissal. An appeal from a justice's court to the superior court must present, either actually or by legal possibility, something for trial by jury. What is there for a jury to try, when the sole question presented, and which could be presented, is whether a case was properly dismissed by the presiding justice because the plaintiff declined to prosecute it before the only branch of the tribunal which had any power to try it? We are sure that such a question of mere practice or procedure is not one on which an appeal can be taken to the superior court. Indeed, we know no instance in which an appeal is allowed to a jury in the superior court when the same party has already appealed in the same case to a jury in the justice's court. In certain cases a party in a justice's court may elect between appealing to a jury in the same court, or to one in the superior court. But even in those cases he is restricted to one appeal or the other, and cannot, by successive appeals, present his case in both courts. No such piling of appeal upon appeal is provided for, or has ever been thought of before, so far as we are aware. Judgment affirmed.

HALL et al. v. MORRISON.

ACTION ON NOTE — PLEADINGS — CONSIDERATION — SALE — DELIVERY.

1. A special plea that the payee of a promissory note would not execute a deed of conveyance which he was bound by contract to execute, unless the person entitled to the deed would execute and deliver a promissory note for a pretended debt which he did not owe, and which had no connection with the consideration of the deed, is virtually a plea of want of consideration for the note, and as such is a good defense to an action founded on the note. Allegations of fraud and duress contained in the plea may be regarded as surplusage.

2. If at the time of taking a conveyance of real estate, upon which a mine was situated and mining operations had been conducted, the vendee purchased from the vendor the mining and transportation machinery and implements which were then upon the premises and accessible to the purchaser, giving his promissory note for the price thereof, and the vendee went into possession, or was already in possession, of the realty, no further delivery of the personality was necessary, unless there was actual stipulation in the contract for subsequent and more formal delivery.

3. There being a plea that the note was in part without any consideration whatever, and also a plea of total failure of consideration, and there being evidence tending to show that it was understood at the time of giving the note,—which was the time of the purchase,—that the plaintiff, the payee, was to get up the tools, etc., and put them where defendant could get them, and he subsequently refused to do this, and that defendant never did get them, it was error to charge the jury that if the defendant had notice of where the property was, and at that time he could have gotten possession of it by the exercise of ordinary diligence, and failed to do so, that would be constructive delivery to him, unless he asked the plaintiff to actually deliver the property at the time of the trade. A request to get up the tools, etc., subsequently made, would be equally effectual, if such was the understanding of the parties.

Error from superior court, Dade county; T. W. Milner, Judge.

Action on a promissory note by W. G. Morrison against G. J. Hall and another. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendants bring error. Reversed.

Payne & Walker, for plaintiffs in error.
R. J. & J. McCamy, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The court erred in striking the special plea, for, disregarding allegations of fraud and duress contained in it, which may be treated as surplusage, the plea was in substance one of want of consideration for the note sued on, and, if established, would be a good defense to the action. If the note was given as a promise to pay for doing something on the part of the payee which he was already bound to do, and which he refused to do, using that refusal as a means of morally coercing the makers of the note to execute it, the payee parted with no consideration, nor did the makers get any.

2. Upon the assumption that at the time of taking a conveyance from Morrison the Halls purchased from him the mining and transportation machinery and implements which were then upon the premises, and gave the note sued on for the price thereof, and the Halls went into possession, or were then already in possession, of the realty conveyed to them by Morrison, and the personality so purchased was accessible to them, Morrison would not be bound to make any further delivery of the personality, unless he stipulated in the contract of sale for the making of subsequent and more formal delivery. Possession of and title to the realty on which the personality was would be enough to invest the purchasers with full dominion over it, unless there was some obstacle to the exercise of such dominion; and it could and should be presumed that no other or different delivery was contemplated by the parties unless something was expressly mentioned from which a different intention could fairly be inferred.

3. The trial took place on a plea alleging that the note was in part without any consideration whatever, and another plea of total failure of consideration. There was evidence tending to show that in the contract for the sale of the personality it was agreed and understood that Morrison was to get up the tools, etc., and put them where the Halls could get them, and that he subsequently refused to do this, and the Halls never did get them. If this was the truth of the case, delivery of the property to which this understanding was applicable was never completed, and the court was mistaken in holding and charging that notice of where the property was and ability to get possession by the exercise of ordinary diligence would be constructive delivery, unless at the time of the trade Hall requested the plaintiff to actually deliver the property. There was no use for such a request at the time of the trade, for that was not the time contemplated in the agreement of the parties. The getting up of the tools, etc., was to be done afterwards, and a request subsequently made would be more in line with the agreement, and certainly as effectual as a request made at that time. For the errors indicated, there ought to be a new trial. Judgment reversed.

JOSEPH v. EAST TENNESSEE, V. & G. RY. CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. July 26, 1893.)

SETTLING BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—PRACTICE.

1. Where the term at which the case was tried had ended by adjournment on the 15th of July, and on the 13th of August counsel for the plaintiff tendered to the judge a bill of exceptions complaining of a judgment of nonsuit rendered during the term, this bill of exceptions having in it material errors, both of omission and commission, in setting out a brief of the evidence, and for that reason it was returned by the judge to the counsel with his objections indorsed thereon in extenso, the return taking place on the 18th of August, five days after the bill of exceptions was tendered, and the counsel did not tender a correct bill of exceptions until the 22d of November, the delay was inexcusable and unreasonable; the same, so far as appears, not having been occasioned by providential cause.

2. The act of November 11, 1889, in declaring that the judge shall, by any needful alteration, cause the bill of exceptions to conform to the truth, does not require him to make and insert in the bill of exceptions a brief of evidence substantially different from that set forth in the bill of exceptions presented to him, but only that he shall make such corrections as can properly be made by erasures and interlineations. If counsel, on being notified in writing of the judge's objection, does not at once make the desired alterations, or insist that the judge shall make them, but raises an issue with the judge, and keeps that issue pending for two or three months, finally conceding that the judge was correct, and on that account tendering a new bill of exceptions, the failure of the judge to himself make the requisite alterations in the first bill of exceptions will not save the second. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from city court of Macon; J. P. Ross, Judge.

Action by Ella S. V. Joseph against the East Tennessee, Virginia & Georgia Railway Company. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brought error. Defendant now moves to dismiss the writ of error. Granted.

Harris & Harris, for plaintiff in error. Hill, Harris & Birch, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. It was the duty of counsel to tender to the judge a correct bill of exceptions within 30 days after the adjournment of court. In this instance no such bill of exceptions was tendered until more than four months after adjournment. What transpired in the mean time is indicated in the first headnote. We think the delay was inexcusable and unreasonable. The second headnote sets forth what we deem a proper construction of the act of November 11, 1889, with reference to the judge's duty in altering bills of exception, when found to be incorrect. The motion to dismiss must prevail. Writ of error dismissed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF ROME et al. v. RAGAN et al.

ATTACHMENT—FRAUD—OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION—APPEARANCE AS WAIVER.

1. The act of February 21, 1873, providing for the issuing of attachments against debtors on the ground of fraud, confers no authority for issuing attachments returnable to any court except the superior court; and the local act applicable to the city court in Floyd county (Acts 1882-83, p. 534) does not vary the general law on this subject.

2. The statutory rule (Code, § 3309) that valid general judgments may, after notice of the pendency of the attachment, be rendered against the defendant, notwithstanding the attachment be dismissed, does not apply when the court to which the attachment was returnable has no jurisdiction of that class of attachment; and the appearance of the defendant, and a traverse filed by him of the ground on which the attachment was issued, will not render valid a general judgment against him in favor of the attaching creditor, as against third persons, although such appearance and filing of traverse might operate to make the judgment good as against the defendant himself, under section 3309 of the Code, and cases construing the same.

Error from superior court, Floyd county; W. M. Henry, Judge.

Action on attachment by the First National Bank of Rome and others against R. J. Ragan and others. The action was brought in a city court on the ground of fraud, and on removal to the superior court the action was dismissed. Plaintiffs bring error. Affirmed.

Dean & Smith, Donald Harper, Dabney & Fouché, and W. W. Broodes, for plaintiffs in error. Reece & Denny, E. P. Treadaway, W. J. Nunnally, C. A. Thornwell, and Alexander & Wright, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. From the whole tenor and phraseology of the act of February 21, 1873, (Code, §§ 3297, 3298 et seq.) it is manifest that no authority for ordering or issuing attachments against debtors on the ground of fraud was intended to be conferred, except as to attachments returnable to the superior court. True, that court is not expressly mentioned as the one to which the attachments are to be returnable, but we think that court, and it alone, was in contemplation. It surely was not the purpose of the statute for the judge of the superior court to prepare business for justices' courts, city courts, and all others which might have jurisdiction over ordinary attachments. The act, as shown by section 3301 of the Code, made the decision of the judge granting an attachment, or refusing it, subject to review by this court. Can it be supposed that the legislature intended to make preliminary orders passed by a judge of the superior court on business returnable to and triable in a justice's court matter for review by the supreme court? Could the legislature do so, if such was its purpose, in view of the provisions of the constitution (Code, § 5133) which makes this a court alone for the trial and correction of errors from the superior courts and from city courts? As the act makes provision for carrying to this court any decision of the judge granting or refusing an attachment, it is evident that the legislature intended the power of review to apply to all cases which the act provides for; and it could not apply to all, constitutionally, unless all were regarded as business pertaining to the superior court, and this could not be if some of the attachments could or might be made returnable to other courts. Another consideration tending to show that the business contemplated was superior court business, only, is that, after property has been attached without a hearing, the defendant in attachment may apply to the judge to dissolve or remove the attachment wholly or partially, and on this application the judge is empowered to act; so that, even after the attachment has been levied, it is treated as still under the jurisdiction of the judge of the superior court who ordered it to issue. Code, § 3299. Could it have been the purpose of the act to have that judge pass upon the levies which had been made on attachments returnable to the justices' courts or other jurisdiction, such as city and county courts? We are convinced that no such scheme was or could have been in the legislative mind. The judges of the superior court were clothed with the powers conferred by this act, because they were in the nature of equity powers, and equity powers had always been confided, in this state, to the superior courts, and to none others. The local act applicable to the city court of Floyd county (Acts 1882-83, p. 534) does not, if it could, trench upon the general law touching this class of attachments. The attachments of which it speaks and to which it refers are ordinary attachments, not these special—and, as they might be called, equity—attachments, which the judges of the superior court alone are empowered to grant.

2. It was contended that although the attachments, as such, might be void, the city court had power to render valid general judgments in the cases by virtue of sections 3309, 3328, of the Code; Holt, the defendant in attachment, having appeared in the city court, and traversed the ground on which the attachment issued. The first of these sections says that "no declaration shall be dismissed because the attachment may have been dismissed or discontinued, but the plaintiff shall be entitled to judgment on the declaration filed as in other cases at common law, upon the merits of the case." The latter is in these words: "When the defendant has given bond and security, as provided in section 3319 of this Code, or when he has appeared and made defense by himself or attorney at law, or when he has been cited to appear, as provided in section 3309 of this Code, the judgment rendered against him in such case shall bind all his property, and shall have the same force and effect as when there has been personal service, and execution shall issue accordingly, but it shall be first levied upon the property attached. In all other cases, the judgment on the attachment shall only bind the property attached, and the judgment shall be entered only against such property." But these were not such attachments as that any declarations in the city court founded upon them could have been legally filed. That court had no jurisdiction of the attachments, and consequently no jurisdiction of the declarations which were based upon them. The defendant could not be brought into the city court by that means. If he chose to come voluntarily, and thereby waive the question of jurisdiction, he could do so, by virtue of section 3100 of the Code, so far as his own rights were concerned, but not so as to prejudice third persons. As this section has been construed in cases heretofore decided by this court, other creditors of his are to be considered as third persons; and, as they cannot be prejudiced by his waiver in respect to jurisdiction, their general judgment liens against his property are to be treated just as though the judgment requiring this waiver to support it had never been rendered. Had the attachments belonged to a class over which, by any legal possibility, the city court could have exercised jurisdiction, then the sections of the Code cited would have been applicable, for the attachments would have been such as these sections speak of and refer to. But with attachments ordered and issued on the ground of fraud, no matter by whom the order is made, the city court has no concern. Relatively to that court, such an attachment is none at all, and the defendant might as well have gone there, and confessed judgment, without any process ever having issued to call for his appearance, as to have gone in consequence of these attachments; they being utterly void, so far as the city court was concerned. Judgment affirmed.

SLATER v. KIMBRO et al.

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION — WRONGFULLY OUSTING TENANT—DAMAGES.

1. One who, by written contract, lets premises to another for one year, with a privilege of renewal for two years longer, admits the tenant into possession, and at the expiration of the first year sues out a summary statutory process maliciously and without probable cause to dispossess the tenant as a tenant at will holding over, is liable to an action for malicious prosecution of a civil proceeding, if any special damage to the tenant is occasioned thereby.

2. The premises being occupied and used by the tenant as a boarding house, the loss of boarders occasioned by suing out the malicious process was special damage. So, too, were trouble and expense, including counsel fees, incurred by the tenant in giving bond and security to prevent summary expulsion from the premises by virtue of the malicious process. The declaration, though loose, and needing amendment to give it full certainty, set forth a cause of action, and it was error to dismiss the same on motion or general demurrer.

Error from city court of Atlanta; Howard Van Epps, Judge.

Action for malicious prosecution by Mary F. Slater against R. P. S. Kimbro and others. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

P. L. Mynatt & Son, for plaintiff in error. Arnold & Arnold and W. B. Farley, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The declaration is good in substance. It sets forth a substantial cause of action. The plaintiff being in possession of the premises under a written contract for one year, "with privilege of two years longer at same agreed rate," she was not subject to rightful expulsion at the end of the first year as a tenant at will holding over. She was not a tenant at will, and was not holding over, unless she had relinquished or forfeited the "privilege of two years longer at same agreed rate;" and this, so far as appears, she had not done. On the contrary, by remaining in possession after the year expired, she signified her intention to avail herself of the longer term provided for by the contract, and, if an express renewal was contemplated, (which, under the words of the writing, seems improbable,) some demand to execute a renewal contract should have been made upon her. It seems to us that merely continuing to occupy would spread the original contract over the two additional years, just as it had previously covered the first year's occupancy, and that any further express contract on the subject would be needless. The monthly rent was not payable in advance, and there is no hint in the declaration that the plaintiff was in any fault or default whatsoever. The year did not expire until the 1st of October, and the warrant to dispossess her was sued out the next day. The want of probable cause is manifest, and malice on the part of the defendants is distinctly alleged. Though the warrant was not executed by eviction, if the suing of it out maliciously and without probable cause and the attempt to execute it by eviction occasioned special damage to the plaintiff, she can recover. The warrant was aimed at her possession, and would have deprived her of it had she not given the bond and security required by section 4079 of the Code. It failed to expel her from the premises, but it brought her possession into imminent peril, and forced her to give bond and security as the price of preserving it. Had she not paid this price, she would have been expelled, and the groundless and malicious proceeding would have been triumphant. It did triumph so far as forcing her into making a bond and procuring sureties to join with her in its execution was concerned. Had she failed to avail herself of this alternative, and if she had been turned out of possession in consequence, no one can doubt that she would have had a cause of action for the special damage occasioned thereby, the warrant having been voluntarily dismissed by those who procured it to be issued. Doubtless the course she took lessened her damages, and was therefore favorable to her persecutors. Shall she recover nothing because she rendered their unfounded and malicious proceeding as harmless to herself, and consequently to them, as possible, instead of leaving it to work all the mischief which they intended? The dismissal of the warrant after it had coerced the plaintiff to give bond and security terminated the proceeding; consequently the present action was not prematurely brought.

2. The declaration alleges that the premises were occupied and used by the plaintiff as a boarding house, and that a loss of boarders was occasioned by suing out the malicious process. Such would be the natural and proximate effect of thus menacing the plaintiff's possession. It might be expected that boarders would drop out when they ascertained that their landlady was about to be expelled, and that persons who might have become boarders would be deterred from so doing. This interference with her business as a boarding house keeper might well cause her special damage, and the declaration alleges that it did so in fact. If she incurred trouble and expense, including counsel fees, in giving bond and security to prevent expulsion, this also would be special damage. The declaration is loose and vague as to some of these matters, and needs amendment in order to give it full certainty; but, as we have already said, it sets forth a cause of action in substance. This being so, it was error to dismiss the action on motion or on general demurrer. Judgment reversed.

WESTERN UNION TEL. CO. v. HUTCHESON.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES — FAILURE TO TRANSMIT MESSAGE ON SUNDAY—WORK OF NECESSITY.

1. By section 4579 of the Code, it is made unlawful for any person (and this includes a telegraph company) to pursue his business or the work of his ordinary calling upon the Lord's day, works of necessity or charity only excepted. It follows that a telegraph company is not put by law, and cannot put itself by contract, under any duty to transmit and deliver messages on that day, unless, by reason of the subject-matter of the messages in question, their transmission and delivery can be fairly considered as a work of necessity or charity.

2. A message from a son to his mother, informing her that a particular person, a friend of the family, will arrive on a particular train,—the object being to apprise her that he, in company with the son, would be with her to take dinner,—is not a message which can give to the work of transmitting and delivering it the character of either necessity or charity. A failure to perform the work on the Lord's day with reasonable dispatch will not subject the company to the statutory penalty imposed by the act of 1887, and an action therefor is not maintainable.

Error from superior court, Clayton county; R. H. Clark, Judge.

Action by Claud H. Hutcheson against the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover the statutory penalty for failure of duty. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

Bigby, Reed & Berry, for plaintiff in error. Hutcheson & Key, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. There is no good reason to doubt that the prohibition of section 4579 of the Code, upon ordinary Sunday labor, applies no less to telegraph companies and their employes than to other persons, the language of the section being: "Any tradesman, artificer, workman or laborer, or other person whatever, who shall pursue their business or work of their ordinary callings upon the Lord's day (works of necessity or charity only excepted) shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction shall be punished as prescribed in section 4310 of this Code." Anything that is prohibited by law, under a penalty, cannot become a legal duty by reason of any contract or agreement which may be entered into concerning it. A so-called "contract" to violate the law is no contract at all. A telegraph company is not by law, and cannot put itself by contract, under any duty to transmit and deliver messages on Sunday, unless, by reason of the subject-matter of the messages in question, their transmission and delivery can fairly be considered as a work of necessity or charity. It makes no difference that the company, in addition to undertaking to perform the work, received and accepted full compensation for its performance. This might subject it to refund the money, but could not oblige it to render the service.

2. In the present case the contents of the message furnish no indication whatever of any necessity or charity to be subserved by the message, and incidentally by the work of transmission and delivery; nor is any such object brought in sight, or even faintly suggested, by the testimony. The sender of the message was a witness, and he did not pretend that any object of necessity or charity was contemplated or involved in the transaction. From his testimony, and the message itself, the object seems to have been to apprise his mother that a certain friend of the family would be with her to take dinner, in company with the sender, her son. This object is properly classed as a social one, but it is wholly wanting, so far as appears, in any character of necessity or charity; and we think neither of these characters is to be assumed by mere presumption, and without any proof whatever. The general rule is, with respect to Sunday work, that messages are not privileged. He who asserts privilege for a particular message should be required to prove it. The charge of the court to the jury conflicted with the views expressed in this opinion, and was, we think, erroneous. Judgment reversed.

WILLINGHAM v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO.

TELEGRAPH COMPANIES—FAILURE TO TRANSMIT MESSAGE ON SUNDAY.

Where a telegraphic message delivered on Sunday for transmission did not show on its face that it related to a subject-matter which would render transmission and delivery a work of necessity or charity, and where there is no averment in the declaration either that the dispatch in question did relate to such a subject-matter, or that the telegraph company, its agent or servant, was informed that it had relation to any such matter, the failure to transmit and deliver it on Sunday is not actionable. There was no error in dismissing the action on demurrer, taken in connection with the facts orally admitted by counsel at the hearing.

Error from city court of Floyd; W. T. Turnbull, Judge.

Action by Mary Willingham against the Western Union Telegraph Company for failure to transmit a message. There was judgment for defendant on demurrer dismissing the complaint, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Wrights & Harper, for plaintiff in error. McHenry, Nunnally & Neel, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. It was admitted that the dispatch was in these words, "Meet the E. T. train at 3 o'clock," and that the day on which it was received for transmission, and on which the delay complained of occurred, was Sunday. That ordinary telegraphic messages, or rather the work and labor of transmitting and delivering them, are within the prohibition of the Sunday law was ruled in the case of Telegraph Co. v. Hutcheson, 18 S. E. 297, this term. Neither on the face of the message, nor by any averment in the declaration, does it appear that the subject-matter of the message concerned anything in the nature of charity or necessity, or that these characteristics would or could be made to attach to the work of transmission and delivery, so as to bring the same within the exception of the Sunday law, as laid down in section 4579 of the Code. The general rule being that Sunday work cannot be done, and the only exception being in behalf of works of necessity or charity, it devolves upon him who complains that any particular work was not done on Sunday to show that it was not covered by the general rule, but was embraced in the exception. Were this shown on the face of the message, that would be prima facie sufficient; but, where it is not thus shown, it should be alleged and proved in order to hold the company penally responsible for not executing the work promptly on that day. There was no error in sustaining the demurrer and dismissing the action. Judgment affirmed.

JACKSON v. STATE.

HOMICIDE—KILLING WIFE'S PARAMOUR—INSTRUCTIONS—REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. A husband is not justifiable in killing a man whom he knows or believes to be his wife's paramour, when the latter is peaceably working at his daily labor in the field, and the wife is at her home, more than a mile distant. Under these circumstances there is no such urgent and pressing danger of a new act of adultery as to make the killing absolutely necessary in order to prevent it. It is only where there is such absolute necessity that a killing perpetrated to prevent adultery with the slayer's wife is upon the same footing of reason and justice with cases of justifiable homicide expressly enumerated in the Code. The doctrine of reasonable fear as a defense does not apply to any case of homicide where the danger apprehended is not urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing.

2. A request to charge the jury, which has no proper application either to the evidence or to the prisoner's statement, should be declined. For this reason, if for no other, it was not error to deny a request couched in these terms: "If you believe from the evidence that when the prisoner came upon the deceased, upon the sight of him he became so enraged at the thought of past or attempted wrongs upon his wife or family that reason was dethroned by passion, and carried away by such passion, and not in a spirit of revenge; that the defendant, under such influences, killed the deceased,—such killing could not be of a higher grade than manslaughter."

3. Where there is nothing in the evidence to indicate that the killing was not voluntary, and where no charge is requested on that subject, involuntary manslaughter is not an issue in the case, and no allusion should be made to it in charging the jury, even though the prisoner's statement by indirection suggest such a theory.

4. Where there was evidence tending to impeach one of the state's witnesses by contradictory statements as well as by bad character, and the court charged the law applicable to impeachment by the latter means, but omitted, apparently by inadvertence, to mention the former, this is not cause for a new trial; the attention of the court not having been called to the omission by counsel, and the general charge on the subject of conflict and credit of witnesses being full and correct.

5. Where the court charged the jury that they were to pass upon the law and facts both, apply the facts to the law as given them in the charge, and from both together make up a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the issue submitted, and in that way judge of both the law and the facts, it was not error to charge also thus: "The law of the case I am responsible for. It is made my duty to instruct the jury properly as to the legal principles applicable to this case, and you are bound to take the law of the case from me, just as I am bound to absolutely refrain from suggesting or intimating any opinion at all about the evidence. The one is your domain; the other is mine."

6. It is not true that, if the jury have any doubt as to which grade of homicide the accused has committed, they should give him the benefit of the doubt, and find him guilty of the lesser grade. Only a reasonable doubt would work this consequence.

7. The verdict was correct, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

Error from superior court, Bibb county; C. L. Bartlett, Judge.

John Jackson was convicted of murder, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Roland Ellis and E. A. Cohen, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Felton, Jr., Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. There is no law of this state, or of any other state or country of which we have ever heard, which will justify a husband in going into a field where a man is at work and killing him because he has committed adultery with the slayer's wife. To do such an act is murder absolute and unqualified. It is taking the law in one's own hands, and punishing a man with death for a past transgression. This is contrary to all principles of law and the administration of law. Under the facts of this case there was no necessity for the killing to prevent a future act of adultery between the slain man and the slayer's wife. No such act was in progress, or could have been in progress, for the parties were separated by such distance that the act was impossible. The doctrine of reasonable fear as a defense has no application to any homicide where the danger apprehended is not urgent and pressing, or apparently so, at the time of the killing.

2. The request to charge the jury touching the prisoner's excitement to such an extent that his reason was dethroned by passion, and he was carried away by the passion, had no application either to the evidence or to the prisoner's statement. Without considering other objections to it, this was sufficient to render it an improper charge to submit to the jury. In his statement the prisoner did not pretend or profess to have acted under any such influence, and there was no evidence giving the slightest color to such a theory.

3. Nor was there any evidence to indicate that the killing was not voluntary, and no charge was requested on the subject of involuntary manslaughter. It was not an issue in the case, and the court was right in making no allusion to it in his charge to the jury. If the indirect suggestion bearing that way in the prisoner's statement was any ground for such a charge, an express request should have been made to give the charge. On the subject of conflict of evidence and credit of witnesses the charge was full and correct. Apparently by inadvertence, there was an omission, in charging on the subject of impeaching witnesses, to mention impeachment by contradictory statements. There was evidence tending to impeach one of the state's witnesses by that means as well as by proof of bad character. The attention of the court was not called to the omission, although, in the nature of things, counsel must have known that it was most probably made by inadvertence. We think this mere slip is no cause for a new trial.

4. On the subject of taking the law from the court and applying that law to the facts of the case, the charge was not in conflict with what has become the settled meaning of the rule that the jury are judges of the law as well as of the facts. The organ for acquainting them with the law is the court; and when they thus ascertain it they are to apply it to the evidence, and from both together make up a verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the issues submitted. By saying, "The one is your domain; the other is mine," the court did not exclude, nor mean to exclude, the jury from dealing with law after he had expounded it to them, for the very object of instructing them upon it was to enable them to use it in applying it to the facts of the case and arriving at their verdict.

5. It is not a correct proposition of law that if the jury have any doubt, but only if they have any reasonable doubt, as to which grade of homicide the accused has committed, they should give him the benefit of the doubt, and find him guilty of the lesser grade. They can find the higher grade, not alone where they are convinced beyond all doubt, but where they entertain no reasonable doubt of that being the real grade of the offense.

6. If evidence can manifest guilt of the crime of murder, the evidence does so in this case. It certainly does not shut out sympathy for this unfortunate man, but it manifests fully his guilt under the law. There was no error in denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

COMER v. COMER.

MARRIAGE—BETWEEN SLAVES—COMPLIANCE WITH ENABLING ACT.

1. Applied to a negro man, who, at the passage of the act of March 9, 1866, touching the relation of husband and wife between persons of color, had two reputed wives, both of whom he had espoused under the forms of marriage during the existence of slavery, the act contemplated that he should not continue to cohabit with both of them on any condition; that he might continue to cohabit with one of them, by selecting her and making her his lawful wife in the mode prescribed, which was by having the usual marriage ceremony known to the law performed between her and himself; and that, after this was done, the general laws of the state, civil and criminal, should apply to them as to other persons duly united in wedlock. According to the intent as well as the letter of the act, it required both the selection and the ceremony to take place immediately, but postponing compliance only made cohabitation penal; it did not disable the parties from complying, or inhibit compliance, at any time, however late. Acts 1865-66, p. 240; Code, § 1667.

2. The selection of one of the reputed wives, and subsequent cohabitation with her, whether exclusive or attended by cohabitation with the other also, was no compliance with the act without performance of the marriage ceremony. Unless that was performed, the selection counted for nothing, and was no obstacle to afterwards selecting the other, and making her the lawful wife by going through the marriage ceremony with her, she consenting to it.

3. After the husband's death, the reputed wife whose marriage was celebrated by means of the marriage ceremony was his widow, and as such is entitled to administer upon his estate. The other reputed wife has no claim upon the estate whatever, even if he continued to cohabit with both until he died.

Error from superior court, Bibb county; A. L. Miller, Judge.

Action between Ann Comer and Eliza Comer. From the judgment rendered, Ann Comer brings error. Affirmed.

Lanier & Anderson, Jas. L. Anderson, and Marion Harris, for plaintiff in error. Harde-man, Davis & Turner, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. "Persons of color now living together as husband and wife, are hereby declared to sustain that legal relation to each other, unless a man shall have two or more reputed wives, or a woman two or more reputed husbands. In such event, the man, immediately after the passage of this act by the general assembly, shall select one of his reputed wives, with her consent, or the woman one of her reputed husbands, with his consent, and the ceremony of marriage between these two shall be performed. If such man thus living with more than one woman, or such woman living with more than one man, shall fail or refuse to comply with the provisions of this section, he or she shall be prosecuted for the offense of fornication, or fornication or adultery, or fornication and adultery, and punished accordingly." Code, § 1667; Acts 1865-66, p. 240. This is the act of March 9, 1866. At that date the negro man Comer had two reputed wives,—the one Eliza, the other Ann,—each of whom he had espoused under the forms of marriage used by colored persons during the existence of slavery. The evidence indicates that he continued to cohabit with both of them at separate places, and in separate establishments, up to the time of his death, which occurred in the year 1888. It also indicates that he selected Ann as his wife as early as December, 1866, but it is clear that no marriage ceremony was ever performed or celebrated to give sanction or effect to that selection, though he held her out and treated her as his wife. In all probability the facts were such as would have constituted a good common-law marriage with Ann, if he and she had been legally competent to contract such a marriage with each other. So far as appears, he made no selection of Eliza as a wife until April, 1867, but in that month he was regularly married to her under a marriage license, the ceremony being performed by a minister of the gospel. Touching a man having two reputed wives at the date of the act of 1866, the scheme of that act evidently was to require him unconditionally to desist from cohabiting with both, and to interdict cohabitation with either unless he selected one and had the marriage ceremony performed between her and himself. The ceremony contemplated was the usual one known to the law, and not a mere agreement, formal or informal, between the parties to be man and wife. The selection was to be evidenced and made known by the ceremony, and no other means of declaring and publishing it would suffice. Because of his peculiar relation to both women, he was disabled from contracting a valid marriage with either of them, save in the mode prescribed. Each being already a reputed wife, he could not make either of them a real wife by adding to that reputation. He must have a statutory marriage with one, or none at all with either. Strict compliance would require that the marriage should take place "immediately;" but postponement, though it would render cohabitation in the mean time penal, would not work any legal disability to comply at any time, however late. It would be a misconstruction of the act to hold that if the marriage was not immediate it might take place otherwise than in the mode prescribed, or, on the other hand, that it could not take place at all. Whenever selection was sealed by ceremony, then there would be a valid marriage, but not till then. Of course, no other selection would be essential than that implied and necessarily involved in going through the ceremony of marriage with one of the reputed wives. One would be taken and the other left; one would be selected and the other rejected. After the ceremony, the special act of 1866 would cease to concern itself with the relation of the parties or their future conduct. The general laws of the state, civil and criminal, would then apply to them the same as to other persons duly united in wedlock.

2. Applying the construction of the act of 1866 which we have just announced to the undisputed facts in evidence, it is manifest that the selection of Ann by Comer as his wife counted for nothing, that selection not having been attended nor followed by the performance of a marriage ceremony; and it is equally manifest that it constituted no obstacle to afterwards selecting Eliza, and making her his lawful wife by duly celebrating a formal marriage between himself and her, with her consent, as was in fact done.

3. Upon the death of Comer, both women surviving, Eliza was his widow, and, as such, is entitled to administer upon his estate. Ann has no claim either upon the estate or upon the administration, although he may have continued to cohabit with her as long as he lived. The legal right is controlled by the marriage, not by the cohabitation. Judgment affirmed.

VON POLLNITZ v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 10, 1893.)

HOMICIDE — RES GESTÆ — DYING DECLARATION — EXPERT EVIDENCE — FAILURE TO INSTRUCT ON DEGREES OF HOMICIDE — REMARKS OF COUNSEL.

1. What the deceased said at the door of the room in which she was beaten, on coming out immediately after the beating took place, was admissible in evidence as a part of the res gestæ.

2. The sayings of the deceased, admitted as dying declarations, and not objected to at the trial, were properly received. This court, in the absence of anything showing the contrary, will presume that the trial judge did his duty in passing upon the admissibility of such evidence as a preliminary question, before allowing it to go to the jury.

3. A practicing physician is presumptively competent to give evidence as an expert touching the probable effect of wounds such as other witnesses describe, with reference to their adequacy and tendency to produce death. No question was raised as to whether the examination should have been on a hypothetical, rather than on the actual, case.

4. The evidence showing that the manner of inflicting the mortal wounds was by striking, throwing down, and stamping upon the deceased,—she being a woman probably in a pregnant condition, and her assailant being her husband,—and there being no provocation shown, and no mitigating circumstances, and he, in his statement to the court and jury, denying that he used any violence, the failure of the court to charge the jury upon the law of manslaughter, voluntary or involuntary, was not error.

5. That the solicitor general used grossly improper language touching the defendant, in his argument to the jury, is not cause for a new trial; no objection being made thereto by the accused or his counsel at the time, and no ruling of the court thereon being invoked or made.

6. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Decatur county; B. B. Bower, Judge.

J. R. Von Pollnitz was convicted of murder, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

Frank Harrell and A. H. Russell, for plaintiff in error. W. N. Spence, Sol. Gen., and J. M. Terrell, Atty. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The deadly assault was made in a closed room in a boarding house,—the room occupied by Von Pollnitz and his wife,—and though some of the blows, as well as the outcry of the wife, were heard by one or more of the witnesses, there was no eyewitness to the infliction of the blows. Immediately after the beating took place, the door of the room was opened, and the wife, on emerging from it, made certain declarations, which were admitted in evidence. These declarations were a part of the res gestæ, and as such were competent evidence.

2. Certain sayings of the deceased were admitted as dying declarations. They were not objected to, and seem to have been properly received. It is contended that the trial judge did not pass upon their admissibility, as a preliminary question, before allowing them to go to the jury. It does not affirmatively appear that he did or did not. It was his duty to do it, and we cannot presume that he failed to perform that duty properly and faithfully.

3. A practicing physician was allowed to give in evidence his opinion as an expert touching the probable effect of wounds such as other witnesses described, though he had never seen or examined the wounds himself. He gave his opinion with reference to their adequacy and tendency to produce death. It appearing that he was a practicing physician, he was a competent witness to form and express an opinion upon this subject as an expert. The examination should have been on a hypothetical, rather than on the actual, case. But no question was raised as to this point; his competency, and not the mode of his examination, being the matter raised by objection, and submitted to the court for decision.

4. It is complained that the court gave no instruction to the jury touching the law of manslaughter, voluntary or involuntary. The manner of inflicting the mortal wounds was, according to a fair, if not a necessary, inference from the facts in evidence, by striking, throwing down, and stamping upon the deceased, who was at the time, probably, in a pregnant condition. There could be no voluntary manslaughter without some provocation, and there was not the slightest evidence of any provocation whatever, and the accused did not set up or pretend that there was anything involuntary either in the blows or in their effect. He neither proved nor stated anything in mitigation, but in his statement to the court and jury denied that he used any violence. It did not appear, and was not suggested, that any other person was in the room, by whom the injuries to the wife could or might have been inflicted. If they were the cause of her death, which occurred shortly thereafter, although there might be a guess or conjecture that the killing was involuntary, yet, unless there had been some evidence or some statement of the prisoner tending to show that it was so in fact, or unless that defense had in some way been set up or insisted upon, instead of being wholly negatived by the prisoner's statement, we cannot rule that the trial judge was bound, as matter of law, to submit any question concerning it to the jury. We do not say that it would have been unlawful for him to do so, if such a course had been dictated by his own conscience, but we are clear that the law did not impose it upon him as an official duty.

5. The language imputed to the solicitor general as having been used in his argument to the jury touching the defendant was grossly improper, but no objection was made thereto by the accused or his counsel at the time, and no ruling thereon by the court was invoked or made. This being so, it was not cause for a new trial.

6. The impression made by the transcript of the record, taken as a whole, is that the accused was indiscreet and unwise, both in conduct and expression, while his trial was in progress, and that, owing to the youth and inexperience of the zealous and faithful young gentlemen who were assigned by the court to act as his counsel, he was not defended with the tact and skill which older and more experienced counsel might have brought to bear in his behalf, yet we can discover no reason for holding that the conviction was illegal or improper. The evidence, if it did not require, certainly warranted, the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

BOHANAN v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 14, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—EVIDENCE—CONFESSION.

1. On the trial of an indictment for a misdemeanor, a witness for the state having testified to a confession by the accused, and having detailed the circumstances under which it was made, which circumstances consisted of detecting him in the criminal act, of a consequent threat to prosecute, and an attempt by the accused to bribe him not to prosecute, and the confession having then been repeated in the presence and hearing of another witness, the subsequent testimony of the first witness that he extorted the confession should, in the absence of all further explanation, and when there was no motion made to withdraw the confession from the jury, be interpreted as a mere conclusion of the witness' mind upon the legal effect of the circumstances which he had before detailed under which the confession was made. These circumstances were not sufficient to render the confession incompetent as evidence to be considered by the jury.

2. The evidence warranted the verdict, and the motion for a new trial was properly denied. (Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Carroll county; S. W. Harris, Judge.

Dick Bohanan was convicted of a misdemeanor, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Affirmed.

G. W. Austin and Cobb & Bro., for plaintiff in error. T. A. Atkinson, Sol. Gen., by Reid & Stewart, for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. After the witness stated as a part of his testimony that he extorted the confession, there was no motion made to withdraw from the jury the confession or the testimony which the same witness had previously given concerning it. At the time this previous testimony was received it appeared to be legal, for nothing was then, or had been, disclosed which could suggest that the confession was not freely and voluntarily made. On the contrary, it was shown that the accused had repeated it in the presence and hearing of another witness, thus confessing twice,—once to the person who had threatened to prosecute him, and again to that person and the other witness, these two being together when the confession was repeated. Is it erroneous to allow evidence to remain before the jury when no reason for excluding it appeared until after it was received, and no motion to withdraw it is made at any time? Must the court, without any request from the accused or his counsel, withdraw evidence which has been legally admitted, if subsequent testimony discloses that it was incompetent? But should this confession have been withdrawn, even on motion, because the witness said he extorted it? We think not. The witness had previously detailed what he said and did. He detected the accused in the act, threatened to prosecute him, and rejected a bribe which the accused offered him to induce him not to prosecute. Was there any extortion in this? Surely not. There was no invitation to confess, no threat to prosecute if he did not confess, no appeal to either hope or fear to induce a confession. No confession was suggested or mentioned. No reference was made to the subject, either expressly or by implication. If any fear or hope calculated or having any tendency to prompt a confession arose in the mind of the accused, it was of his own creation. An unconditional threat to prosecute for an offense has no natural tendency to induce a confession, but rather the contrary; and the hope implied in the offer of a bribe, the offer being unsolicited, has its origin in the thoughts of him who makes the offer, and is not chargeable to him who rejects it. If a man rears a crop of hope in his own mind from seeds of his own planting, and under its influence makes a confession, this will not exclude the confession as evidence. The hope that excludes is that, and that only, which some other person kindles or excites. Some inducement must be held out by another person, tending, according to human nature and the law of human motives, either to overpower the will or seduce it, either to coerce through fear, or persuade through hope. It seems to us that the right and only construction to be put on what the witness testified as to extorting the confession is that this was a conclusion of his own mind, drawn from the facts which he had detailed, the principal fact being that he had threatened to prosecute. Doubtless he supposed that a threat to prosecute amounted in law to extortion, but in this he was mistaken. Why he was not called upon to explain what he really meant does not appear, and we are unable to conjecture. Had a motion been made to withdraw the confession from the jury, very likely some explanation would have been elicited.

2. There was no lack of evidence to warrant the verdict, but rather a surfeit of evidence. Judgment affirmed.

WHEELLESS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 14, 1893.)

CRIMINAL LAW—REMARKS OF COUNSEL.—FAILURE TO CHARGE ON DEFENDANT'S STATEMENT.

1. Where the solicitor general, in examining a witness, makes an irrelevant or improper remark, and is reproved by the court for it, and thereupon apologizes, there is no cause for a new trial. Nor is a remark made by him to the jury, on which no ruling of the court appears or was invoked, cause for a new trial.

2. In charging the jury on the prisoner's statement, the court should give all the provisions of the statute; and, if one of them be casually omitted, attention should be called thereto by counsel, so that the omission can be supplied. Failure to complain until after verdict is not correct practice. In order to have a charge of the court reviewed, the matter complained of must be set out in the motion for a new trial, or in the bill of exceptions.

3. The evidence warranted the verdict, and there was no error in denying a new trial.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Oglethorpe county; J. H. Guerry, Judge.

Hardy Wheelless was convicted on a criminal indictment, and, a new trial having been denied, he brings error. Affirmed.

W. G. Johnson and Thomas & Strickland, for plaintiff in error. W. M. Howard, Sol. Gen., by J. H. Lumpkin, for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. For his first impropriety the solicitor general was reproved by the court, and he made a prompt and public apology. In all probability, this counteracted and corrected any effect, harmful to the accused, which that impropriety was calculated to produce on the jury. His second impropriety was passed sub silentia until the trial was over. The wait was too long. Nobody complained, the court's attention was not called to it, no ruling upon it was requested or made. The solicitor general erred, but we cannot say the court did,—at all events, not to such extent as to be cause for a new trial.

2. In charging the jury upon the prisoner's statement, the court omitted to say, either in the words or the sense of the statute, that they could believe the statement in preference to the sworn testimony. Of course, this ought to have been said, for the whole law of the statement should be charged. The omission was evidently by oversight, and the faintest suggestion from the able and vigilant counsel of the accused, if made in time, would have caused the court to supply the omitted words. But this would have lost the point afterwards made on the charge; and to save it was, perhaps, desirable, as matter of deliberate forethought. Counsel should aid the court, rather than seek to store up a mere lapse of this sort as ground for a new trial.

3. The evidence was sufficient, and overruling the motion for a new trial was not error. Judgment affirmed.

COOPER v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 20, 1893.)

LARCENY—VENUE—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. The evidence warranted the verdict as to both venue and the commission of the offense.

2. According to many authorities, the newly-discovered evidence, inasmuch as it applies to specific facts, touching which there was no evidence at the trial, would be held not to be cumulative, although the new facts have no value except as tending to establish the same defense which was in question, and touching which there was some evidence in behalf of the accused at the trial. Authorities to the contrary are numerous, but the conflict raises a serious doubt as to the true law. In view of this doubt, and because the newly-discovered evidence would, if believed by the jury, be morally certain to produce a verdict of acquittal, a new trial is ordered, so that the accused may have the benefit of this evidence. Mathews v. State, 56 Ga. 469.

Error from superior court, Hancock county; H. McWhorter, Judge.

Thomas Cooper, having been convicted of larceny, brings error. Reversed.

T. M. Hunt and J. T. Jordan, for plaintiff in error. W. M. Howard, Sol. Gen., by J. H. Lumpkin, for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. Though the evidence as to the fact of larceny by the accused, and also as to whether the scene of it was in Hancock county, was circumstantial, we think it was fully sufficient to warrant an affirmative finding on both questions, if the jury failed to credit the testimony in behalf of the accused, as they must have done in order to reach a verdict of guilty. Nothing but the newly-discovered evidence is suggestive of any legal merit whatever in the motion for a new trial.

2. In consequence of the wide range of investigation, and the thorough course of study, into which the writer was led by the exigencies of this one case, he feels prepared to produce a treatise on cumulative evidence, and yet he is quite unprepared for the minor and more moderate task of writing a judicial opinion on the subject. The exact truth is that, though he well knows what cumulative evidence is, he does not know what evidence is cumulative. He can define, but cannot distinguish. Of course, this statement is meant to be taken literally in rare instances only. Perhaps, in the great mass of instances, there is no real difficulty in discriminating evidence which is merely cumulative from that which is not so. According to many authorities, the newly-discovered evidence in the present case was not cumulative, because it relates to specific facts, touching which there was no evidence at the trial. Many other authorities would treat it as cumulative, because the new facts have no value except as tending to prove and establish the same identical defense which the accused set up at the trial, and touching which he not only adduced some evidence, but enough to clear him, if the jury had given it credit. There is a doubt, consequent upon this conflict, and we are not sure how the doubt ought to be solved. Of one thing, however, we are morally certain, which is that the new evidence would and ought to produce a verdict of acquittal, if it is submitted to a jury, and the jury believe it. We are impressed with the belief from the record, as a whole, that this man is probably innocent, and that he ought to have the benefit of this new evidence. Using our power of direction, as was done in Mathews v. State, 56 Ga. 469, we direct that the case be tried over. Judgment reversed.

FAULK v. CENTRAL RAILROAD & BANKING CO.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 20, 1893.)

ACCIDENTS AT RAILROAD CROSSINGS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Though a boy 12 or 13 years of age may have capacity to know that it is dangerous to climb over the bumpers of a standing freight train having a locomotive attached to it, yet where the train obstructs a public crossing contrary to a city ordinance, and the flagman stationed by the railway company to guard the crossing and tell the public when to cross, and when not, invites such a boy, who has been delayed by a standing train, to cross over the bumpers, it is not negligence in the boy to act on the invitation, inasmuch as he might well assume that the flagman had assured himself the train would stand still long enough for the invitation to be complied with safely. It was consequently error to charge the jury: "If you further believe he had the capacity I have just described, [capacity to know the danger of crossing between the cars,] and had the capacity and intelligence to understand the risks, and to know the danger of going between the cars that had the engine attached to them, and with that knowledge the flagman of the company suggested to him to go, or directed him to go across, and he, with that knowledge of his own, acted still on the flagman's suggestion, he would not be entitled to recover."

Error from superior court, Bibb county; A. L. Miller, Judge.

Action by Freddie Faulk against the Central Railroad & Banking Company for personal injuries. There was judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Hardeman & Nottingham, for plaintiff in error. R. F. Lyon, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. In charging the jury as quoted in the headnote, the court assumed that it would be negligence in the boy to climb over the bumpers and pass between the cars at the flagman's suggestion, if the boy had capacity to know the danger, and the intelligence to understand the risk of so doing. If the court referred to the risk and danger which would have been incurred had the flagman said nothing to invite or encourage the boy to climb over the bumpers and pass between the cars, this instruction was irrelevant to the hypothesis with which the court was dealing; and if the reference was to risk and danger which might be expected to attend such an act when done under the prompting of the flagman, the doctrine of the charge is wholly unsound, for little or no danger whatever was reasonably to be expected on account of changing the train from a state of rest to a state of motion before sufficient time had elapsed for doing that by the boy which the flagman suggested to be done. As the flagman was stationed by the railway company to guard the crossing, and tell the public when to cross and when not, the boy, whatever his capacity might have been, could well assume that the train would stand still long enough for the suggestion or invitation to be complied with safely, and that the flagman knew or had ascertained with adequate certainty that it would do so. To say the least, it was a question for the jury whether the boy, who was only 12 or 13 years of age, acted rashly or otherwise in not judging of the situation for himself, and in not deciding that what the flagman's suggestion implied could safely be done was too hazardous to be undertaken. The jury might have come to the conclusion which we have above indicated, namely, that, with the lights before him, the boy had good ground for thinking that he took little or no risk whatever in attempting to pass between the cars at the time and in the manner which the flagman had indicated. They might conclude, also, that as the flagman was probably a grown man, and was probably familiar with his business, the boy was not to blame, even if his own opinion differed from that implied in the suggestion made to him, since it is not uncommon for men, to say nothing of boys, to yield their own opinion, and govern their conduct by that of others having more wisdom and experience than themselves. As a question of probability, the chances are very many that the flagman knew much better than the boy whether it was safe at the particular time and place for the latter to proceed as he did, and it might be possible that the flagman was more surprised than the boy was by the sudden movement of the train. Judgment reversed.

THOMAS v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. Oct. 8, 1892.)

ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER—RESISTING ILLEGAL ARREST—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The drunkenness, if any, being voluntary, and no request being made to charge anything on the subject, it was not error, as against the accused, for the court to omit any reference to section 4301 of the Code, or to its provisions touching drunkenness as an excuse for crime.

2. Generally, the killing of an officer or other person to prevent an illegal arrest is not murder, but manslaughter. Consequently, shooting at him for the same purpose, without killing him, is prima facie not an assault with intent to murder.

3. The evidence of the policeman being that he was called to arrest the accused by an old woman who keeps a boarding house on the corner of Oak and Third streets, whose name he did not know or had forgotten; that she stated to him the accused had broken in her trunk, and taken twenty-nine dollars and a few cents and a coat; that she described him, and said she wished the policeman to look out for him; and that this was about three hours after the property had been stolen,—it was error to charge the jury, upon the trial of the accused for an assault with intent to murder by shooting at the policeman while the latter was endeavoring to arrest him without a warrant, thus: "If you believe from the evidence that the officer had been notified to look out for him as a thief, and that evening he approached to arrest him, and the defendant fled before the officer drew the weapon, and without endeavoring to attack the defendant in any way, the defendant, while fleeing, and the officer pursuing, drew the pistol, fired upon him, and you believe the pistol was a weapon, likely to produce death, you would be authorized to convict him of assault with intent to murder." This charge assumes that the facts enumerated would constitute probable cause for making the arrest without a warrant, whereas they might or might not, and whether they would or would not would be for determination by the jury in the light of all the circumstances attending the case, including the facilities for obtaining a warrant according to the spirit of section 4723 of the Code.

4. One who, on seeing an officer approach, takes to flight, and continues to fly, has no right to express information that the purpose of the officer is to arrest him. To entitle him to receive such information, he should not put and keep himself beyond the officer's reach.

5. The court erred in not granting a new trial.

Error from superior court, Bibb county; A. L. Miller, Judge.

Will Thomas was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and from an order denying a new trial he brings error. Reversed.

John R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. W. H. Felton, Jr., Sol. Gen., for the State.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. If the accused was drunk, his drunkenness was voluntary, and was, therefore, no excuse. Code, § 4301. The jury would know whether, under all the circumstances, the intoxication would throw any light on intention to kill; and, there being no request to charge on the subject, the omission to do so was not error. Certainly it was not error as against the accused. Generally, a drunken man would not be less likely to intend his shot to kill than a sober one, but rather more so.

2. The evidence indicates that the offense for which the policeman was endeavoring to arrest the accused when the shooting occurred was larceny of money and property from the house. If this was the offense, and if the effects stolen were of less value than $50, the arrest contemplated was not for a felony, but for a misdemeanor only. The policeman had no warrant, nor was the offense committed in his presence. This being so, he had no legal authority to make any arrest, unless it was reasonably proper to do so in order to prevent a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant. Code, § 4723. With ample time and opportunity to obtain a warrant after he was informed of the offense, and before he commenced looking out for the offender, the policeman had no right to proceed without it. He could not attempt an illegal arrest, even for a real crime, and then justify the attempt on the ground that the person sought to be arrested would not stand still until the arrest was made, but ran away to avoid it. To call this endeavoring to escape, and to treat it as legalizing what would otherwise be an illegal arrest, would be going round in a circle. Every man, however guilty, has a right to shun an illegal arrest by flight. The exercise of this right should not, and would not, subject him to be arrested as a fugitive. A policeman stands upon the footing of those public officers, such as sheriffs or constables, whose duty it is to make arrests. Generally, it is not murder, but manslaughter, to kill an officer or other person to prevent an illegal arrest. 1 East, P. C. 310; 1 Russ. Crimes,

*708, *803; 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 414; Roberts v. State, 14 Mo. 138; Jones v. State, Id. 409; Com. v. Drew, 4 Mass. 396; Com. v. Carey, 12 Cush. 246; Com. v. McLaughlin, Id. 615; Rafferty v. People, 69 Ill. 111, 72 Ill. 37. There can be no assault with intent to murder where the homicide, if committed as intended, would be only manslaughter. Consequently, shooting at an officer without killing him, if done to prevent an illegal arrest, is prima facie not an assault with intent to murder, but the statutory crime of shooting at another, described in section 4370 of the Code.

3. No one who properly appreciates the sacredness of personal liberty, and the jealousy of the law in guarding the same, can doubt that, as a general rule, the law requires a warrant in order to render an arrest legal, whether it be made by a policeman or any public officer. Only three exceptions to this rule are recognized by the Code. See section 4723. The first is where an offense is committed in the officer's presence; the second, where the offender is endeavoring to escape; and the third, where from other cause there is likely to be a failure of justice for want of an officer to issue a warrant. Where an arrest for a past offense is intended, and there is no present emergency, no want of time or opportunity for obtaining a warrant, why should a policeman be allowed to dispense with a warrant when other officers of the law could not? Any information as to the commission of an offense which would serve as a reasonable basis for making an arrest would serve for suing out a warrant. The policeman could himself apply for and obtain it if the injured party or other person giving information declined to do so, since the affidavit required to obtain a warrant need not charge the offense absolutely and without qualification, but only to the best of the affiant's knowledge and belief. Code, § 4715. In the present case the evidence indicates that there may have been, and probably was, no just reason for failing to procure a warrant, and for attempting an arrest without it. The testimony of the policeman himself, as summarized in the third headnote, suggests to our minds that there was no probable cause for making an arrest without a warrant, there having been ample time to apply for it, and, so far as appears, no obstacle to obtaining it. Whether, under all the circumstances, including the facilities for obtaining a warrant according to the spirit of section 4723 of the Code above cited, there was or was not cause for attempting the arrest without a warrant, was a question for the jury; and it was therefore error for the court to assume that the facts enumerated in the charge would constitute such cause. For this error a new trial is necessary. In Johnson v. State, 30 Ga. 426, the power discussed is that of arresting for a felony. In Johnson v. Mayor, 46 Ga. 80, the arrest was made for a breach of the peace committed in presence of the policeman. In Harrell v. State, 75 Ga. 842, the attempt to arrest was made while the offender was in the act of flight from the scene of the offense, and about to cross the line of the state. One of the policemen was making pursuit, and called upon his fellow for assistance.

4. An arresting officer is not bound to disclose his purpose before getting near enough to make the capture. It would be absurd for him to give warning in order to prevent flight, when so doing would only tend to provoke it. No doubt the accused knew well enough that the policeman intended to arrest him; but, if he did not, the way to obtain the information was not to put and keep himself out of reach, but to wait for a closer approach. No right to shoot the policeman, or to shoot at him, resulted from failure of the latter to give express notice of his purpose. Judgment reversed.

WATSON v. RICHMOND & D. R. CO.

ACTION AGAINST LESSEE OF RAILROAD — PLEADINGS—JURISDICTIONAL AVERMENTS—INJURIES TO EMPLOYEE.

1. It is competent for the general assembly to make the residence of a lessee corporation for the purposes of suit the same as that which the lessor corporation had when the relation of lessor and lessee originated. By section 3407 of the Code, the lessee or person or corporation having possession of a railroad is liable to suit in the same court or jurisdiction as was the lessor or owner before the lease. A declaration which names the defendant corporation as lessee of a specified railroad, and which indicates that the defendant is in possession and operating the road, is to be construed as seeking to charge the defendant in its character as lessee, though no lease be set out or expressly alleged.

2. As the statute virtually makes the county of the principal office or place of business of the lessor before the lease the county of the principal office or place of business of the lessee, a declaration against the lessee, alleging that its principal office within this state is in the county where the suit is brought, shows jurisdiction over the person of the lessee, though the latter be a foreign corporation.

3. The lessee of a line of railroad partly within this state and partly within the state of Alabama is subject to suit here by an employee for a personal injury sustained in Alabama while engaged in his duties as an employee upon the line.

Error from city court of Atlanta; T. P. Westmoreland, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by Gabe Watson against the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company. Plaintiff was injured in the state of Alabama, while in the performance of his duties as brakeman on defendant's road. From a judgment dismissing the action for want of jurisdiction, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Reid & Stewart, for plaintiff in error. Jackson & Jackson, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. By the constitution, the county in which a defendant is subject to be sued is ordinarily that in which he resides, and no other. Code, § 5172. But a person may be a resident of two or more counties at the same time. Code, § 1691. Where a railroad is not confined to one county, but extends from one to others, so as to be partly in several, the owner may, relatively to causes of action arising out of or connected with operating it, be treated by the legislature as residing in each of the several counties in which the road is located. This has been done to a limited extent by certain provisions of the Code. Sections 712, 3406. Where the owner is a domestic corporation, the general rule of law that it resides also where its principal office or place of business is situated still prevails. The corporation has this common-law residence for general purposes, in conjunction with the superadded statutory residences for special purposes which the Code ascribes to it. By making it a resident of each and every county in which the road is located, for the purpose of certain specified suits brought against it, the Code does not make it cease to be a resident of the county in which its principal office or place of business is located, for all purposes whatsoever, including the same classes of suits which, by reason of the special enactment may be brought against it elsewhere. The qualified residences do not absorb or obliterate the unqualified one, either wholly or partially. They merely supplement, without otherwise affecting it. In this state there is certainly legislative competency to establish this composite system of residence for all railroad corporations which the general assembly has chartered. It follows, obviously, that there is like competency to make the residence of a lessee corporation, for the purposes of suit, the same as that which the lessor corporation had when the relation of lessor and lessee originated. This has been done by the act of April 17, 1863, (Acts 1862-63, p. 161, Code, § 3407,) which declares that "the lessees of any railroad, or the person, or persons, or company having possession of the same, shall be liable to suit of any kind in the same court or jurisdiction as the lessors or owners of the railroad were before the lease." We are now to inquire, first, whether the declaration in the present case shows on its face that the suit is against a lessee corporation. No lease is set out or expressly alleged, but the defendant is thus described: "The Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, lessees of the Georgia Pacific Railway Company, a corporation existing by law." Besides this, the general tenor of the declaration indicates that the defendant is in possession of the Georgia Pacific Railway, and engaged in operating the same. These data are certainly too meager to amount to good pleading, but, as against a mere motion to dismiss the action, we think the declaration can and should be construed as seeking to charge the defendant in its character as lessee from the Georgia Pacific Railway Company. We can discern what the pleader intended, though, with that perverse and unaccountable repugnance to full and accurate expression which seems to prevail widely at the Georgia bar, he has only vaguely suggested, rather than plainly declared, what was in his mind. Why counsel should be so reluctant to frame their pleadings carefully and correctly is to us an impenetrable mystery.

2. We are to inquire, secondly, whether the declaration shows on its face, either expressly or by fair inference, that the principal office or place of business of the Georgia Pacific Railway Company was, before the lease, in Fulton county. If the courts of that county then had jurisdiction of that company, the lessor, they now, by virtue of the statute, have jurisdiction of the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company, the lessee. The city court of Atlanta, in which the action was brought, is one of the courts of Fulton county at large; its jurisdiction extending over all residents of the county, and not being confined to residents of the city. The declaration describes the defendant as "having an office and agent and doing business in said state and county;" and by an amendment it adds that "said defendant corporation had at the time of the filing of said suit its principal office in said state, in said county." In the usual manner, the declaration opens with the state and county, thus: "State of Georgia, Fulton county." It is quite silent as to any office or place of business of the Georgia Pacific Railway Company before the lease, or at any other time; but that the principal office of that company was, before the lease, in Fulton county, is sufficiently apparent from the allegation that "said defendant corporation had at the time of the filing of said suit its principal office in said state, in said county." The statute which we have quoted virtually makes the county of the principal office of the lessor corporation before the lease the county of the principal office of the lessee after the lease. Consequently, when either the one or the other is ascertained, both are known, for they are one and the same. Can a corporation, the lessee of a railroad, admit that it is sued in the county in which its own principal office within this state is located, and yet contend that the proper court, or one of the proper courts, of that county, has no jurisdiction over it? We should say it is subject to suit in that county, prima facie so at least, whether it be a domestic or a foreign corporation. If, as lessee, it could locate its principal office elsewhere than in the county in which the lessor's principal office was located before the lease, there is certainly no presumption that it has so done. Any principal office which it has beyond this state counts for nothing, since, under the scheme and policy of our law, if it exercises franchises granted by Georgia, it is subject to suit here, the same as the corporation to which the franchises were granted would be if no lease had been made. In fact, the Richmond & Danville Railroad Company is a foreign corporation, but this makes no difference in the present case.

3. The declaration is in many respects lamentably meager and deficient. It does not even allege that the Georgia Pacific Railway is located partly in Georgia and partly in Alabama, but that this is so is matter of common knowledge and general public information. We can therefore notice the fact judicially. The plaintiff was injured while engaged in the performance of his duties as an employe of the defendant, he being a brakeman upon a freight train run on the line of the leased road. The injury took place in Alabama, and for that reason it is contended that the defendant, a foreign corporation, is not subject to suit here by an action in personam. The case of Bawknicht v. Insurance Co., 55 Ga. 194, is relied upon in support of this contention. We distinguish this case from that by the fact that operating the line of road in both states was not carrying on a separate and disconnected business in each state, but the very contrary. It is fairly probable that by one and the same contract the plaintiff was employed to perform services in both states upon each trip which his duties required him to make. At all events, it does not affirmatively appear, either by express averment or by the nature of the business, that there was any separate outfit or agency for the work of running trains in Alabama, or, if there was, that the superintendence of these operations did not belong to officers or agents located in Georgia. It seems to us manifest that the lessee of a continuous line of railway is liable to suit by an employe for an injury sustained by him anywhere on the line while engaged in his duties, and that the suit may be brought at the general residence of the lessee corporation in this state in all such cases, without respect to whether the scene of the injury was within the state or beyond its limits. The court erred in dismissing the action, on motion, for the want of jurisdiction. Judgment reversed.

WAPPOO MILLS v. COMMERCIAL GUANO CO.

CONTRACT OF SALE—BREACH—DAMAGES—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. The purchaser of goods cannot recover of the seller damages for nondelivery, measured by his profits on a particular contract of resale and by his losses on account of inability to perform that contract, unless the seller at the time of making the contract of sale had notice of such contract of resale. In the present case there was no evidence of notice. It was therefore error to charge the jury thus: "You have the right to include what it may have been compelled to pay out, or what it may have lost in the way of profit, if it be shown to you in figures what such payment or loss is."

2. In a motion for a new trial, a complaint of the charge of the court in these terms: "The court erred in its charge as to the next following clauses as to the telegrams which passed in regard to shipment of the thirty tons,—same being a question for the jury,—the illustrations tending to confuse the jury on the point, and should not have been given in charge; said telegrams, along with all testimony on said point, being exclusively for the jury under the issue,"—does not state what the charge was, and consequently is not for adjudication by the supreme court.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from Savannah city court; W. D. Harden, Judge.

Action for breach of contract by the Commercial Guano Company against the Wappoo Mills. There was judgment for plaintiff, and a new trial denied. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

Garrard & Meldrim, for plaintiff in error.
Charlton & Mackall, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. We feel constrained to reverse the judgment for error in that part of the charge of the court to the jury which instructed thus: "You have the right to include what it may have been compelled to pay out, or what it may have lost in the way of profit, if it be shown to you in figures what such payment or loss is." The pronoun "it," as first used, and then repeated in this quotation, refers to the Commercial Guano Company, the plaintiff in the court below; and the profit mentioned as recoverable has reference not merely to any difference between the contract price and a higher one which the commodity would have brought in market when the breach occurred, but to the profit the company would have realized on a particular contract of resale which it had made, and which the breach sued for prevented it from fulfilling. And the phrase, "what it may have been compelled to pay out," has reference to the amount which the company was required to pay and did pay to its own vendee in the contract of resale, by reason of its inability to perform that contract, in consequence of nonperformance by the Wappoo Mills of its contract with the company. There was no evidence showing, or tending to show, that the Wappoo Mills had, at the time of making its contract with the company, any notice of any particular contract of resale which the company had made or would make. Nothing appears which would justify the assumption that the profits or losses resulting, or which might result, from any particular resale, were in the contemplation of the parties, so as to make these the measure of damages, rather than that measure which the law prescribes in ordinary cases where a contract for the sale and delivery of goods is made and broken. Commercial fertilizers have long been a commodity of general commerce, and there would seem to be no reason why damages for the breach of a contract of sale of which they are the subject-matter should not be measured with reference to market price at the time and place appointed for delivery, instead of the price which a particular purchaser from the first purchaser might agree to pay. The general rule is that one who, by his contract, is entitled to have goods, not yet paid for, delivered to him at a particular time and place, is compensated for his disappointment when he is allowed the difference between the price at which he purchased and the market price of the article in the market of delivery. This rule excludes any reference to a particular sale, except in so far as it may be evidence of the market price; and it wholly excludes any addition to the damages by reason of payments, voluntary or involuntary, made on contracts of resale, as the result of a breach thereof occasioned by an antecedent breach of the original contract of sale.

2. Instructions so vaguely and inadequately stated as those referred to in the second headnote cannot be reviewed. Complaint of them in a motion for a new trial, without setting them out more fully and distinctly, presents nothing for adjudication by the supreme court. Judgment reversed.

BALDWIN v. MARQUEZE et al.

CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—BREACH—DAMAGES.

1. By the correspondence between the parties, a contract was entered into which contemplated a continuance of business for the season of 1890, of the same kind which had been previously carried on, to wit, the procurement of orders for merchandise upon the usual credit, and not for cash only; the new feature being that plaintiff was to be compensated for his services by a specified commission on the amount of such orders, instead of by a salary.

2. It was a breach of the contract for the defendants to withdraw the power to take orders for credit sales, and restrict the plaintiff to the procurement of orders for cash sales only. As this breach would result naturally, or most probably, in a material reduction of the plaintiff's compensation, he was justified in discontinuing his services, and in declining to execute the contract on his part.

3. By the breach above referred to, the plaintiff had a cause of action for all the damages which he sustained thereby. His damages were not speculative, nor too remote, and the evidence warranted the verdict as to amount. The court erred in granting a new trial.

Error from superior court, Clarke county; N. L. Hutchins, Judge.

Action by F. S. Baldwin against Marquese & Varney for breach of contract of employment. There was a verdict for plaintiff, and a new trial awarded. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Lumpkin & Burnett, for plaintiff in error. Barrow & Thomas, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. The correspondence between the parties, reading it all together, concluded a contract for the continuance of business by Baldwin as drummer or traveling salesman for the firm, for the season of 1890; and the business contemplated was of the same kind as that previously carried on, which was the procurement of orders for merchandise upon the usual credit, not for cash only. One new feature, and but one, was introduced: the compensation of Baldwin was to be a specified commission on the orders he procured, and not a fixed salary, as it had previously been.

2. It was necessarily implied in the contract that Baldwin should have and retain power to take the class of orders which the contract contemplated until the season of 1890 closed. When this power was withdrawn, and he was restricted to soliciting and receiving cash orders only, the contract was broken. Because of this breach, he was justified in withdrawing from the business, and declining to execute the contract on his part. Such cutting down of his power would be almost sure to result in a very material reduction of orders, and thereby curtail his compensation. This would be a natural—certainly, a most probable—consequence, for it is matter of common information that, in mercantile business, cash orders plus credit orders would amount generally to very much more than cash orders alone.

3. It would be a reproach to the law if one seriously injured by a breach of contract could not recover therefor all the damages which he actually sustains. Under our Code, no such defect in the law of damages exists, whatever may be infirmities of other legal systems. The damages recovered in this case were neither speculative nor too remote, nor were they excessive in amount. No error was committed, for which a new trial ought to be granted, and the court erred in granting the motion. The verdict must stand. Judgment reversed.

CLAFLIN et al. v. BALLANCE et al.

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—MORTGAGE BY DEBTOR TO CREDITOR—DECLARATIONS OF MORTGAGEE'S AGENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. In a contest between the mortgagee of an insolvent debtor and other creditors who attack the mortgage as fraudulent, acts and declarations of the debtor tending to prove fraudulent intent and motive on his part may be received in evidence for this purpose only, though such acts and declarations were subsequent to the execution, or even to the foreclosure, of the mortgage. They would, however, not affect the mortgagee without some evidence to connect him with the fraud of the mortgagor at or prior to the execution of the mortgage, either by actual participation or by having notice or grounds for reasonable suspicion.

2. Declarations of the mortgagee's agent, who represented him in taking the mortgage, if made not at the time of its execution, but after its foreclosure, and while an official sale under it was in progress, the declarations not being pertinent to any business of the principal in which the agent was engaged at the time of making them, but only by way of recital either of what the agent had known or suspected, or of what he then knew or suspected, would not affect the mortgagee, his principal, so as to warrant any finding based thereon against the bona fides of the mortgage.

3. The evidence being wholly insufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the mortgagee either participated in the fraud of the mortgagor or was chargeable with notice of the same, whether by reason of actual knowledge or grounds of reasonable suspicion, the court erred in not granting a new trial.

Error from superior court, Clarke county; N. L. Hutchins, Judge.

Action by Ballance & Sorrels and others against H. B. Claflin & Co. to cancel a mortgage. There was a verdict for plaintiffs, and a new trial denied. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

Lumpkin & Burnett, for plaintiffs in error. T. W. Rucker, Barrow & Thomas, A. S. Erwin, Tuck & Henley, and Thomas & Strickland, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. For a mortgage made by a debtor in favor of one of his creditors to be defeated by his fraudulent intent as against other creditors two things must be shown: First, that such fraudulent intent existed; and, second, that the mortgagee was connected with the fraud, either by participating in the intent, or by having notice of it, or grounds for reasonable suspicion. On the first of these questions, acts and declarations of the debtor, indicative of such intent, are competent evidence, without reference to whether they were known to the mortgagee or not; and to render them competent it is not necessary that all of them should have transpired at or before the execution of the mortgage, or even before its foreclosure. A scheme of fraud may manifest itself partly before and partly after the main fact. Indeed, the only decisive external circumstances capable of proof may all occur afterwards. The perpetration of a fraud rarely happens as an isolated act; it usually comprehends a course of conduct projected and pursued as means of securing the fruits of the fraud. The fraudulent mind is selfish; it wants to make something by its rascality. Acts embraced in the fraudulent scheme, and performed in carrying it out to the ultimate selfish result contemplated, belong to the res gestae of the fraud; and the same is true of any declarations accompanying these acts which tend to explain and give them character. To run down and expose an alleged fraud it is generally necessary to frame some hypothesis concerning the whole course and range of conduct which would be involved in the fraudulent scheme to render it successful. If the hypothesis, as such, be sound in itself, the next step is to ascertain by evidence whether the accomplished facts of the case conform to it. The investigation would be futile as a verification of the hypothesis were the evidence limited to a field of accomplished facts less extensive than that covered by the hypothesis. The unaccomplished facts, if any, though a necessary part of the hypothesis, could only be inferred as embraced in the projected scheme of conduct, since their nonaccomplishment would preclude proof of them as actual conduct. As evidence to establish the fraudulent intent of Hirschfield & Blumenthal, the mortgagors, in executing the mortgage to Claflin & Co., their acts and declarations connected with the hypothetical fraudulent scheme. Their acts done and declarations made at any time from the conception of the scheme down to the time of trial, would be competent; for so long as the scheme was pending, and anything remained to be done to take or to secure its fruits, it would neither be too early nor too late for them to manifest their real intention. But the effect of the evidence was properly restricted to the one purpose of convicting them of a fraudulent intent. It could not be used to prove notice on the part of Claflin & Co. of that intent, or that they had grounds for reasonably suspecting it, or that they participated in the fraud in any manner whatever. It would simply supply one of the two necessary links in the chain of evidence necessary to vitiate the mortgage; it would neither dispense with the other link nor supply any part of it.

2. The declarations made by Frank, the agent of Claflin & Co., while the official sale of the goods under the mortgage was in progress, merely asserted his own knowledge or suspicions, past and present, touching the fraudulent nature and purpose of the mortgage. He was certainly not the agent of his principals to make these declarations, for they were not pertinent nor appropriate to the transaction of any business which he was then transacting in their behalf. Surely an agent cannot destroy a mortgage by talking it to death after he has taken it, and while attending a sale which an officer is making to convert the mortgaged goods into money. Any finding against the bona fides of the mortgage, based on these declarations, would be wholly unwarranted. What Frank knew, or what he suspected on reasonable grounds of suspicion, at the time of taking the mortgage, would be imputable to his principals; but this would have to be proved by evidence other than his subsequent declarations. Any mere recital of his knowledge or suspicions by subsequent narration would not affect them. Nor would any knowledge acquired by him, or even by themselves, after the mortgage was executed and delivered, or any suspicions originating thereafter, count for anything.

3. As stated in the third headnote, the evidence was wholly insufficient on a vital part of the case, and the court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

PRINTUP et al. v. PATTON et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 27, 1893.

FERRY—LIABILITY OF OWNER FOR TORT OF FERRYMAN—EVIDENCE—PROOF OF OWNERSHIP.

1. The admissions contained in an answer of the defendant, made and filed by him in another case, are admissible in evidence against him when pertinent to a question involved in the case on trial.

2. Such admissions, together with other evidence, may show that defendant was owner of the ferry at the time the tort sued for was committed. But as the admissions related to a time a year or two previous to the tort, they alone were not sufficient to charge him as owner.

3. A receipt signed by the father of defendant, acknowledging that a sum of money had been paid to him by the administrator with the will annexed of a former owner of the ferry upon a judgment, is not relevant where the question is as to defendant's liability for a tort committed by the ferryman several years after the date of the receipt.

4. The opinion of a witness that the ferryman was not as careful as he should have been is not admissible evidence.

5. Under Code, § 690, the owner of the land on which a public ferry is situated, unless the ownership of the ferry be separated from that of the land, is liable for negligent torts committed by the ferryman in the performance of his duties as such, whether the owner object to the use of the ferry or not. In order to avoid responsibility to the public he must prevent his ferry from being used as a public ferry by a tenant of the land, or at least show that he did all in his power to prevent it.

6. One of several owners of a ferry, unless he pleads the nonjoinder of his co-owners, is liable for a negligent tort committed by the ferryman. But where there is no evidence from which the jury could possibly find such joint ownership, no charge to the jury on that subject is appropriate.

7. The appointment of an administrator with the will annexed is not necessarily void because an executor had previously been duly qualified, and letters testamentary issued to him. The executor may have resigned or been removed before the administrator was appointed.

8. Where one pays the consideration for the purchase of land, and causes the conveyance to be made to his brother, an intended gift is probable, and consequently a trust will not necessarily result.

9. The court erred in not granting a new trial.

Error from superior court, Gordon county; T. W. Milner, Judge.

Action in tort by Patton & Jackson against John C. Printup and one Talley, respectively, as owner and operator of a ferryboat. There was a verdict for plaintiffs, and a new trial denied. Defendants bring error. Reversed.

Dabney & Fouché and E. J. Kiker, for plaintiffs in error. W. K. Moore and O. N. Starr, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1, 2. As to the competency and effect of admissions made by J.

C. Printup in his answer filed in another case, the headnotes speak all that need be said.

3. The alleged tort was not committed by J. C. Printup, but by his codefendant, Talley, who was the ferryman. It was sought to hold Printup liable, if not as employer of the ferryman, as owner or part owner of the land. Whether he was such owner or not was a controverted fact. How a receipt signed by his father, in which he, the father, acknowledged payment of a sum of money on a judgment in his favor, would illustrate this question, or any other involved in the case, we are unable to see. That the defendant in the judgment paid the money and was administrator with the will annexed of J. J. Printup, who formerly owned the ferry, seems utterly immaterial. What connection did the judgment, or the payment or the receipt, or Printup's father, have with the ferry or the land on which it was situated? None whatever, so far as appears. The receipt was several years older than the tort complained of.

4. Jury, not witness, ought to determine whether the ferryman was as careful as he should have been. Negligence is a question of fact dependent upon other facts. Witnesses supply the latter, and from them the jury infer the former, when the inference can properly be drawn.

5. The Code, § 690, reads thus: "Any proprietor of any bridge, ferry, turnpike, or causeway, whether by charter or prescription or without, or whether by right of owning the lands on the stream, are bound to prompt and faithful attention to all their duties as such; and, if any damage shall occur by reason of nonattendance, neglect, carelessness, or bad conduct, he is bound for all damages, even if over and beyond the amount of any bond that may be given." We construe this section as stated in the fifth headnote. Where ownership of the ferry is separated from that of the land, the owner of the latter has no control over keeping the ferry open, using it, or the manner of its use; but where he owns the ferry as well as the land, he must keep it closed, or take the consequences. He must at least do all in his power to prevent any tenant of the land from using it as a public ferry. The policy of the statute is to protect the public against injuries by careless or incompetent ferrymen who may be too indigent to respond in damages. Another object is to make it easy for strangers and wayfaring men to ascertain whom to sue in case they are injured. The name and residence of the particular ferryman in whose charge the ferryboat was when the injury was sustained might be hard to prove, but to whom the ferry or the adjacent lands belonged would generally be widely known in the neighborhood, and readily established. We say this would generally be so, though in the present case the reverse seems to be true.

6. It must be conceded that, where ownership of the ferry or the land is the sole ground of liability, and such ownership is in two or more persons jointly, they should all be joined as defendants in the action. But the nonjoinder, unless pleaded in abatement, would not defeat a recovery. In the present case, however, there was no adequate evidence of joint ownership, and no charge to the jury on that subject was appropriate.

7. It did not affirmatively appear that the executor of J. J. Printup, deceased, though still living, had not resigned or been removed before Forsyth was appointed administrator with the will annexed. The fact of Forsyth's appointment by the court of ordinary, which had jurisdiction of the subject-matter, implied that there was a vacancy in the office of executor, since, were there not a vacancy, no occasion for such an appointment would have existed. That court, being one of general jurisdiction touching the administration of estates, testate and intestate, every presumption is in favor of the regularity and validity of its judgments. Nothing appeared to impeach this one, save the previous qualification of the executor, and the issuing to him of letters testamentary. There was no necessary inconsistency between the two representations of the same estate, one succeeding the other, though the first representative was not yet dead. Had it been shown that he had not vacated the office when Forsyth was appointed, that would have branded the appointment as void.

8. As between husband and wife, parent and child, brother and brother, or sister and sister, payment of the purchase money of land by one of the correlatives, and causing the conveyance to be made to the other, will generally suggest an intention to make a gift. This may or may not prevent a resulting trust, according to the circumstances of the particular transaction. Certainly a trust for the benefit of the one paying the money does not necessarily result.

9. We are clearly of opinion that the court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

THOMAS v. FUNKHOUSER.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 3, 1893.)

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—RIGHTS INTER SE—BREACH OF DUTY BY AGENT—BURDEN OF PROOF

By the law of this state (Code, § 2794) a contract of insurance must be in writing, though the writing need not be delivered if in other respects the contract is consummated. Where it is not delivered, an agent whose duty it is to keep the property of his principal insured is under obligation to see that in other respects the contract is consummated; and, on being sued for a breach of duty, the burden of proving that it was in fact consummated is on him. If he seeks to show this by evidence of a local custom, whereby it was the practice of insurance companies to renew any policy about to expire by sending out a new policy shortly before the expiration of the former one, and presenting a bill for the premium within a month or two after such expiration, the burden is on him to establish that this custom was complied with in the particular instance. If a new policy, though written up in the company's office, was never sent out, nor any bill for premium presented, nor any premium paid or tendered, and if the premises were destroyed by fire long after the usual time for thus consummating a renewal contract had elapsed, the agent is liable.

Error from city court of Floyd; W. T. Turnbull, Judge.

Action by E. C. Thomas against Samuel Funkhouser to recover damages for a breach of duty as plaintiff's agent of certain premises in failing to keep the premises insured against loss by fire. There was a verdict for defendant, and a new trial denied. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

Dean & Smith, for plaintiff in error. O. N. Featherston, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, O. J. Whether tested by the general law, irrespective of the particular custom which seems to have prevailed at Rome in the transaction of insurance business, or by that custom itself, there was a prima facie liability on the defendant to answer for damages in the present case. He was the plaintiff's agent to keep the premises insured. She had reason to rely upon him, and to believe that he had done so. Under Code, § 2794, there could be no valid contract of insurance without writing. The duty of keeping the property insured would, therefore, embrace the duty of seeing that some contract of insurance in writing was kept on foot. No such contract covering the period at which this loss occurred was ever consummated, though a policy was written up, and might possibly have been delivered, if the local custom in respect to collecting the premium had been complied with. But that was not complied with, and hence the writing up of the policy counted for nothing. It is said that it was the company's fault that the premium was not paid, because the custom was for the companies to send out bills for premiums, and in this instance no bill was sent. But it is not sufficient for an agent employed to keep up insurance to put the company in fault. The owner of the property does not want any company to be put in fault, because that would most probably involve a lawsuit. What the owner wants is to have right and regular insurance kept up, so as to avoid trouble and litigation in case loss should occur. It would be unreasonable to allow an agent to turn over a lawsuit to his principal, even though a recovery might ultimately be had, instead of a proper and regular contract of insurance, at least one fully consummated with the insurance company, instead of lacking a material element of consummation according to both general law and the local usage. The court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

McELMURRAY v. BLUE et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 10, 1893.)

HOMESTEAD EXEMPTION—NEW TRIAL—NEWLY-DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

1. A note payable to the vendor or bearer, given for the purchase money of land, being transferred to a bearer by delivery, and renewed from time to time, and the last renewal note being reduced to judgment, the land is subject to pay the judgment, as against a homestead in the same land claimed and set up by the vendee, the defendant in the judgment. Wofford v. Gaines, 53 Ga. 485.

2. The supreme court will not reverse a judgment denying a new trial for newly-discovered evidence, where it appears from the brief of evidence that some of the material facts alleged to be newly discovered were known to the movant at the time of trial. His affidavit to the contrary, being discredited by the brief, may be wholly disregarded, especially where it is the only evidence of his diligence in preparing for trial, and no specific acts of diligence are disclosed even by it.

Error from superior court, Marion county; J. H. Martin, Judge.

Blue & Stewart, having recovered judgment against McElmurray on a note, levied on certain land which defendant claimed as a homestead. Judgment for plaintiffs, and, from an order refusing a new trial, defendant brings error. Affirmed.

C. J. Thornton, Morgan McMichael, and W. D. Crawford, for plaintiff in error. Miller & Munro, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. A homestead in land will not protect the land against paying its own purchase money. Code 1873, § 5135; Code 1892, § 5211. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether the judgment in question was founded on a note given for the purchase money of goods, (a store account,) or in renewal of a note given by McElmurray to Chapman for land. The jury settled this conflict against the debtor, and in favor of the creditors. The note given to Chapman was payable to him, or bearer, and by him transferred, by mere delivery, to Blue & Stewart. According to their evidence, it was renewed from time to time, and the last renewal note was the basis of the judgment. On this state of facts, the land would be subject to pay the judgment, as against a homestead claimed and set up by McElmurray, Chapman's vendee. Wofford v. Gaines, 53 Ga. 485. That part of the charge of the court which is assigned as error was apparently not adjusted accurately to the facts in evidence; but the deviation was too slight to be material, as the real contest between the parties was as to whether the note reduced to judgment represented the purchase money of land or the purchase money of goods.

2. From the brief of evidence, we think it clearly appears that some of the material facts alleged to be newly discovered were known to the movant at the time of trial.

His affidavit that all of them were discovered afterwards is thus discredited, and may be disregarded. There is no evidence of his diligence in preparing for trial, except as stated in this affidavit, and even it discloses no specific acts of diligence. Our conclusion is that there was no error in overruling the motion for a new trial. Judgment affirmed.

KING, Sheriff, v. CASTLEN et al.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 3, 1893.)

ACTION ON REPLEVIN BOND—VARYING CONDI-TIONS BY PAROL.

1. As the statute (Code, § 3728) prescribes the condition of all forthcoming bonds which the levying officer is authorized and required to take in claim cases, the officer has no power to take a forthcoming bond with a different condition, or to qualify or vary the prescribed condition, by any agreement whatever made with the claimant or with the surety by whom the statutory bond is executed. Any such agreement is simply void and without effect as against an action upon the bond, brought after the termination of the claim case by the plaintiff in execution, or by the officer for his use.

2. The sheriff having levied on personal property which was claimed by another, who replevied the same by giving a bond with security, conditioned, as required by section 3728 of the Code, to deliver the property "at the time and place of sale" in case the same should be found subject to the fi. fa. levied, and there having been a failure to deliver the property at the courthouse door, after the same had been found subject, and duly advertised for sale by the sheriff, it was no defense to an action upon this bond, brought by the sheriff for use of the plaintiff in fi. fa. against the claimant and the surety for breach thereof, that he had induced the defendants to sign the bond by promising them he would not require the property, which was heavy, and expensive to transport, to be brought to the courthouse door, but would sell it where it was; or that he repeated this promise after the bond had been executed. The courthouse door was the only place where the sale could be legally made, whether the sheriff brought and exhibited the property there or not, and consequently the terms of the bond as to time and place of delivery were not ambiguous, and could not be varied by parol evidence tending to show that the defendants had agreed to deliver at some other place. The provisions of section 3046 of the Code, relieving levying officers in certain instances from removing heavy property to the courthouse door, were made for the benefit of the officers and the parties to processes levied by them, and not for the benefit of other persons who may voluntarily contract in writing by a statutory bond to deliver such property at the courthouse door.

Error from superior court, Monroe county; J. S. Boynton, Judge.

Action on a replevin bond by C. A. King, sheriff, for the use of Rhodes & Waters, against Mary A. Castlen and another. There was a verdict for defendants, and a new trial denied. Plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

King, sheriff, suing for the use of Rhodes & Waters, brought his action against Mary A. Castlen, principal, and I. S. Maynard, security, upon a forthcoming bond, given by Mrs. Castlen and Maynard for the forthcoming "at the time and place of sale" (sheriff's) of a stationary boiler and detached engine, coupler, and fixtures of a gin, feeder and condenser, which had been levied on under an execution in favor of Rhodes & Waters against I. H. Castlen, and claimed by Mrs. Castlen. The pleas of defendants were demurred to, except that of the general issue, on the ground that they set forth no valid or legal defense to the suit, and were an effort to ingraft by parol additional stipulations upon the written contract sued on. This demurrer was overruled, to which plaintiff excepted. A verdict was rendered for defendants, and plaintiff's motion for new trial was overruled, to which also he excepted.

The pleas in question were: It was lawful for the sheriff to have sold the property levied on, as the same was difficult and expensive to transport, and it was upon the statement of the sheriff that he would sell the property where it was that defendants were induced to sign the bond sued on. Defendants cared for and protected the property where it was, and had it there, subject to the order of the sheriff, on the day of sale; and the sheriff desired to carry out his agreement with defendants, and sell the property where it was, as the law allowed him to do, but was prevented from doing so by plaintiff's attorney. Defendant Maynard further pleaded the bond sued on has not been forfeited in terms of the law. Further, he was induced to sign the bond through fraud, accident, and mistake; for at the time of signing it the sheriff told him it would be no trouble to him, (defendant,) because, if the property was ever sold, he, the sheriff, would sell it where it was, and not require the property to be brought to the courthouse on the day of sale; that the law allowed the sheriff to do so; and the sheriff then and there promised to sell it where it was, and not require it to be brought to the courthouse on the day of sale. To be sure about this being lawful, defendant went with the sheriff to the office of a firm of lawyers, (not plaintiff's attorney,) and asked them if the law would allow the sheriff to sell the property where it was, and not require it to be brought to the courthouse on the day of sale, and they answered that the sheriff could sell the property as aforesaid, and it was upon this representation and understanding that defendant was induced to sign the bond. Further, that the sheriff made the same promise, and entered into the same agreement, after the bond was executed.

The motion for new trial contained the general grounds that the verdict was contrary to law, evidence, etc. Also that the court erred in admitting the testimony of Maynard to the effect that Sheriff C. A. King told defendant that it would be no trouble to him, because, if the property was ever brought to sale, he, the sheriff, would sell the same where it was, and not require the property to be brought to the courthouse on the day of sale, before he signed the bond sued on; and that the sheriff made the same promise and entered into the same agreement after the bond sued on was executed, etc. Plaintiff objected to said testimony, because all stipulations made prior to the execution of the bond were merged in writing; because it is not competent to vary the terms of the written contract by parol; and because, the plaintiff in fi. fa. being the real party in interest, and for whose benefit a forthcoming bond in claim cases are taken, no subsequent conversation or agreement by the sheriff can affect the rights of the plaintiff in fi. fa.; and because the bond sued on was not ambiguous, and its terms needed no explanation; because the court erred, for the same reasons, in admitting the testimony of plaintiff as to conversations had with Maynard both before and after signing the bond, which testimony was objected to as incompetent, irrelevant, and inadmissible for the reasons set forth in the ground last above. Error in charging: "The law authorized the sheriff to sell the property without having it present at the county site, but to sell as located at the place where it was found and levied upon, if he saw proper to do so, if it be heavy machinery, and difficult and expensive to move. The law would authorize him to make such a sale, and it was in his power and discretion so to sell it, without removing it to the county site; and, it being in his power to sell it that way, if he stipulated with Mrs. Castlen, principal, and Mr. Maynard, her security, to take a bond that the property should be sold without being brought to the county site, but that it would be sold at the place where he found it, and where it was located,—if he stipulated with them that the property should be sold in that way, and that the delivering the property at the place designated would be recognized by him as a sufficient compliance with the bond,—he had the right to make such a contract; and if he made such a contract with them, and they became liable for the delivery of the property under the terms of such a contract as that, then, if you believe from the testimony that the property was machinery, heavy machinery, difficult and expensive to move, and that the sheriff determined that he would sell it without moving it, would sell it as located upon the premises where it was found and levied upon, and if he so notified the bondsmen as an inducement for them to give the bond, and stipulated with them that the delivery of the property at the place stipulated for the delivery would be a compliance with the bond, then the sheriff would have no right to recover unless the bondsmen had placed it out of his power to deliver the property at that place. If you believe from the evidence that such a contract was made, that such a stipulation was made by the sheriff with the bondsmen, and that the property was advertised for sale, and if the sheriff failed to advertise it for sale as being at the place where it was at time of levy, yet if the securities were then ready and offered to deliver it then to the sheriff whenever he should demand it,—that is, to deliver it at that place where the property was found, when he should demand it,—and if the sheriff failed to advertise it for sale in that way, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover.” Alleged to be error in that it allowed the right to add to and vary the written contract sued on by parol, because it recognized the right of the sheriff to bind plaintiff in fi. fa.—the real party in interest—by conversations in his absence; and because the sheriff only has a right under the law to sell personal property at a place different from the regular place of sheriff's sale, when there is no forthcoming bond, and when the property is in the custody and control of the sheriff; with which principle of law the charge conflicts.

S. N. Woodward, for plaintiff in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. The two sections of the Code referred to in the headnotes read as follows: “In all cases where a levy is made upon property that is claimed by a third person, and such person shall desire the possession thereof, it shall be the duty of the sheriff, or other levying officer, to take bond with good security for a sum equal to double the value of the property levied on, to be estimated by the levying officer, for the delivery of such property at the time and place of sale, provided the property so levied upon shall be found subject to such execution; provided that it shall not be lawful to require or take a forthcoming bond for real estate.” Section 3728. “No sales shall be made, by the sheriffs or coroners, of property taken under execution but at the courthouse of the county where such levy was made, on the first Tuesday in each month, between the hours of 10 A. M. and 4 P. M. and at public outcry; provided, that in all cases where any sheriff, coroner or other levying officer, shall levy any execution or other legal process, upon any corn, lumber, timber of any kind, bricks, machinery, or other articles difficult and expensive to transport, it shall and may be lawful for said officer to sell said property without carrying and exposing the same at the courthouse door on the day of sale; provided, also, that said levying officer shall give a full description of said property, and the place where said property is located, in the advertisement of the sale.” Section 3646. Read in the light of these provisions of the Code and of the official report, the headnotes will be clearly understood, and they are so full that no expansion of them seems necessary. The court erred in not granting a new trial. Judgment reversed.

CENTRAL RAILROAD & BANKING CO.
OF GEORGIA v. ROBERTS.

(Supreme Court of Georgia. April 10, 1893.)

COMPETENCY OF JUROR—CARRIERS—EJECTION OF PASSENGER—CONTRACT OF CARRIAGE—MANNER OF EJECTION—DAMAGES.

1. A juror is not incompetent to try the case because his stepdaughter married the brother of the plaintiff. The marriage established no relationship or affinity between the juror and the plaintiff.

2. A railway agent who sells a Sunday excursion ticket consisting of two parts, one of which signifies that it was to be used in going and the other in returning, but neither of them indicating any particular train, is a proper person of whom to inquire, at the time the ticket is purchased, as to whether it would afford the right to return on a fast train, called the “Canon Ball,” of the same day or night. His reply in the affirmative, together with the possession of the return part of the ticket, and its production to the conductor of the fast train, would entitle the passenger to return on that train, and be put off at the proper station, unless he knew, or had sufficient reason to believe, that the agent was misinforming him, or that there was some rule or order of the company either denying to the agent authority to answer such a question, or forbidding the recognition of such a ticket by the conductor of the fast train.

3. If the passenger was not told by the agent that he could return on the fast train, and if he knew that the fast train did not usually stop at the station, he would have no absolute right to return on that train, provided there was another on which he could return before his ticket expired.

4. There being no conditions on the face of the ticket, and no controversy as to the right of the passenger to return on some train, it was error to charge the jury that one who buys a return ticket has a right to return, if he performs all the conditions of the ticket, and that, if the agent told the passenger that he could go and return on this ticket, the passenger had a right to presume that he could do so, and if, in his effort to do so, he was put off at any other station, he would be entitled to damages. The pressure of the case was upon the right of the passenger to return on the fast train, and the charge, though correct as abstract law, was not pertinent to that question, and might have misled the jury.

5. In order for a passenger to recover for wrongful expulsion from a train, it is not necessary that the conductor should have put his hands on him.

6. A passenger who brings an action of tort for wrongful expulsion from a train is not restricted to a recovery as for breach of contract, but may recover for his injury as a tort. The amount of general damage, no special damage being proved, is matter for the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Quitman county; J. H. Guerry, Judge.

Action by T. J. Roberts against the Central Railroad & Banking Company to recover for an alleged wrongful ejection from a train. There was judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings error. Reversed.

R. F. Lyon and J. R. Cooper, for plaintiff in error. G. A. Whitaker, for defendant in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J. 1. Marriage will relate the husband, by affinity, to the wife's blood relations, but will not relate the husband's brother to any of her relations. The husband of the juror's stepdaughter was not related to the juror, but only to the juror's wife. The husband's brother, the plaintiff, was further off still. He was not related even to the juror's wife.

The groom and bride each comes within
The circle of the other's kin;
But kin and kin are still no more
Related than they were before.

2. The agent who sold the Sunday excursion ticket represented the company in making the sale, and the information which he gave as to whether the ticket would afford a right to return on a particular train could be relied on, unless it was known to be incorrect, or unless some known rule or order of the company made the agent incompetent to give such information, or forbade the recognition of such a ticket by the conductor of the designated train, or of trains belonging to that class. The ticket being silent on its face as to trains, and one of the parts of the ticket being for a return passage, of course it would be proper for the company to authorize some one to answer questions when the ticket was sold, so that the buyer might know how to use it, and no other person would seem to be so proper for this purpose as the agent selling it.

3. If, when he bought the ticket, the passenger was not told that he could return on the fast train, and if he knew that train did not usually stop at the station, and with this knowledge bought the ticket, he certainly would have no absolute right to return on that train, provided there was some other on which he could return before his ticket expired. Although tickets sold may not expressly include or exclude any of the trains, yet if it be known to the buyer, at the time of his purchase, that such tickets are not recognized on a particular class of trains, but only on trains of a different class, he should be understood as consenting to use his particular ticket as such tickets were used by others, and as the company expected tickets of that class to be used. Such would be the fair meaning of the contract really made between the parties by the purchase and sale of the ticket.

4. There was no dispute that the passenger had a right both to go and return on his ticket. The whole pressure of the case was upon the question whether he had a right to return on the fast train, which did not usually stop at the station at which the ticket was sold, or whether his right was limited to return on some other train, which did stop there. The ticket itself had no conditions on its face touching the matter. This being so, it was obviously misleading, or calculated to mislead, for the court to charge the jury that one who buys a return ticket has a right to return, if he performs all the conditions of the ticket, and that, if the agent told the passenger that he could go and return on his ticket, the passenger had a right to presume that he could do so, and if, in his effort to do so, he was put off at any other station, he would be entitled to damages. It is to be observed that this charge says, in general terms, that, if the agent told the passenger that he could go and return on his ticket, the passenger had a right to presume that he could do so. This is certainly true, and what immediately follows—that is, if, in his effort to do so, he was put off at any other station, he would be entitled to damages—would also be true, if the agent had told him, not merely that he could return on his ticket, but that he could return on it upon the fast train. The court did not make this a condition of his right to recover, but left it out entirely. As abstract law, the charge was correct, but it was not applicable to the only real question in the case about which the parties disputed. There was a conflict of evidence as to whether the agent told the passenger he could return on the fast train. The charge, as given, would authorize the jury to find against the company without settling that conflict. This error vitiated the whole trial.

5. The contention that, in order for the passenger to recover for wrongful expulsion, it was necessary that the conductor should have put his hands on him, is manifestly unsound. A conductor may expel a passenger as effectually by ordering him off as by pushing him off. He is a man in authority, and may exert that authority by words as well as by using physical force.

6. In such an action as the present, where it is well founded, a recovery may be had for the injury as a tort, as a breach of a public duty by a common carrier,—a duty imposed by law,—though involving in this breach a breach of contract also. The passenger could elect to sue only for the breach of contract, and, did he so elect, his recovery would be limited to nominal damages, if he failed to prove any special damage. But this action being for a tort, and no special damage being proved, proof of the tort, and the circumstances attending it, would entitle the plaintiff to recover such amount as the enlightened conscience of an impartial jury would sanction as fit for the plaintiff to have, and the defendant to pay. There is no other measure of damages for such a case. Judgment reversed.

PURYEAR v. FOSTER, Sheriff, et al.
(Supreme Court of Georgia. March 27, 1893.)
COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENTS—LOST DOCUMENTS.

One who, by himself or another, has bid off property at sheriff's sale, is generally competent, under the evidence act of 1889, to testify in his own favor, against the administrator of the defendant in the execution under which the sale was made, as to any fact involved in the controversy, except "as to transactions or communications with such deceased person." The sheriff being still alive, transactions and communications with him may be proved, the same as if the defendant in execution were alive also. So may any knowledge of the witness as to the existence and contents of the lost execution, entries thereon, contents of other lost papers, destroyed records, etc.

(Syllabus by the Court.)

Error from superior court, Walker county; J. W. Maddox, Judge.

Action by John Puryear against W. A. Foster, sheriff, and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

A petition was brought, February 23, 1886, by John Puryear, to require Foster, sheriff, to make to him a deed to a certain land lot in pursuance of a sale alleged to have been made by Strange, former sheriff, on the first Tuesday in August, 1873, under a mortgage fi. fa. alleged to have issued from the superior court in favor of John Y. Jackson & Co. against Rial Stancel, at which sale Puryear claimed to be the purchaser. He excepts to the rejection of evidence, and to the grant of a nonsuit. His application was resisted by the administrators of Stancel, who had died. This fact was the ground of objection to the testimony which was ruled out. The following evidence was introduced without objection: All the records and papers of every kind belonging to the office of the clerk of the superior court, including the files of the newspapers containing the official advertisements of sheriff's sales, were destroyed by fire in 1883. Strange was sheriff in 1873, and published his advertisements in the Rome Courier. He now lives in the Indian Territory. He had no office in the courthouse. His office was in his pockets. The clerk of the superior court, who has been in office continuously since 1872, has no recollection of the foreclosure of a mortgage in favor John Y. Jackson & Co. against Stancel, or of any such papers ever having been of file. Foster has been sheriff continuously since 1885. No fi. fa. in favor of John Y. Jackson & Co. against Stancel ever came into his hands, nor was any such fi. fa. turned over to him by his predecessor in office, nor has he ever seen such fi. fa. since he has been sheriff. Strange was succeeded by Mize, deceased, who was succeeded by Withers, deceased, who was succeeded by another Mize, deceased, who was succeeded by Patterson. Patterson was sheriff before the courthouse was burned, (February 3, 1883.) No fi. fa. in favor of John Y. Jackson & Co. against Stancel was ever in his possession. He never saw any such fi. fa., or any such papers as claimed by plaintiff. Puryear testified that Strange signed and delivered to him, on the day it bears date, the following receipt, which was exhibited to the witness and introduced in evidence: "Received of John Puryear nine dollars, payment of costs on mortgage fi. fa. of J. Y. Jackson &

Co. vs. Rial Stancel. This August 5th, 1873. Wm. Strange, Sheriff." He further testified that soon after Strange went out of office he went to Patterson, then the sheriff, in search of said fi. fa., and failed to find it in his office or among his papers, and has since made diligent search, and failed to find it. J. W. Jackson testified that he was a member of the firm of John Y. Jackson & Co. He thought the land in question was sold in 1869, and Strange was sheriff, as he remembered. John Puryear bid off the land for John Y. Jackson & Co. The reason why a deed was not made at time of sale was because they were in debt, and hoped to sell the land soon after the sheriff's sale, and did not demand a deed, thinking that when they did sell the lot they would get the sheriff to make it to their vendee, instead of to them. Subsequently to the sale, in pursuance of an arrangement between the plaintiff, John Y. Jackson & Co., and John Puryear, said Puryear was entitled to a deed to the land. Witness does not know that they ever made but one effort to sell it. Thinks they advertised it for sale only once, in the Rome Courier. Does not know who levied on the land. Was not present when it was sold. Thinks it brought $50. The fi. fa. should have been credited with that sum, less costs. Plaintiffs in fi. fa. had the land bid off for them. Following is the rejected testimony: By John Puryear: That Strange, as sheriff, sold at public sale on the first Tuesday in August, 1873, the land in question, as the property of Stancel, under a mortgage fi. fa. issued from the superior court in favor of John Y. Jackson & Co. against Stancel; that witness bid off the land at sheriff's sale, and no deed was made to him by the sheriff at the time; that some time afterwards he saw the mortgage fi. fa. under which the sale was made in the office of the clerk of the superior court, having the entry of levy on the land, and of the sale on the day named to John Puryear for $50, and the disposition of the money arising from the sale; that John Y. Jackson & Co. had a mortgage executed by Stancel to them to secure $500 due them by him, and the land in question was included in the mortgage; and that this mortgage was regularly foreclosed in the superior court, fi. fa. issued thereon, and Strange, as sheriff, levied the fi. fa. upon the land, and sold it at regular sheriff's sale on the first Tuesday in August, 1873, and witness bid it off for $50. By J. W. Jackson: That John Y. Jackson & Co. had a mortgage given to them by Stancel for about $500 principal, which they foreclosed in 1868 or 1869, to the best of his recollection; that execution issued on the foreclosure, and was levied on the land in question; that, after the sale of the land, Stancel came to see witness, to get permission to cut three trees off of the land, and said he thought witness was the right one to come to, as he did not want to get into any trouble about it; that witness told him to go ahead and get the trees; that Stancel recognized John Y. Jackson & Co. as owners of the land, or their survivors, after the sale, so far as witness knows. He never heard of Stancel claiming any rights on the land after the sale, earlier than 1882.

Lumpkin & Shattuck and Payne & Walker, for plaintiff in error. R. M. W. Glenn, for defendants in error.

BLECKLEY, C. J., (after stating the facts.) The evidence rejected because of the supposed incompetency of the witnesses Puryear and Jackson, on account of the death of Stancel, appears in the official report. Under the evidence act of 1889, the whole of Puryear's evidence was admissible. None of it referred to any transaction or communication with Stancel. It related to a transaction with the sheriff, who is still alive, and to the existence and contents of lost documents and destroyed records. The statement that the mortgage referred to was executed by Stancel meant simply that the mortgage purported to be so executed. As we understand the evidence, the witness did not mean to testify as a fact that it was so executed, or that he knew personally of its execution. He meant to describe and identify the mortgage to which the judgment of foreclosure mentioned by him related, and give the contents of the mortgage, so far as was requisite to the proceeding in hand. The judgment of foreclosure would prove the execution of the mortgage, and, that judgment being destroyed, the witness was competent to prove its contents. The scheme of the evidence was for the witness to prove the judgment, and the judgment to prove the execution of the mortgage. With respect to the testimony of Jackson, some of it was clearly inadmissible, if Jackson had any interest in this proceeding, but some of it was admissible whether he was interested or not. His interest is not clearly apparent, for, although Puryear originally bid off the land for Jackson's firm, and that firm withdrew from the purchase, and allowed Puryear to take the benefit of it, and have the conveyance made to himself, yet, so far as appears, the firm made no warranty in this transaction with Puryear; and, whether he fails or succeeds in this application for a deed from the sheriff, no liability upon Jackson or his firm will necessarily arise or be discharged. Even if we should be mistaken in this, Jackson was certainly competent to prove the foreclosure of the mortgage, the levy of the execution, and the sale of the land under it. It strikes us that Jackson's interest may not be clear enough to exclude him as to any of his proposed evidence, but, of course, this question can be cleared up hereafter. What we adjudge at present is this: The court erred in holding Jackson and Puryear incompetent to testify as to some of the facts ruled out, they being competent to testify to all the enumerated facts except that the mortgage was in fact made by Stancel, and the further fact that Stancel applied for and obtained leave to cut trees on the land. Of course, what Stancel said to Jackson, and Jackson to him, would be included in this exception. Judgment reversed.

GATEWOOD et ux. v. TOMLINSON et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

DOWER—ALLOTMENT—LAND SOLD ON EXECUTION.

Under Code, § 2103, providing that on the death of her husband the wife shall be entitled to an estate for her life in one-third value of all the lands whereof her husband was seised during the coverture, a wife cannot in her husband's lifetime have dower allotted her in lands sold on execution against him, as against the purchaser.

Appeal from superior court, Anson county; Whitaker, Judge.

Action by Daniel and Margaret Gatewood against T. R. Tomlinson and others for allotment of dower in land. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. T. Bennett, for appellants. R. E. Little, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The plaintiffs were married in 1850. The husband acquired land in 1874. It was sold under execution against him in 1889. The defendant purchased it at the sale, and the feme plaintiff asks that her dower in this land be allotted to her. The summons was returnable to the superior court in term, and not before the clerk. A married woman's rights in her husband's lands are fixed by the statute. She has none therein except such as are thus secured to her. The act which is applicable here (Code, § 2103) provides that upon the death of her husband the wife shall be entitled to an estate for her life in one-third in value of all the lands of which her husband was seised during the coverture. By the express words of the statute, her enjoyment of the possession of one-third of the land is postponed until the death of her husband. The defendants have acquired the husband's rights. They stand in his place as to this land. She has, it is true, a right—an inchoate right or estate—in the land, but its enjoyment is postponed by the law until the death of her husband, and is contingent upon her surviving him. The case of Felton v. Elliott, 66 N. C. 195, is directly in point, we think. Three reasons were given by Chief Justice Pearson for dismissing that case. The first two there specified apply here. No error.

STATE v. GILCHRIST.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

MURDER—DEGREE—VERDICT.

Act Feb. 11, 1893, dividing murder into two degrees, includes, in the first, all murder perpetrated by any kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, and in section 3 declares that the existing form of indictment is not altered, but the jury shall determine the degree in their verdict. An indictment following the form authorized in Laws 1887, c. 58, presented that the accused, with force and arms, feloniously, willfully, and with malice aforethought, did kill and murder, etc. There was evidence that the accused and deceased had quarreled, and that accused had made threats. The only evidence as to the manner of the killing was that accused had concealed himself and waylaid deceased, striking him, as he passed, on the head with an axe, and killing him instantly. The court charged that the crime was murder in the first degree, or nothing. The jury found accused guilty of the felony and murder in the manner and form as charged. Held a good conviction of murder in the first degree.

Appeal from superior court, Richmond county; Connor, Judge.

Daniel Gilchrist, convicted of murder, appeals. Affirmed.

There was evidence that the prisoner and the deceased, Frank McKay, had some difficulty a short time before the homicide, and that prisoner had made threats against deceased. There was evidence tending to show that prisoner killed deceased by waylaying him on the road on which deceased was returning from his work at night; that prisoner concealed himself behind some trees on the side of the road, and, as deceased was passing by, knocked him on the head with an axe, killing him instantly. This was the only evidence as to the manner of the killing. The prisoner asked the court to instruct the jury that there was no evidence of murder in the first degree. This was refused, and the court instructed the jury that the prisoner was guilty of murder in the first degree, or nothing. The only evidence in regard to the time of the killing was that it was committed on a Thursday night, in February, 1893. The indictment charged the offense to have been committed on the 9th of February, 1893. Thursday was the 9th of February. The jury rendered a verdict of guilty in manner and form as charged in the indictment. The prisoner moved for a new trial, upon the ground that the jury, in their verdict, did not determine whether the homicide was murder in the first or second degree, and for error in that the court refused to give the instruction asked for. The motion was refused, and the prisoner excepted. A motion in arrest of judgment was also made, because the jury did not determine in their verdict whether the homicide was murder in the first or second degree. Prisoner excepted, and appealed from the judgment.

The Attorney General, for the State.

MacRAE, J. The bill of indictment was drawn under the form authorized in chapter 58 of the Laws of 1887, and reads as follows: "The jurors for the state, upon their oath, present that Daniel Gilchrist, late of the county of Richmond, with force and arms, at and in said county, on the 9th day of February, A. D. 1893, feloniously, willfully, and with malice aforethought, did kill and murder one Frank McKay, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state." At the time of the passage of the act of 1887, there were no degrees in the crime of murder in this state, but on the 11th day of February, 1893, an act was passed "to divide the crime of murder into two degrees, and define the same." This act read as follows: "Section 1. All murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison, lying in wait, imprisonment, starving, torture, or by any other kind of willful, deliberate and premeditated killing, or which shall be committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate any arson, rape, robbery, burglary or other felony, shall be deemed to be murder in the first degree and shall be punished with death. Sec. 2. All other kinds of murder shall be deemed murder in the second degree and shall be punished with imprisonment of not less than two nor more than thirty years in the penitentiary. Sec. 3. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to require any alteration or modification of the existing form of indictment for murder, but the jury before whom the offender is tried shall determine in their verdict whether the crime is murder in the first or second degree. Sec. 4. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to any crime which shall have been committed prior to the ratification of this act, and shall not affect the existing distinction between murder and manslaughter nor the punishment for manslaughter as now provided by law. Sec. 5. That this act shall be in force from and after its ratification. Ratified the 11th day of February, 1893." It will be noted that the crime is alleged in the bill to have been committed on the 9th day of February, 1893, prior to the ratification of the act last recited, and that the only evidence as to the time of the homicide fixed it on a Thursday night, in February, 1893, and that the 9th of February was on Thursday. So it appears that there were two Thursday nights in February of this year before, and two after, the 11th. It will be assumed in favor of human life that the crime was committed after the passage of the said act.

The verdict is as follows: "That they find the prisoner at the bar, Daniel Gilchrist, guilty of the felony and murder in the manner and form as charged in the bill of indictment." Section 3 of the act of 1893, as above recited, provides that the jury before whom the offender is tried shall determine in their verdict whether the crime was murder in the first or second degree. The bill of indictment, using the words, "feloniously, willfully, and of malice aforethought," charges a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing, which, according to section 1 of the act of 1893, is murder in the first degree. The bill charges the highest crime, and the law permits a verdict of guilty of this crime, or of either murder in the second degree or of the felonious slaying called "manslaughter." The verdict should be taken in connection with the charge of his honor and the evidence in the case. State v. Long, 7 Jones, (N. C.) 24; State v. Leak, 80 N. C. 403; State v. Thompson, 95 N. C. 596; State v. Toole, 106 N. C. 736, 11 S. E. Rep. 168. A perusal of the testimony, as stated in the case on appeal, will show that there was no ground for the prayer for instruction; that there was no evidence of murder in the second degree; and that there was no error in the instruction that he was guilty of murder in the first degree, or of nothing. The cases cited above settle that where there are various counts in a bill of indictment, and testimony is offered as to one count only, and there is a general verdict of guilty, the verdict will be presumed to have been rendered upon the count to which the evidence was applicable. As the jury in this case, upon proper evidence, could have rendered either one of three verdicts of guilty, it is as if there had been three counts in the bill,—one for murder in the first degree, one for murder in the second degree, and one for manslaughter. There was no evidence on which to warrant a verdict of guilty of murder in the second degree or of manslaughter. The evidence, if believed, would warrant only a verdict of guilty of murder in the first degree, and that is what in manner and form is charged in this bill; and therefore the general verdict was in response to the charge of murder in the first degree, and determined the degree in accordance with the statute. We are not unmindful of the fact that our conclusion is apparently at variance with the decisions of the courts of several other states and with section 2640 of Thompson on Trials; but an examination of the cases cited will show quite a difference in the words of their statutes and ours. The bill of indictment charging murder in the first degree, this verdict determines the degree, for it alleges that he is guilty as charged. Com. v. Earle, 1 Whart. 525. After a careful examination of the record, we find that there is no error.

STEWART et al. v. BARDIN et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

MORTGAGES—CONSTRUCTION AND EFFECT.

A provision in a mortgage that after default the mortgagee or his assigns may take possession of the premises, and receive the rents, "until the rights of the parties shall be fully adjusted according to law," is not inconsistent with the right to have the land sold under a decree of foreclosure if the debt is not paid.

Appeal from superior court, Pender county; Winston, Judge.

Action by J. L. Stewart and others against B. C. Bardin and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. O. Burton, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. The mortgage which the plaintiffs seek to foreclose in this action has in it no power of sale, and provides that after default the mortgagee or his assigns may take possession of the mortgaged premises, and receive the rents, "until the rights of the parties shall be fully adjusted according to law." We find nothing in this inconsistent with plaintiffs' assertion of right to have the land sold under a decree of foreclosure if the debt is not paid. It only incorporates in the deed, as an express stipulation between the parties, what the law, without its insertion therein, would have adjudged to be the mortgagee's rights. The right to receive the rents after default is in no wise inconsistent with the asserted right to have the land itself sold. No error.

MAXWELL et al. v. McIVER.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

TRIAL—SUBMISSION OF ISSUES—WAIVER OF ERROR.

The fact that one of the issues made by the pleadings was not submitted to the jury is not a ground for complaint by a party who failed to ask for such submission, and who took no exception to those submitted.

Appeal from superior court, Duplin county; Henry R. Bryan, Judge.

Action by J. F. Maxwell and others against Henry McIVER to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. R. Kornegay, for appellant. A. D. Ward, for appellees.

MacRAE, J. The pleadings disclose that an issue of fraud was raised, which ought to have been presented to the jury; but it does not appear that any such issue was tendered by defendant's counsel, and no exception was taken to the issues submitted. In Kidder v. McIlhenny, 81 N. C. 123, it was insisted by the defendant that the issues passed on did not dispose of the matters in controversy in the pleadings, and that there should have been, and should now be, a further issue passed on involving the validity of the mortgage as against the feme defendant, and the objection is thus disposed of in the opinion of the court: "Nor ought the defendants to have been content with the proposed issue, if they desired others.

They should have asked for other issues, and, if necessary, they would have been allowed; or, if not allowed, the refusal would have constituted matter of exception. It might produce serious inconveniences and delays if, when a party has opportunity to propose other and further issues, and he refuses or fails to do so, he could then be heard to complain of the consequences of his own neglect, and thereby increase the costs, as well as delay the determination of the cause." McDonald v. Carson, 95 N. C. 377. It is to be regretted that further issues were not tendered, for by reason of this failure the defendant seems to be cut off from his most vital defense. Walker v. Scott, 106 N. C. 56, 11 S. E. Rep. 364.

The issues submitted without objection were: (1) What payments have been made on the note sued on? (2) Is the plaintiff G. N. Maxwell indebted to defendant by way of counterclaim, and, if so, in what sum? Upon these issues the testimony offered and rejected and made the subject of exception was irrelevant. It might have been very material if other issues had been submitted, but, as defendant made no tender of others, nor exception to those submitted, we are unable to afford him any relief. The motion to be permitted to amend his answer and set up a plea of usury was denied, and to this the defendant excepted. The allowance of the amendment was within the discretion of the presiding judge, and is not subject to review. No error.

STATE v. ALBERTSON.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

AFFRAY—FORMER CONVICTION—SIMPLE ASSAULT.

On indictment for an affray, in that defendant and another did beat and wound each other with deadly weapons, where defendant pleads former conviction before a justice of the peace for a simple assault, and the evidence, both before the justice and in the superior court, shows that defendant used no deadly weapon nor inflicted serious injury, though the other did, the plea should be sustained. Avery, J., dissenting.

Appeal from superior court, Duplin county; Bryan, Judge.

Yancey Albertson, convicted of affray, appeals. Reversed.

A. D. Ward, for appellant. The Attorney General, for the State.

CLARK, J. The indictment charges an affray, in that the defendant and one Maready did beat and wound each other with deadly weapons. The defendant, Albertson, pleaded former conviction. It was admitted that he had been tried before a justice of the peace, and punished for a simple assault. The evidence on the trial before the superior court, as before the justice, showed that he had used no deadly weapon and inflicted no serious injury, though Maready had. Upon this evidence the plea of former conviction should have been sustained. In State v. Coppersmith, 88 N. C. 614, the indictment charged that each of the parties indicted for an affray had used a deadly weapon. The evidence showed that Coppersmith was guilty only of a simple assault. The court below thereupon held that it had no jurisdiction as to him. This was overruled on appeal. The reason for this more fully appears in State v. Ray, 89 N. C. 587, (and subsequent cases affirming it,) which is that the charge of using a deadly weapon confers jurisdiction, and that the court, being a court of general jurisdiction, will not dismiss the action upon it appearing that only a simple assault had been committed. The court in such cases will proceed to judgment, though of course it cannot impose a sentence beyond the limit for a simple assault when tried before a justice of the peace. State v. Johnson, 94 N. C. 863; State v. Nash, 109 N. C. 824, 837, 13 S. E. Rep. 874. Here an assault with a deadly weapon is charged. The proof as to Albertson is of a simple assault. The conviction could only be for a simple assault. It is admitted that Albertson had been tried and punished for that. He cannot be punished again. It was error to overrule the plea of former conviction. State v. Price, 111 N. C. 703, 16 S. E. Rep. 414. An affray is a mutual fighting, and an indictment therefor is a charge against each person. One may be acquitted and the other convicted of an assault, or one may be found guilty of an assault with a deadly weapon and the other of a simple assault. If convicted of the latter, a former conviction or acquittal therefor before a justice of the peace is a complete defense, though of course a judgment before a magistrate would not be a defense, when in the subsequent trial in the superior court it appears that the defendant pleading former conviction (or acquittal) had in fact used a deadly weapon or inflicted serious injury. State v. Huntley, 91 N. C. 617; State v. Shelly, 98 N. C. 673, 4 S. E. Rep. 530. In such case, the justice not having jurisdiction, the proceedings before him would be a nullity. Error.

AVERY, J., dissents.

COLE v. STOKES.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

EXECUTORS—PURCHASE OF HEIRS' INTERESTS—PRESUMPTION.

1. A deed by a distributee under a will conveying to the executor of said will, before the latter's final settlement, all the grantor's interest, real and personal, in the estate, is not a mere release, and the burden is on the grantee to show the absence of fraud.

2. The fact that the attorney of a cestui que trust was present and advised his client at the latter's sale of trust property to the trustee may be considered in rebuttal of the presumption of the trustee's fraud, but does not relieve the trustee of the burden to prove his good faith.

Appeal from superior court, Person county; Henry R. Bryan, Judge.

Action by George F. Cole, administrator of the estate of Caroline Cole, deceased, against W. T. Stokes, executor of the will of Thomas Stokes, deceased, for the amount due said Caroline under said will. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Boone & Parker and W. W. Kitchin, for appellant. J. W. Graham and V. S. Bryant, for respondent.

SHEPHERD, C. J. In order to dispose of this appeal it is only necessary to determine whether there was error on the part of his honor in charging the jury that the burden was upon the plaintiff to establish the fraud alleged in the replication, and embodied in the first issue. The plaintiff is the administrator and sole distributee and heir of his deceased wife, Caroline Cole, and he brings this action against the defendant, who is the executor of Thomas Stokes, deceased, to recover the amount due his intestate under the will of her father, the said Stokes. The defendant denies his liability, and relies upon a deed executed to him by the plaintiff, on May 1, 1890, conveying to the defendant all of the plaintiff's interest, real and personal, in the said estate. At the time of the execution of the above-mentioned deed the defendant had not made his final settlement as executor, and the fiduciary relation therefore still existed between him and the plaintiff. It is well settled that an executor or administrator, in dealing with the estate, and with those who are interested therein, is regarded as a trustee, and as such is subject to that principle which raises a presumption of fraud against him when he undertakes to purchase the trust property from his cestui que trust. In respect to purchases of trust property, real or personal, directly or indirectly, from himself, whether privately or at auction, the law considers them invalid; and, says Pearson, J., in Brothers v. Brothers, 7 Ired. Eq. 150, even if the trustee "gives a fair price, the cestui que trust has his election to treat the sale as a nullity;" and this, "not because there is, but because there may be, fraud." Patton v. Thompson, 2 Jones, Eq. 285; Stilly v. Rice, 67 N. C. 178; Froneberger v. Lewis, 79 N. C. 426; Gibson v. Barbour, 100 N. C. 192, 6 S. E. Rep. 766. In respect to purchases, as in this case, from the cestui que trust, the court of chancery in the time of Lord Erskine seemed much inclined to impose a total disability on the trustee. This view, however, did not prevail, and his power to so contract is not absolutely prohibited, though, remarks Ruffin, J., in Boyd v. Hawkins, 2 Dev. Eq. 195, the restrictions imposed "almost extinguish it." He further observes that such transactions are viewed with anxious jealousy, and that "it must appear that the relation has ceased, at least that all necessity for activity in the trust has terminated, so that the trustee and cestui que trust are two persons, each at liberty, without the concurrence of the other, to consult his own interest, and capable of vindicating it; or that there was a contract definitely made, the terms and effect of which were clearly understood, and that there was no fraud or misapprehension, and no advantage taken by the trustee of the distress or ignorance of the other party. The purchase must also be fair and reasonable. Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. 246; Fox v. Mackreth, 2 Brown, Ch. 400. These cases are not allowed to turn on nice inquiries,—whether it might not possibly be for the benefit of the cestui que trust to make that particular contract rather than none at all,—but when there is a fair judicial doubt, as some of the cases express it, whether the trustee has not availed himself of his confidential situation to obtain selfish advantage, the contract cannot stand."

Lord Eldon said, in Coles v. Trecothick, supra, "that a trustee may buy from the cestui que trust, provided there is a distinct and clear contract, ascertained to be such after a jealous and scrupulous examination of all the circumstances, that the cestui que trust intended the trustee should buy, and there is no fraud, no concealment, no advantage taken, by the trustee, of information acquired by him in the character of trustee." Again, it is said "that the trustee must show that he took no advantage whatever of his situation, and that he gave to his cestui que trust all the information which he possessed." Fox v. Mackreth, supra; Id., 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 261, note. Mr. Pomeroy says that the trustee must show by "unimpeachable and convincing evidence that the beneficiary, being sui generis, had full information and complete understanding of all facts concerning the property and the transaction itself, and the person with whom he was dealing, and gave a perfectly free consent, and that the price was fair and adequate, and that he made to the beneficiary a perfectly honest and complete disclosure of all knowledge or information * * * possessed by himself, or which he might with reasonable diligence have possessed," etc. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. 958; Hill, Trustees, 237; Bisp. Eq. § 237; Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 251; Baxter v. Costin, Busb. Eq. 262; McLeod v. Bullard, 86 N. C. 210; Atkins v. Withers, 94 N. C. 581. The foregoing extracts are reproduced for the purpose of showing the nature and strength of the rule which equity has laid down for the protection of cestuis que trustent when contracting with their trustees, and we are very clearly of the opinion that the principle applies in all its rigor to the present case. It was not contended that the trust was closed when this transaction took place, and the instrument set up in bar of the plaintiff's recovery is not, as insisted, a mere release, but most essentially a conveyance of the plaintiff's entire interest in the estate, both real and personal. Under these conditions the presumption of fraud arose, and the jury should have been so instructed. The fact that the plaintiff's lawyer was present and advised him in the matter is one of the circumstances to be considered in rebuttal of the presumption, but does not prevent the application of the presumption itself. Whether a full and complete disclosure was made to the plaintiff's lawyer, whether, indeed, the defendant's lawyer, who made the purchase for him, had been put into possession of all the circumstances by his client, (and this seems doubtful,) and whether, in consideration of the place and manner of the settlement, the means of inquiry were at hand, are elements to be considered in determining whether the trustee had placed himself in a condition to purchase of his cestui que trust; but, as we have seen, they do not prevent the operation of the presumption of fraud, so as to shift the burden of proof. We have examined with much care the cases cited in behalf of the defendant, and are entirely satisfied that they do not conflict in the slightest degree with the principles above stated. There was error in placing the burden upon the plaintiff instead of the defendant. New trial.

STROUSE et al. v. COHEN et ux.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

MARRIED WOMAN—MORTGAGES—SEPARATE ESTATE—WORDS OF CONVEYANCE—DESCRIPTION—CHARGE ON ESTATE.

1. The word "convey," in a mortgage, is sufficient to transfer the property without the use of any synonymous words.

2. The words "such an interest," in property already described, as will secure the debt, is sufficient description in a mortgage of the interest mortgaged.

3. "My real and personal property, all of which is situated in the city of N.," is a sufficient description in a mortgage of the property mortgaged.

4. The words "to secure the payment of the above-expressed amount" make an instrument a mortgage, and not a simple conveyance.

5. The addition to an instrument executed by a married woman, with the expressed purpose of securing an indebtedness, of the words, "hereby making said sum a charge upon said separate estate," does not change its nature from a mortgage to a mere charge.

6. Even if an instrument purporting to be a mortgage of a married woman's realty and personalty is invalid as to the realty, because the husband does not join in the body thereof, this does not invalidate it as to the personalty.

Appeal from superior court, Craven county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Action by Strouse, Loeb & Co. against W. H. Cohen and wife to foreclose a mortgage. From a judgment for plaintiffs so far as the personal property described in the instrument was concerned, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

O. H. Gulon and W. W. Clark, for appellants. Jas. W. Waters, for appellees.

CLARK, J. In the present case the married woman executed her note, payable September 1, 1892, recited to be for value received, and further recites in the same instrument: "The said amount is due the said firm of Strouse, Loeb & Co. by myself for goods sold and delivered to me by the said firm at the city of Newbern, county of Craven, and state of North Carolina, at which place I am engaged in the business of merchandising; and I being a married woman, and being possessed of a separate estate of both real and personal property, all of which is situated in the said city of Newbern, county and state aforesaid, and desiring to secure the payment of the above sum to the said parties constituting the said firm of Strouse, Loeb & Co.: Now, therefore, be it known that I hereby convey to the said parties aforesaid, their heirs and assigns, such an interest in the said separate estate, both real and personal, as will secure the payment of the above-expressed amount, hereby making the said sum a charge upon the said separate estate for the purposes herein expressed." This is signed under seal by the wife, and the husband appends his "full consent and agreement" to the execution of the above by his wife. The privy examination of the wife is duly had, and the instrument is probated, ordered to registration, and is duly registered. The officer certifies that both husband and wife "acknowledged the execution of the foregoing instrument as their act and deed." The instrument expresses a desire "to secure the payment of the above sum" to the party selling the goods, and then it proceeds: "Therefore be it known that I hereby convey to the said parties aforesaid, their heirs and assigns, such an interest in the said separate estate, both real and personal as will secure the payment of the above-expressed amount." Here is every essential of a mortgage. The debt and consideration for it are set out. The word "convey" is as complete a transfer as if a dozen or more synonymous words followed. Harris v. Jones, 83 N. C. 317. "To parties aforesaid, their heirs and assigns." While the words "heirs and assigns" are not necessary in a mortgage, they are customary words therein, but inappropriate and unusual in merely acknowledging a debt to be due. "Such an interest" in property already described is held sufficient in a mortgage. Pemberton v. Simmons, 100 N. C. 316, 6. S. E. 122. "My real and personal estate, all of which is situated in the city of Newbern," is held a sufficient description in Woodlief v. Harris, 95 N. C. 211; Harris v. Alden, 104 N. C. 86, 10 S. E. 127, and other cases. Certainly these words would be sufficient in a deed, and of course in a mortgage also. "To secure the payment of the above-expressed amount" makes it a mortgage, and not a simple conveyance. If, at the end of such a conveyance, by a male person or a feme sole, there had been added, "hereby acknowledging such debt to be honestly due," no one would contend that this invalidated the mortgage which had just so solemnly described grantor's property, and conveyed it to secure the indebtedness. Yet the words added by a married woman, "hereby making said sum a charge upon said separate estate," can have the same effect no more. While a charge is not necessarily a mortgage, a mortgage is necessarily a charge. The use of those words is therefore mere surplusage, and not contradictory of the mortgage. They surely cannot revoke the conveyance of the property "to secure such indebtedness" in pursuance of the intention just therein above recited, "desiring to secure such payment." Indeed, no particular form is essential to the validity of a chattel mortgage. It is sufficient if the words employed express in terms or by just implication a purpose to convey the property as security for the debt. A power of sale is not essential. Comron v. Standland, 103 N. C. 207, 9 S. E. 317. Mortgages upon a stock of goods, however precarious, are not uncommon; besides, here the mortgage is upon all the personality of all kinds, and the realty is added. If it be true that the conveyance is defective as a mortgage of real estate because the husband does not join in the body of the deed, (Ferguson v. Kinsland, 93 N. C. 337,) that technically in no wise invalidates it as a mortgage of personality as to which the husband has no tenancy by the curtesy to release. It is immaterial to consider whether this is cured as between the parties by chapter 293 of the act of 1893, since there is no appeal brought up from the ruling that the mortgage was insufficiently executed as to the real estate.

There is no "beneficent provision of the constitution" which throws additional shackles around women in the management of their separate property. The provision of the constitution is in exactly the opposite direction, in accordance with the free spirit of the age and with the universal trend of legislation the world over. Its purpose is not to further assimilate married women to the condition of infants, but to make free women of them; to emancipate them from most of the restrictions formerly existing. To this end the constitution (article 10, § 6) provides that all the property of a married woman "shall be and remain the sole and separate estate and property of such female * * * and may be devised and bequeathed and with the written assent of her husband conveyed by her as if she were unmarried." Here she has made a conveyance which would be unquestionably good as a mortgage if made by a feme sole, and it is made "with the written assent of her husband," which is the sole restriction placed by the constitution upon a married woman's right to convey her own property if she chooses to do so. The court cannot be astute to find an intention of the grantor contradictory to the express words of a conveyance, nullifying and revoking it. The intent is to be gathered from the deed itself, "from the four corners" thereof. Lowdermilk v. Bostick, 98 N. C. 399, 3 S. E. 844. But if such intent could be a subject of surmise, we might well ask why, if the intent was solely to charge the separate estate, words of conveyance were used and the words "heirs and assigns," and why there was a signing under seal, privy examination, probate and registration, and, further, why was there a description of the property set out, and a formal acknowledgment by both husband and wife of the instrument as "their act and deed," since none of these were necessary simply to charge the separate personal estate. Flaum v. Wallace, 103 N. C. 296, 9 S. E. 567. If this is not a mortgage, it will be hard to conceive what form or formality a married woman can use to execute a valid mortgage. If valid otherwise as a mortgage, the words added at the end, acknowledging the indebtedness as a valid charge, were mere surplusage, and certainly not intended by the parties as a repeal of the conveyance just made under seal with the expressed intent of securing the debt by the property therein described, (with the written assent of the husband,) not only to the creditors, but to their heirs and assigns, privy examination, acknowledgment of the instrument as their act and deed, and registration. The conveyance was doubtless prepared between the parties themselves. Like all laymen, they would naturally suppose the words "hereby charging the separate estate" to mean "hereby giving a lien" upon it, which words would of themselves be sufficient to create a mortgage. Harris v. Jones, 83 N. C. 317. This would be in accordance with and confirmatory of all the words used up to that time, and not a violent and unaccountable nullification of them. It is true a married woman might restrict herself to simply charging her estate, but she might go further, and mortgage it also; and here she used the very words and formalities which were requisite for mortgaging it, if she so desired. Possibly she could not have gotten the goods except upon a mortgage. The ruling of the court below that the mortgage is valid as to the personality is in accordance with both the letter and spirit of the constitution. It may be that, as between the parties to it, rights of third persons not having supervened, the mortgage is good also upon the realty by virtue of the curative act of 1893, (chapter 293;) but, the plaintiff not having appealed from the adverse ruling below, this point is not presented. No error.

DIXON v. STEWART et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — ACCEPTANCE OF LEASE — ESTOPPEL.

Where one in possession of land accepts a lease, he is estopped to deny his lessor's title, as though he had taken possession under the lease.

Appeal from superior court, Moore county; Robert W. Winston, Judge.

Action by J. W. Dixon against E. T. Stewart and others to recover land. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

There was evidence that tended to show that in 1873 the defendant Stewart had leased the land in controversy from one Lane, under whom the plaintiff claimed, and whose deed to plaintiff for the premises was in evidence without objection thereto. The evidence also tended to show that Stewart was in possession long prior to the year 1873. He testified that he had never leased the land from Lane or the plaintiff, nor had he agreed to become their tenant, or hold for them; that he was put in possession by one Moody 40 or 50 years before the trial. No deed was shown, either to Moody, or from Moody to the plaintiff. The defendants introduced a deed made to them by the sheriff of Moore county, dated February 28, 1873, and covering the land in controversy.

The following is the report of his honor's charge, and the exceptions thereto:

"The court, among other things, charged the jury that the counsel on both sides have solemnly, and very properly, admitted that the title is out of the state. You will hence not consider that branch of the case. The plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title."

The judge here read the special requests to the jury, and charged them, plainly, that the question of color of title, under a paper title, did not arise in the case, and that in no aspect of the case could the plaintiff recover, unless the jury shall find from the evidence that the defendants are in possession of the land as the tenants of the plaintiff; that if the defendants entered into possession of the land as the tenants of the plaintiff, or of Lane, then the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the land, unless the defendants have made it appear that they have had the land 20 years after that relation ended, or after the last payment of rent. The court here fully arrayed the testimony on both these heads, and again, after reading the special requests, added and charged that the plaintiff's case rested solely on the question of tenancy, and unless such relation was shown by the plaintiff to exist between him, or them under whom he claimed, and the defendants, he could not recover.

The defendants requested his honor to charge the jury as follows: "(1) That if the defendant E. I. Stewart went into possession of the land under a parol gift from A. S. Moody, and remained in exclusive possession for forty years, this gives him a good title against the world." His honor refused to charge the jury as requested, and the defendants excepted. "(2) That if the defendant E. I. Stewart went into possession of said land under a parol gift from A. S. Moody, and remained in the exclusive possession for forty years, this gives him a good title against any one except A. S. Moody." His honor refused the instruction, and the defendants excepted.

His honor charged the jury that if the plaintiff, or those under whom he claims, have been in the open, notorious, continuous, and adverse possession for seven years, under color of title, before this action was brought, and if the defendants were the tenants of the plaintiff, his title is perfect, and the plaintiff has shown no possession for seven years under color of title, and cannot recover, unless the defendants were the tenants of Lane. The defendants excepted to this part of the charge upon the ground that there was no evidence to sustain it, and for the further reason that there was no evidence that either McNeill or Stewart was a tenant of J. I. Lane.

His honor further charged the jury that if the defendants, or those under whom they claim, have at any time acquired the title to the lands in dispute by color of title, or by adverse holding of the same for 21 years adversely, then the plaintiff cannot recover, unless he shall establish in himself a complete title, acquired after the acquirement of such title, by showing that the defendants, thereafter became the tenants of the plaintiff, or those under whom he claimed. The defendants excepted to this part of the charge upon the same grounds assigned to first part of charge, viz. that there was no evidence to support it.

His honor further charged the jury that, "if the defendants were the tenants of Lane, then the possession of the defendants is Lane's possession until twenty years after that relation ended, and after the last payment of rent;" reading from the Code, and explaining the same. The defendants excepted to this part of the charge for the reason that there was no evidence to support it, and no evidence of any payment of rent.

His honor further charged the jury that the plaintiff has shown no possession for seven years under color of title, as requested by defendants, adding, "unless the jury shall find that the defendants were the tenants of Lane." The defendants excepted to the latter part of this charge upon the grounds that there was no evidence of the tenancy of the defendants.

His honor further charged the jury "that the purchaser of Tyson's title at sheriff's sale, and the holding under the sheriff's deed, if exclusive, and seven years' possession under said deed, gives the defendants a good title," as requested by defendants, adding, "unless the purchasers at the sheriff's sale were the tenants of Lane, as explained in the charge." The defendants excepted to the latter clause of said charge upon the grounds that there was no evidence that the said purchasers were the tenants of Lane.

There was judgment for the plaintiffs, and the defendants appealed.

J. W. Hinsdale, Strong & Strong, and W. J. Adams, for appellants. J. C. Black and W. E. Murchison, for appellee.

BURWELL, J. On the trial some exceptions were taken, as appears from the record, to the introduction of certain deeds, by means of which the plaintiff sought to show that the title to the land in controversy, which was conceded to be out of the state, had become vested in him. His honor admitted these deeds in evidence over the objection of the defendants, but upon consideration of them, and of the plaintiff's evidence as to possession under them, he decided that the plaintiff had failed to show by a complete chain of title, or by possession under the deeds introduced, a title in himself to the land, "good against the world;" and he so charged the jury, and told them, in effect, that plaintiff, having failed to establish a title in that way, could not recover, unless he had established facts which constituted an estoppel on the defendants, and prevented them from disputing his title, and had thus proved in himself a title good enough for his purposes in this action. This ruling renders it unnecessary to consider the exceptions mentioned above, for the evidence, though admitted, was afterwards declared to be of no effect. The jury found that the plaintiff did have a title good against the defendants by estoppel, and, there being no exception to the admission of any of the testimony bearing upon this branch of the case, we have only to ascertain if the charge to the jury upon this subject was correct.

It is familiar learning that a tenant will not be allowed to deny that his landlord has title to the leased premises, in an action by the latter against the former for possession or for rents; and this general rule has application, we think, both to those instances where the landlord, himself having possession, delivered up that possession to the tenant, and also to those instances where one who is himself in the actual possession of land agrees to assume the relation of a tenant as to the land towards another, who asserts some title to it, there being no proof that this agreement was induced by fraud or mistake.

Mr. Bigelow, in his work on Estoppel, (page 527,) says: "There has been some conflict upon the question whether the bare taking a lease of land of which the tenant was already in possession may estop him to deny his lessor's title. It is agreed in all the cases, as we have seen, that if the tenant was induced to take the lease by mistake, fraud, or misrepresentation on the part of the lessor, he may dispute his title. * * * The conflict arises in cases in which there is a simple question growing solely out of prior possession and later acceptance of a lease by the same person. In New York and Kentucky it is held that the estoppel prevails, while in California the contrary doctrine has been held in two recent cases, upon great consideration. But even in that state it is held that the estoppel arises if the tenant does not prove a paramount title, either in himself or in some one under whom he claims." And on page 534 the author continues: "The only room for the question raised in California is either in the case of an original lease, or when the attornment is made to a stranger to the title of the lessor. In such a case, is bare possession in the tenant, without mistake, fraud, or the like, in the leasing or attornment, sufficient to remove the estoppel? The landlord may still have changed his position, reasonably induced by the lessor's acceptance of a tenancy. There would then be the elements of an estoppel in pais; and without stopping longer than to refer to the fact that the doctrine that the act of the party against whom the estoppel is claimed must have been willful, in a literal sense, if it ever prevailed, has been overruled, it is enough to say that the case might present features quite as conclusive as those in the case of an estoppel of a tenant who has received possession from his landlord, for taking possession from a landlord is only one way in which a change of position may take place. It is immaterial what may be the nature or extent of the change, provided there has been a substantial change in fact, so that the landlord would be placed in a less advantageous position by allowing the denial of his title than he would have occupied, had not the tenancy been created."

If we were to adopt the rule laid down in the case cited by defendants' counsel, (Franklin v. Merida, 35 Cal. 558,) which is set out in the foregoing quotation from Mr. Bigelow, as modified by the later case referred to by him, (Holloway v. Galliac, 47 Cal. 474,) which rule is thus stated in the latter case: "A tenant is estopped by a lease which he takes when in possession, unless he proves paramount title in himself, or another under whom he claims,"—the plaintiff would not be helped, for he bases his claim of title solely upon "adverse possession for 43 years of the land in controversy," and also on "an adverse possession under color of title from February 20, 1873, to the commencement of this action." Under the charge of his honor, the verdict of the jury has a double effect. It establishes the fact that defendants held the land from 1873, the date of the alleged lease, as tenants of plaintiff's vendor, and thus destroys defendants' claim of title by possession by establishing the fact that from 1873 the possession was not adverse. Hence, they proved no paramount title, and the estoppel would be left to work its effect.

But we think reason and the authorities sustain the rule which is approved by the eminent author quoted heretofore, and that the defendants were estopped in this action to deny the plaintiff's title, if in 1873 the defendant Stewart was in the actual possession of the land, and agreed to become the tenant of plaintiff's vendor. The defendant McNeill testified that he "never had any possession except through Stewart." The jury find that Stewart was holding as tenant of plaintiff's vendor. The salutary doctrine of estoppel requires that possession shall be surrendered to the landlord before the tenant can set up a title adverse to him. The rule goes no further. After the tenant has surrendered possession, he may turn upon his former landlord, and assert a better title than his, if he has one. Hence, it may be important, in cases where the recovery is had under this rule of practice, that the record should show the ground of the recovery, so that the judgment will not work another and more effective estoppel on the defendant.

We have not deemed it necessary to advert to the fact that his honor, in one part of his charge, said that the defendants would be estopped if they entered into the possession of the land as tenants of the plaintiff's vendor. The defendants contend that there is no evidence of such entry into possession, but that all the testimony shows that, if the alleged lease was made and accepted by the defendant Stewart, it was made and accepted while he was in possession. We need not give this matter consideration, because we have decided that the estoppel works even though the lessee was in possession at the time the lease was made and accepted. We find no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

BURWELL, J. The case on appeal states the date of the deed from J. J. Lane to plaintiff, under which he claims the land in controversy, as the 24th day of February, 1891, which is later than the date of the summons. No objection to this deed was taken on the trial on this account. We have caused a copy of this exhibit to be added to the record, and from it we learn that the date of the said deed is February 24, 1890, and thus it appears that, by a clerical error, 1891 was put for 1890.

JORDAN et ux. v. SPIERS et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

ACTION TO RECOVER REAL ESTATE—DEFENDANT'S BOND—RELEASE OF SURETY—AGREEMENT BY ONE ADMINISTRATOR—RATIFICATION.

1. The surety in a bond required by Code, § 237, of defendant in an action for recovery of real estate, conditioned to pay costs and damages, is not released by a compromise of the damages and extension of time of payment by one of plaintiff administrators; one of several administrators having no authority to make such an agreement.

2. Ratification of such agreement by the other administrator is not shown where his only positive act was the repudiation thereof by a reply to a supplemental answer setting it up.

Appeal from superior court, Hertford county; Bynum, Judge.

Action by J. J. Jordan and wife against H. McD. Spiers to recover possession of mortgaged premises, for damages for detention, and for foreclosure of the mortgage. Defendant filed an undertaking pursuant to Code, § 237, with Sampson Rea as surety. Thereafter J. J. Jordan died, and P. B. Picot and John E. Vann were appointed administrators, and made parties plaintiff. At fall term, 1890, judgment for possession and for foreclosure was entered, and the case continued for trial of the issue of damages. Pending the continuance, Picot made an agreement with Spiers compromising the suit, $100 being paid at the time, the balance to be paid on or before October, 1891, when a nonsuit was to be entered. Between the spring and fall terms of 1891 Picot died. At the spring term, 1893, the action was tried, a verdict given for plaintiffs, and on plaintiffs' motion, to which Rea answered, setting up the compromise agreement, and alleging a discharge thereunder, judgment was rendered against Spiers and Rea. Rea appeals. Affirmed.

B. B. Winborne, for appellant.

AVERY, J. In discussing the power of one of several personal representatives to act for his associates, in the case of Gordon v. Finlay, 3 Hawks, 239, Judge Henderson said: "One administrator cannot, alone, when there are more, make a sale. They are, in this respect, unlike executors, for all of the administrators together represent the intestate, whereas each executor represents the testator." Wood v. Sparks, 1 Dev. & B. 389. The appellant Rea cannot maintain the position that he, as surety, is discharged by indulgence extended to the principal in the undertaking (under Code, § 237) to pay such costs and damages, including rents and profits, as the plaintiff might recover, unless he can first show a binding agreement on the part of the creditor to forbear to proceed against the principal for a fixed period without reserving the right to move meantime against the surety. Forbes v. Sheppard, 98 N. C. 111, 3 S. E. 817. If, however, the surety shows a valid contract extending the time of payment for the benefit of the principal in a bond or undertaking, made without the knowledge or consent of the former, such agreement operates to exonerate the surety from liability. Carter v. Duncan, 84 N. C. 676; Scott v. Harris, 76 N. C. 205. If Picot had no authority to sell personal property belonging to his intestate without the consent of his coadministrator, Vann, we do not think he could lawfully exercise the more important and dangerous power of compromising a debt due his intestate, and thereby release the debtor in part of responsibility on receiving only a portion of the amount due without consulting one who had been commissioned by the officer appointed by law for the purpose of securing the benefit of the judgment of both in reference to every such important transaction. It is in order to divide responsibility and multiply counselors that the clerk is empowered in his discretion to give letters of administration to one or more of the next of kin. Such precaution on his part is in vain, if either the widow or the next of kin can compromise all of the solvent credits and dispose of all of the choses in possession without consulting the other. We are aware that authorities differ upon this subject, but we prefer to adhere to the principle as stated by Judge Henderson, because it is safer and more reasonable to do so. A testator is supposed to repose a special trust and confidence in every person named by him as executor; but the object of our statute is to give the power to the clerk to utilize the combined wisdom of two or more agents in the management of fiduciary matters under his supervision. We fail to discover in the statement of the case on appeal any evidence tending to show a subsequent ratification by Vann of the agreement entered into by Picot, his coadministrator, without his knowledge or consent. It does not appear affirmatively that Vann was consulted as to the application of the $100 paid down. When the agreement was subsequently set up by answer in the nature of a plea since the last agreement, the plaintiffs refused in their reply to recognize it, denominating it an "alleged agreement." After Picot had received the money without the consent of Vann, and presumably paid it over to the persons lawfully entitled to receive it, we cannot readily conceive of any step other than the expression of his dissent in the replication filed that it was incumbent on Vann to take, in order to show affirmatively that he repudiated the unauthorized conduct of his associate. If the money was within his control, he still claimed a balance due from Spiers for rent, in any view of the situation, amounting to more than $100, and he was not authorized to refund the sum paid to Spiers when such was the state of accounts between Spiers and his intestate. It does not appear that Vann assented to a single continuance from the time he filed his reply repudiating the agreement until the trial term, when the court allowed the payment as a credit on the amount of damages for rents and profits found by the jury. The only positive act of Vann in relation to the matter was the filing of the reply, in which both he and Mary Parker joined, and in which the agreement set up was denominated an alleged agreement. If the plaintiffs are bound by the contract made by Picot, it must be by reason of some positive act of affirmation or adoption of the agency of Picot by Vann after being informed of what he had done. No such act has been shown. The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

SHOBER et al. v. WHEELER et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — ACTION TO SET ASIDE — PARTIES — EVIDENCE — EXAMINATION OF ADVERSE PARTY — RIGHT TO OPEN AND CLOSE — TIME FOR REQUESTING INSTRUCTIONS — EXCEPTIONS.

1. It is in the discretion of the court to allow trial of an action to set aside a fraudulent conveyance without the bringing in, as parties, of mortgagees put on the land before the conveyance.

2. The fact that a party has examined an adverse party, under Code, § 581, prior to the trial, does not compel him to use the testimony on the trial.

3. Nor does such examination of an adverse party make him the witness of the party examining him.

4. In an action to set aside a conveyance of land as fraudulent, the fact that the grantee did not return the land for taxation is admissible, as showing that he did not consider himself the owner.

5. Under rule 6 of the superior court, a decision as to the right to open and close is not appealable.

6. Refusal to give special instructions presented after the time prescribed cannot be complained of.

7. An exception to a charge, containing several distinct propositions, that there was misdirection, is too general for consideration on appeal.

8. In an action to set aside a conveyance as fraudulent, it is not error to charge that, if an insolvent person executes a deed to a near relative of land worth $3,000 for $2,500, it is a suspicious circumstance, and the greater the discrepancy, the more suspicious is the circumstance.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Winston, Judge.

Action by F. E. Shober and others against W. H. Wheeler and others to set aside deeds of land as fraudulent. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

The court, by way of illustration, charged the jury that if a man, being insolvent, executed a deed to a near relative for a tract of land worth, say $3,000, and received only $2,500 therefor, this discrepancy between the real value and the price obtained was a suspicious circumstance, and that it was more suspicious as the discrepancy was greater.

J. S. Grogan and Glenn & Manly, for appellants. Watson & Buxton, for appellees.

BURWELL, J. We will consider the defendants' exceptions seriatim, as set out in the case on appeal:

1. It was a matter entirely within the discretion of his honor to determine whether or not the cause should be tried before some of the mortgagees were brought in. The plaintiffs were willing to try the case with the parties then in court. The defendants had excepted to the order, made at the instance of the plaintiffs, to bring in the mortgagees, thus insisting that they were not necessary parties. Plaintiffs seem, by their action, to have conceded that that exception was well taken, in part at least, and thereupon it was for his honor to say if a trial should then be had. If any good cause for a postponement had been shown, no doubt it would have been granted. It appears from the record that the mortgages spoken of were put upon the lands prior to the alleged fraudulent transfer by the mortgagor to his mother and father-in-law. Their validity is not in any way affected by the verdict and judgment.

2. The fact that the plaintiffs had examined the defendant W. H. Wheeler under the provisions of section 581 of the Code did not compel the plaintiffs to use that testimony on the trial, nor did it make that defendant, in any sense, the plaintiffs' witness. But, if so, we are unable to see how the defendants' cause could have been prejudiced by the questions and answers set out in this exception.

3. We think there was no good ground for this exception, but, if there were, it was completely obviated by the subsequent testimony of the defendant, fully establishing the very fact which the plaintiffs sought to prove by the evidence objected to here.

4. The tax returns made by defendants were properly submitted to the consideration of the jury. If they really owned the land here in dispute, it was their duty to return it for taxation. That they failed to so return it was some evidence that they did not consider themselves as the owners thereof.

5. This exception was not pressed before us.

6. The defendants excepted "to the ruling declining to permit defendants to open and conclude." The decision of his honor upon this point is not reviewable here. Rule 6.

7. His honor might have insisted that the plaintiffs' prayers for special instructions were handed to him after the time prescribed, and that he could not be required to consider them. That was his privilege, under the rule. The defendants could have no right to object to his exercising that privilege, or his failure to do so.

8. This exception is "for misdirection in charging the jury as requested by plaintiffs, which charge is recited above." A reference to the charge so "recited above" will show that it contains numerous distinct propositions. Exceptions should be specific. Williams v. Johnson, 94 N. C. 633. The evidence taken on the trial has not been sent up to us. It would be unjust to the appellants to allow the appellants, under such a general exception, to single out here some one of the propositions contained in that charge, and insist that there appeared error in giving it, when, if a specific objection had been noted, either on the motion for a new trial, or when the case on appeal was tendered by them, there might perhaps have been incorporated in the case evidence produced on the trial, or other parts of the charge, that would show the pertinence and propriety of that which is here pointed out as objectionable. We cannot, therefore, consider this exception. It is too general.

9. We find no reasonable objection to the illustration which his honor used in his charge to the jury. Inadequacy of price will not per se vitiate a sale made by an insolvent to a near relative, or to another, unless it is so gross that the court must sternly say to such purchaser that he got the property for nothing. Fullenwider v. Roberts, 4 Dev. & B. 278. But inadequacy of price, if found to exist, is always a suspicious circumstance in the examination into any transfer of property, for the very good reason that men do not usually sell their land for less than it is worth; and when we find them doing so, especially when insolvent, it is not unreasonable to look at such a transaction with suspicious scrutiny. And certainly the greater the discrepancy the greater the suspicion, until it reaches that point where, because of excessive inadequacy, the law stamps the pretended sale as no sale at all. We find no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

COWLES et al. v. HALL.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS—FEES OF OFFICERS—EXECUTION AGAINST DECEDENT'S ESTATE.

1. Code, c. 10, § 155, subd. 8, prescribing the period within which action may be brought for fees due an officer, by the judgment of a court, applies only to actions by officers, and not to a proceeding by a plaintiff for leave to issue execution on a judgment which included fees of officers of the court, which had been paid by him as they accrued.

2. Under Code, c. 10, § 440, providing for the obtaining of leave to issue execution on a judgment, one is not entitled to leave to issue execution against a decedent's estate on a judgment rendered against him in his lifetime, the proceedings for the enforcement against a decedent's estate of debts, including judgments, being prescribed by section 1448.

Appeal from superior court, Wilkes county; Graves, Judge.

Proceedings by Arthur D. Cowles and others against Nancy Hall, executrix of R. D. Hall, deceased, for leave to issue execution against the estate on a judgment recovered against deceased. From a judgment refusing execution, and holding that the collection of the judgment was barred, plaintiffs appeal. Modified.

Cowles & Barber, for appellants.

MacRAE, J. The statute of limitations (chapter 10, § 151, of the Code) is: "The periods prescribed for the commencement of actions, other than for the recovery of real property, shall be as follows: * * * Sec. 155. * * * (8) Fees due to any clerk, sheriff, or other officer, by the judgment of a court, within three years from the time of the judgment rendered or of the issuing of the last execution therefor." This statute, as will be seen, regulates the time for the commencement of actions. But the present proceeding, while not stated in the case with ordinary clearness, was evidently a motion for leave to issue execution under chapter 10, § 440, of the Code, for by reference to the record it will so appear.

His honor held that the collection of plaintiffs' judgment is barred by the statute of limitations. The record shows that a part of the judgment was for fees due the officers of the court, but the judgment was in favor of the plaintiffs, upon the presumption that they had paid the costs for which they were liable, as they accrued, and they were entitled to recover the same from defendant. As this is not an action by any officer to recover fees due him by the judgment of a court, we are of the opinion that the section of the statute of limitations relied on by defendant does not apply to this proceeding.

His honor also held "that the plaintiffs are not entitled to a renewal of their judgment, as to an execution upon the same." We concur with his honor that plaintiffs are not entitled to leave to issue execution upon their judgment. The motion seeks to have execution against the estate of a deceased person upon a judgment rendered against such person during his life. The Code, c. 33, provides elaborately for the settlement of estates of deceased persons; section 1416 prescribes the order of payment of the debts, including judgments; and section 1448 et seq. prescribe the proceeding by which creditors may enforce payment of the debts due them. While, therefore, the plaintiffs are not barred by chapter 10, § 155, (8,) from proper proceedings to enforce their claim, (the same being in favor of plaintiffs in the action, and not of the officers of the court,) they are not entitled to leave to issue execution. Modified and affirmed.

WHITE v. NORTHWESTERN NORTH CAROLINA R. CO.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

RAILROADS IN STREET—RIGHTS OF ABUTTING OWNER—ACTION FOR DAMAGES.

1. The use of a street for a steam railroad is not a legitimate use for public purposes, and, if abutting property is injured thereby, the owner is entitled to damages, whether the fee is in him or the city.

2. The railroad company's entry on the street not having been under statutory authority, but merely under license of the city, the abutting property owner is not confined to statutory remedy, but may maintain an action for damages.

Appeal from superior court, Forsyth county; Boykin, Judge.

Action by Malvina T. White against the Northwestern North Carolina Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. B. Jones, for appellant. Glenn & Manly, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. The plaintiff is the owner of a lot abutting upon one of the streets of the city of Winston, and brings this action to recover damages for various injuries to her said property, inflicted by the defendant by reason of its having entered upon and constructed its railroad through the said street. It appears from the complaint that prior to the plaintiff's purchase of the property, in 1879, the street had been "located and opened for the use and benefit of plaintiff and others, and the public generally, who owned property north of Liberty street, which was almost inaccessible by or over any other street." It also appears that in the construction of its road the defendant made an excavation in front of said property 223 feet in length, and 35 or 40 feet in depth and width, and thereby reduced the width of the street from 30 to 18 feet. It is further alleged that by "reason of the nature of the soil and the proximity of the cuts, travel along the said street is rendered dangerous, and that, in order to sustain the width of the same 15 to 18 feet, the defendant has put in pillars or posts to hold and retain the earth composing the street in position, which plaintiff alleges is insecure and unsafe, and liable to destroy and render useless the said street." It is furthermore alleged that by reason of such excavation and occupation by the defendant the street at certain points along the line of plaintiff's property is almost entirely destroyed, and that plaintiff is greatly endangered. These allegations, extracted from the complaint, must, for the purposes of the appeal, be taken as true, as no evidence seems to have been introduced on the trial; and his honor rejected the issue as to the alleged damages sustained by the plaintiff on the ground that the defendant "had a license from the city to construct its road, and use the street if necessary." The questions presented, therefore, are whether, as against the abutting owner, the city can authorize the use of its streets for the purposes of an ordinary steam railroad, and whether such abutting owner has any proprietary rights, for the violation of which she can maintain an action. It does not appear how the city acquired its title to the street in question, nor do we learn from the record whether it owns the fee in the soil, or simply an easement therein. In the absence of evidence, however, the presumption is that the city has an easement only, and that the fee remains in the abutting proprietor. Elliott, Roads & S. 110; Rich v. City of Minneapolis, 37 Minn. 423, 35 N. W. 2; 3 Kent, Comm. 432. In such a case "the abutting owner is entitled to every right and advantage in that part of the street of which he owns the fee, not required by the public. The easement of the public is the right to use and improve the street for the purposes of a highway only." Lewis, Em. Dom. 113. It must follow, therefore, that if the city perverts the streets to illegitimate purposes, it is an interference with the proprietary rights of the abutter, and that he is entitled to relief at the hands of the courts.

This introduces us to the very important question, never before passed upon by this tribunal, whether or not the use of a steam railroad is a perversion of the street from its original and proper public purposes. There has been much discussion, and not a little conflict of judicial decision, upon this subject; but it is believed that the weight of authority greatly preponderates in favor of the affirmative view of the proposition. Judge Dillon, after a careful investigation, states his conclusion as follows: "The weight of judicial authority undoubtedly is that where the public have only an easement in the streets, and the fee is retained by the adjacent owner, the legislature cannot, under the constitutional guaranty of private property, authorize an ordinary steam railroad to be constructed thereon, against the will of the adjoining owner, without compensation to him. In other words, such a railway, as usually constructed and operated, is an additional servitude." 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 725. In Mills on Eminent Domain (section 204) the same doctrine is laid down, and it is said: "The legislature may authorize the use of a street by the railroad, so as to make the entry lawful; but the use is an additional burden, and the right will not become fixed in the company until compensation is made. If no remedy is provided, there is remaining the remedy at common law." In Lewis on Eminent Domain (section 111) the able and discriminating author remarks: "To us it seems so clear that a railroad is foreign to the legitimate uses of a highway that we never have been able to understand how a court could reach a contrary conclusion." After stating that highways have from time immemorial been devoted to the common use of every citizen, and that no one had a private right or any exclusive privilege therein, the author proceeds: "The railroad does not fall within the scope of such uses. It requires a permanent structure in the street, the use of which is private and exclusive. It gives to an individual or corporation a franchise and easement in the street inconsistent with the public right. To hold that a railroad is one of the proper and legitimate uses of a street leads to the absurd consequence that a street might be filled with parallel tracks, which would practically exclude all ordinary travel, and still be devoted to the ordinary uses of a highway. The law ought not to tolerate such a consequence." In Elliott on Roads & Streets (page 528) the author cites many authorities, and concludes by saying that the weight of authority is that such an appropriation of a street is "a new and additional burden," for which the abutter is entitled to compensation. In support of his proposition he quotes the following language of Judge Cooley: "Neither can the use of the highway for the ordinary railway be in furtherance of the purpose for which the highway is established, and a relief to the local business and travel upon it. The two uses, on the other hand, come seriously in conflict. The railroad constitutes a perpetual embarrassment to the ordinary use, which is greater or less in proportion to the business that is done upon it, and the frequency of trains. When, therefore, the country highway or the city street is taken for the purposes of a railroad company engaged in the business of transporting persons and property between distant points, the owner of the soil in the highway is entitled to compensation, because a new burden has been imposed upon his estate, which affects him differently from the original easement, and may be specially injurious." Const. Lim. (3d Ed.) 683. In Hare, Const. Law, 361, the foregoing doctrine is fully approved, and it is said: "It is immaterial, as regards the principle, whether the land is given voluntarily or taken under the right of eminent domain. If the owner dedicates the land, it is for the continuing uses of a street; if it is condemned, such also is the end in view. To convert a common highway over a man's land into a railroad is, therefore, to impose an additional burden upon the land, which greatly impairs its value, considered as a whole; and if the owner is not compensated his consent must be proved. It cannot be said with truth that in assenting to the laying out of the highway upon his land he consented to the building of a railroad upon it, because they are essentially different. The one benefits his land, renders access to it easy, and enhances the price; while the other makes access to it difficult and dangerous, and renders it comparatively valueless. Nor can it be justly contended that a railway is merely an improved highway. * * * Were the transaction between individuals, every one would see the injustice of such a conclusion. The doubt arises from the supposition that the public interest is involved; and it was to guard against the bias arising from this source that the constitution interfered to protect the citizen. It follows that the dedication of land as a street does not preclude the owner from bringing trespass or ejectment or obtaining an injunction against a railway company which is about to enter upon and occupy the way, and that the company cannot (in the absence of the exercise of the right of eminent domain) rely upon a grant from the legislature and the license or consent of the municipality as a justification." Booth, in his work on Street Railways, (section 78,) after stating that in the early history of commercial railroads the current of authority was contrary to the views above stated, remarks: "But, according to the weight of judicial opinion as expressed during the last thirty years, where the fee of the street remains in the adjoining owner, such use is inconsistent with the purposes of the original acquisition, and, without compensation, can only be acquired by the exercise of the power of eminent domain."

In the discussion of the question, we have preferred to reproduce the conclusions of eminent text writers, rather than attempt a review of the numerous decisions upon which they are founded. These decisions and others we could cite fully establish, upon principle and by weight of authority, the proposition that, where the public have only an easement in the street, and the fee of the soil of the street is retained in the abutting owner, a steam railroad cannot, under the constitutional guaranty of private property, be lawfully constructed and operated thereon against his will, and without compensation. Railroad Co. v. Heisel, 47 Mich. 393, 11 N. W. 212; Railroad Co. v. Reed, 41 Cal. 256; Imlay v. Railroad Co., 26 Conn. 249; Railroad Co. v. Steiner, 44 Ga. 546; Daly v. Railroad Co., 80 Ga. 793, 7 S. E. 146; Cox v. Railroad Co., 48 Ind. 178; Kucheman v. Railway Co., 46 Iowa, 366; Railroad Co. v. Hartley, 67 Ill. 439; Phipps v. Railroad Co., 66 Md. 319, 7 Atl. 556; Springfield v. Railroad Co., 4 Cush. 63; Harrington v. Railroad Co., 17 Minn. 215, (Gil. 188); Railroad Co. v. Ingalls, 15 Neb. 123, 16 N. W. 762; Chamberlain v. Cordage Co., 41 N. J. Eq. 43, 2 Atl. 775; Railroad Co. v. Williams, 35 Ohio St. 168; Ford v. Railroad Co., 14 Wis. 609; Carl v. Railroad Co., 46 Wis. 625, 1 N. W. 295; Buckner v. Railroad Co., 60 Wis. 264, 19 N. W. 56; Railroad Co. v. McAhren, 12 Ind. 552; Theobald v. Railroad Co., 66 Miss. 279, 6 South. 230; Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324; Adams v. Railroad Co., 39 Minn. 286, 39 N. W. 629. The principle, then, being established that the use of a street for steam railroads is not a legitimate use of the street for public purposes, it must, of course, follow that the city had no right, in the exercise of its usual and ordinary powers relating to its highways, to authorize the entry and occupation of the same by the defendant, and that the bare license of the city can afford no justification for the infringement of the rights of the plaintiff. The plaintiff, therefore, taking her allegations to be true as to the damage inflicted upon her property, very plainly has a cause of action against the defendant. If, however, we are wrong in the assumption that the plaintiff is the owner of the fee in the said street, and if it should appear upon another trial that the city has acquired it either by dedication, grant, or condemnation, it will be necessary to determine whether the plaintiff has an easement in said street to the extent that it shall be used only for street purposes, and whether her rights are "property rights," which cannot be impaired or destroyed except under the exercise of the right of eminent domain. Distinctions based upon the legal ownership of the fee in respect to the rights of the abutting proprietor have produced much confusion, resulting in many conflicting decisions; but the true principle, which has been slowly but surely evolved from protracted discussion and experience, is that in respect to the use of the soil for the purposes of a street (and apart from those reversionary or other rights peculiar to legal ownership) it is wholly immaterial where the legal title resides. The very power to take private property for public use, as well as the capacity of a municipal corporation to acquire it in any way, necessarily implies that it is to be held in trust for public purposes; and in the case of land acquired for the purposes of a street there is something in the nature of a contract, under which two coexistent and inviolable rights are created,—one belonging to the public to use and improve the street for the ordinary purposes of a street; the other, to the abutting owner to have access to and from his property, and to enjoy such use of the street as is customary and reasonable. If the owner voluntarily dedicates or grants a strip of land to a city for a street it must be presumed that he does so in consideration of the contemplated benefits accruing to his adjoining property by reason of the strip being used for the legitimate purposes of a street only. If the grant be made upon a pecuniary consideration, it is also fair to assume that in estimating the amount to be paid the value of the benefits above mentioned were likewise considered. In such cases, says Mr. Lewis, (Em. Dom. § 114:) "To make the right a part consideration of the grant, and then allow the public to invade or destroy it at pleasure, would be a fraud, which the law will neither impute nor allow. Therefore, in the case of such a grant there arises by operation of law a private right to use the street in connection with the lot of the proprietor, which is as inviolable as any other right of property." So, if the city acquire the land by condemnation, such advantages or benefits to the adjoining property are usually assessed at a fixed value, and deducted from the estimated damages; and it would, says the above author, be "the grossest inequity to compel a man to pay for advantages, whether in the form of deductions from the price to be paid, or of an assessment of benefits, unless those advantages are secured to him by a clear title. * * *

The existence of these private rights and easements is strictly independent of the mode in which the highway is established, or of the estate or interest which the public acquires in the soil of the street."

The true principles applicable to this question have been declared by the court of appeals of New York in Story v. Railroad Co., 90 N. Y. 122, and Lahr v. Railroad Co., 104 N. Y. 268, 10 N. E. 528. These cases have been followed by subsequent decisions of other states, and their doctrine has been approved by the most prominent writers upon the subject. The opinions are very elaborate, and we cannot do better than to adopt Judge Dillon's summary of some of the principles enunciated: "These judgments, and those that follow them, rest upon the foundation principle that whether the fee in the street is in the abutter, subject to the rights of the public,—that is, to the paramount rights of the public for street uses proper,—or whether the fee is in the public for street uses proper, in either case, and generally in both cases, the abutter is entitled to the benefit of the street for all uses except street uses proper, subject, of course, to legislative and municipal regulations; and that such rights are property or property rights in the abutter, which can only be taken away by the legislature on the condition of making compensation. And the abutting owner's rights in the street are not affected by the source from which he derives his title. * * * If the abutter owns the fee of the street, his rights may be said to be legal in their nature. If he does not own the fee, those rights are in the nature of equitable easements in fee,—the soil of the street being the servient, the abutting owner's lot being the dominant, tenement. Among the most important of such rights or easements is the abutter's right to access, to light, and to air. The court accordingly held that, so far as the elevated railway structures interfered with such rights or easements, while the legislature might authorize their erection and use, yet this could only be done as respects the abutter by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, viz. on condition of making compensation to the abutting owner for the damage which his property actually sustained." "The result of the author's reflections upon this subject is that the views of the court of appeals are sound and just,—sound, because they recognize the paramount nature of the public right to put the street to this new and necessary form of public use; just, because they recognize and declare that the abutter has special proprietary rights or easements in their nature which he is not called upon unequally to sacrifice without compensation for the public use. In effect, the court says the just and true doctrine is, 'Take, but pay.'" 1 Hare, Const. Law, 370, 375; Lewis Em. Dom. §§ 114, 115; Booth, St. Ry. Law, § 81; Barney v. Keokuk, supra; Railroad Co. v. Schurmeir, 7 Wall. 272; 1 Ror. R. R. 324; Story v. Railroad Co., supra; Haynes

v. Thomas, 7 Ind. 38; Railroad Co. v. Steiner, 44 Ga. 546; Theobald v. Railroad Co., supra. The contrary view, laid down in Wood's Railway Law, (volume 2, p. 727,) seems to be based upon the restricted interpretation of the word "taken;" it being applied by some of the courts only to property actually taken and occupied, and all incidental damages to adjoining proprietors are regarded as "consequential" in their character, and damnum absque injuria. The learned author admits that such would not be the case if the words used were "taken or damaged," but by a reference to the opinion in Staton v. Railroad Co., 111 N. C. 278, 16 S. E. 181, it will appear from the cases cited that this restricted meaning of the word "taken" is not in accord with the more recent and better authorities, and is being rapidly submerged by the steady and increasing current of judicial decision. Lewis, Em. Dom. 58; Pumpelly v. Green Bay Co., 13 Wall. 166; Eaton v. Railroad Co., 51 N. H. 504.

The result of the numerous authorities is that in either view of the case—that is, whether the fee is in the plaintiff or in the city—the plaintiff has certain proprietary rights, of which she cannot be deprived, even under the authority of the legislature, without compensation. If her property is in any way injured by the use of the street for legitimate purposes, she cannot complain. But if the enjoyment of her private rights in the street is interrupted by a perversion of the street to uses for which it was not intended, and which the public right does not justify, and her property is thereby injured, and its value impaired, she may maintain an action, and recover such damages as she may have sustained. These proprietary rights in the use of the street for proper public purposes are practically, as we have seen, the same irrespective of the ownership of the soil, and are not confined to the mere right of access, since this may not be disturbed although the street may be reduced in width to 10 or 15 feet. This view is well sustained in the leading case of Adams v. Railroad Co., (Minn.) 39 N. W. 629, in which the court said: "Take a case in one of the states where the fee of the street is in the state or municipality, and of a street 60 feet wide. The abutting lot owners have paid for the advantages of the street on the basis of that width, either in the enhanced price paid for their lots, or, if the street was established by condemnation, in the taxes they have paid for the land taken. In such a case, if the state or municipality should attempt to cut the street down to the width of 10 or 15 feet, would it be an answer to objection by lot owners that the diminished width would be sufficient for mere purposes of access to their lots? It would seem as though the question suggests the answer." The interest of the abutting owner in the entire width of the street, subject to the proper uses of the public, upon the authority of the above decision, has been declared by this court in Moose v. Carson, 104 N. C. 431, 10 S. E. 689, and cannot be regarded as an open question. See, also, Haynes v. Thomas, supra. If, then, the value of the property is lessened by reducing the width of the street, or if such damage is caused by excavations rendering it unsafe and dangerous, as stated in the complaint, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. It will be observed that the defendant did not introduce its charter, or show that it had condemned any part of the street or the rights or easement of the abutting proprietor. It justifies its conduct solely upon the mere license of the city of Winston, and in this view of the case its occupation, in so far as it affects the plaintiff, must be regarded as unlawful. If this be so, the plaintiff may maintain a common-law action for damages to be assessed up to the time of the trial; or it seems she may sue for the permanent damage, if any, which has been inflicted upon her property by reason of the location and construction of the defendant's road, and by so doing confer upon the defendant (so far as she is concerned) an easement to occupy the street. Had the defendant entered under some statutory authority, it would be important to consider whether the plaintiff would not be confined to the statutory remedy; but, as it does not appear to have entered under any other authority than the bare unauthorized license of the city, and as the ruling of the court is based expressly upon the validity of such license, we must conclude that the plaintiff has a right to maintain the present action, and that the issue as to the damages actually sustained should have been submitted to the jury. As the facts were not fully developed on the trial, we do not deem it proper to further pursue the discussion. New trial.

ZIMMERMAN v. ZIMMERMAN.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

DIVORCE — ALIMONY PENDENTE LITE — NOTICE — FAILURE TO ANSWER — FINDINGS BY COURT — CONTEMPT.

1. Under Code, § 1291, providing, as a condition to the allowance of alimony pendente lite, that five days' notice be given the husband, the fact that the notice does not specify the time and place of the hearing does not invalidate the order, it having been rendered in the divorce suit at the term of court at which the suit stood regularly for trial.

2. Under the provision of Code, § 1291, allowing the husband to controvert the allegations of the wife for alimony pendente lite, and authorizing the court to make an allowance if he shall find her allegations to be true and to entitle her to relief, it is sufficient that he find that no answer was filed, and adjudged that alimony be paid, the provision of section 1288 that allegations of the complaint are deemed denied applying only to the trial on the merits.

3. A sentence of 30 days imposed on the husband for contempt in not obeying the order to pay alimony will be affirmed where he did not appeal from the order, failed to get it set aside, though applying to three different judges, and allowed 18 months to elapse without payment, though acknowledging that he had sufficient unincumbered personal property therefor.

Appeal from superior court, Caldwell county; James D. McIver, Judge.

Action by L. W. Zimmerman against H. Zimmerman for divorce. From a sentence of 30 days for contempt, for failure to obey an order granting plaintiff alimony pendente lite, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. J. Ervin, for appellant.

CLARK, J. Prior to the act of 1883, c. 67, which is now incorporated in section 1291 of the Code, the allegations of the complaint and petition were taken as true, for the purposes of the motion for alimony. The only question reviewable on appeal was the sufficiency of plaintiff's allegations. Morris v. Morris, 89 N. C. 109. But, by the amendatory act of 1883, the husband, upon a motion for alimony, was permitted to deny the allegations of the complaint by answer or affidavit, and the judge was required to find such of the plaintiff's allegations to be true as would entitle her to the order, before granting the same. Lassiter v. Lassiter, 92 N. C. 134. Then, on appeal, the sufficiency of the facts found, and not of the plaintiff's complaint, were to be considered.

The order for alimony may be made in or out of term, but the defendant must have five days' notice thereof. In the present case the summons was issued and served in July, 1891, returnable to the superior court of Caldwell county. The complaint, duly verified, was filed at September term, 1891. On March 1, 1892, the plaintiff filed in said court her petition for alimony, and caused the clerk of the court to issue notice to the defendant that she had filed said petition in the cause pending in that court, asking the court to make such order. This was duly served on March 3d. At the term of the court which was held three or four weeks thereafter, the court entered an order reciting, "This cause coming on to be heard, and being heard, and no answer having been filed to the petition filed by the plaintiff," and directing the payment by defendant, as alimony, of $50 in cash, and $5 at the end of each month, till the next term of the court. The defendant neither appealed from said order, nor obeyed it. He contends that it is void and of no effect (1) because the notice did not specify a time and place for its hearing; and (2) because the judge did not find the allegations of the complaint to be true.

If, upon such notice, the hearing had been at any other time and place than the regular term of court at which the action was pending, there would be some ground of objection to the order. It would, at least, have been irregular, and should have been set aside on motion. But, when the order was made in the cause, and at the term of court, and especially at the term at which the cause stood regularly for trial, the defendant is fixed with notice thereof. Hemphill v. Moore, 104 N. C. 379, 10 S. E. 313; Erwin v. Lowry, 64 N. C. 321; Clark's Code, (2d Ed.) 651. Notice is required to be given only when the application is heard out of term time. Coor v. Smith, 107 N. C. 430, 11 S. E. 1089. Application for alimony can be made by a motion in the cause. Reeves v. Reeves, 82 N. C. 348.

The requirement that the judge should find such allegations of the complaint to be true as would entitle the plaintiff to the order was brought into the statute by the amendatory act of 1883, supra, which gave the defendant the right to controvert the allegations of the complaint and petition, and it would seem to apply only when such allegations are controverted. But here they were not denied, and the judge does, substantially, find them "true and sufficient to entitle plaintiff to alimony," by reciting that no answer was filed, and adjudging that the defendant pay the alimony decreed. It will be noted that the provision of section 1288, that the allegations of the complaint "are deemed denied," applies only to the trial upon the merits, since that section adds that the facts "must be found by a jury." As to the motion for alimony, the facts are found by the judge. Section 1291, Code.

The defendant did not see fit to controvert the allegations of fact by a reply under oath, and he cannot be allowed to deny them collaterally by simply refusing to obey the order of the court. There is no hardship in this instance, certainly, since such orders can be "modified or vacated at any time on the application of either party." At any rate, the order was not void. If erroneous, the defendant should have appealed; and, if irregular, his remedy was to have it set aside. But until declared irregular, and set aside, it was his duty to obey it. The defendant's excuse that he paid no attention to the notice because he thought it concerned the divorce only, which he was willing the plaintiff should obtain, deserves no consideration at the hands of any court.

The defendant also avers that he made a motion to set aside the order, but that, owing to other engagements of his counsel, and the forgetfulness of one judge, six months elapsed, and that he lost another six months because the next judge was engaged the whole term of the court in that county upon the trial of jury cases. It does not appear whether the judge was in fact applied to at that term. But the statute provides that the order may be "modified or vacated at any time," and therefore, of course, such motions, upon notice, may be heard at any place in the district. Parker v. McPhail, 112 N. C. 503, 16 S. E. 848. Besides want of diligence in pressing such motion, the defendant, presumably, has small ground to have the order set aside, since the third judge before whom it has come has failed to grant his motion, and there is no exception or appeal. Indeed, his honor, in effect, renewed the order by granting the defendant 10 days longer to pay the sum theretofore decreed, and in default thereof sentenced him to imprisonment for contempt. It was not requisite to find the facts as to the contempt, because, as his honor properly held, the answer to the rule, taking it to be true, was insufficient, and it being admitted therein that the defendant owned unincumbered personal property more than sufficient to pay said alimony, the court rightly adjudged him in contempt. Smith v. Smith, 92 N. C. 304. The value of the defendant's earnings were not considered, but if there had been a deficiency of property, it should have been negatived to satisfactorily account for his failure to obey the order of the court. The defendant neither answered the petition for alimony, though served with notice by the sheriff, nor appealed from the order made thereon, and has not pressed, with any diligence whatever, his motion to set aside the order. Till set aside or modified, it was his duty to obey it. Having failed to do so, he was guilty of a palpable contempt. It did not rest in the good pleasure of the defendant whether he should obey the order of a court of justice or not. If he chose to treat it as a nullity, he did so at his peril, if it should prove, as it has, that it was his opinion, and not the judgment of the court, that was at fault. In the nature of alimony, the order is urgent, and exacts prompt observance. The defendant has delayed 18 months, and, though he has applied to three different judges, the order has not been set aside, yet he still has not obeyed it. The sentence of 30 days' imprisonment for willful disobedience of the order of the court is affirmed.

ALSTON v. MORPHEW.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

EXECUTION SALE—PERSONAL PROPERTY—PRES- ENCE OF PROPERTY.

Personal property sold by a sheriff or constable under execution should be present at the sale, so that it may be seen, and in the officer's possession, so that immediate delivery may be given the purchaser; and, where a piano is left in a private room 250 yards from the place of sale, the sale thereof will be invalid, though an adjournment of a half hour for viewing the piano was taken, of which 3 of the 50 persons present availed themselves.

Appeal from superior court, McDowell county; E. T. Boykin, Judge.

Action by C. J. Alston against M. F. Morphew for recovery of a piano. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A jury trial was waived, and the following facts were agreed upon: "That on the 29th day of October, 1892, one J. A. McDonald,

J. P., in McDowell county, rendered judgment in favor of the defendant in this case—the plaintiff in that—against C. J. Alston, the plaintiff in this case, who was defendant in that, for the sum of $139. On said judgment, execution was issued, and levied by A. L. Finley, a constable for Marion township, said county of McDowell, on the piano described in the complaint in this action, and after advertisement was sold at the courthouse door in the town of Marion, N. C. That said piano was levied upon in, and left in, a private room in the Hotel Thomas, about two hundred and fifty yards from the courthouse door. It was left in charge of an agent of the constable, who held the key to said room. That, at the time of the sale at the courthouse door as aforesaid, the said piano was in the said room where levied on. That when the piano was offered for sale, and during the crying of the sale by the officer, he announced the whereabouts of the piano, and stated that bidders would be given half an hour to examine same, and that during the half hour as many as three persons went and examined said piano. That there were about fifty persons at the sale. That no actual delivery of the piano was made by the officer to the purchaser at the time of the sale, but the purchaser obtained the same by claim and delivery against the proprietor of the hotel, who held the same under a claim of storage charges from the officer. The piano was an upright piano of average size.”

Upon the facts as agreed, the court was asked to proceed to judgment, and judgment was thereupon rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The judgment of the court is as follows: “This cause coming on to be heard before his honor, E. T. Boykin, judge presiding and holding the courts of the tenth district of North Carolina, and a jury trial having been waived, and the facts agreed upon by the parties, and the court being of opinion that upon the facts agreed the plaintiff is entitled to recover of the defendant the piano described in the complaint, it is now, on motion of G. G. Eaves and Carter & Craig, attorneys for the plaintiff, considered, ordered, and adjudged that the plaintiff have and recover of the defendant the piano described in the complaint. It is further adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the defendant his reasonable costs in this case incurred, to be taxed by the clerk of this court.” The defendant excepts to the rendition of this judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and prays an appeal to the supreme court.

Justice & Justice, for appellant. Lock Craig, for appellee.

MacRAE, J. The uniform current of decisions in this state, from Blount v. Mitchell, 1 N. C. 80, is to the effect that upon sales by sheriffs or constables, of personal property under execution, the property should be present at the sale, and in the possession of the officer, so that immediate delivery may be made to the purchaser. These requirements are fulfilled, however, if it is in plain view, or so near that it may be personally inspected by all present at the sale who may choose to examine it. The sale “must be conducted in such manner that every person who may come up before the articles are knocked down by the auctioneer may see and examine them, so as to enable him to become a bidder, if he choose. To hold otherwise would be to give some of the persons present an advantage over others, and thus prevent that fair and open competition which the law so much desires in sales of this kind.” McNeely v. Hart, 8 Ired. 492. The reason of the rule is clearly stated in Ainsworth v. Greenlee, 3 Murph. 470: “The constable’s authority to sell these goods was derived under a fieri facias, the execution of which the law requires to be done in such a manner as that by the sale the property is most likely to command the highest price in ready money. It is evident that for this purpose the bidder ought to have an opportunity of inspecting the goods, and forming an estimate of their value, without which it is not to be expected that a fair equivalent will be bid. The presence of the goods, too, in the possession of the officer, to which possession the levy gives him a right, assures the bidders that a delivery will be made to the highest bidder forthwith, and that so far the object of the purchase will be attained without litigation.”

The present case is an apt illustration of the justice of the rule. The piano was left in a private room in an hotel about 250 yards from the place of sale. There were about 50 persons at the sale. An adjournment was had for half an hour in order to give all present an opportunity to visit the hotel, and examine the piano. As many as three availed themselves of the invitation. It is alleged in the complaint, and not denied in the answer, that the property sold for $32.50,—the said sum being a small part of its actual value,—although it is denied in the answer that the smallness of the sum bid was occasioned by the absence from the place of sale of the article sold; and it further appears that the purchaser did not obtain possession from the sheriff, but by means of a proceeding in claim and delivery. Who can tell that the apprehension of trouble in obtaining possession did not deter persons present from bidding at the sale? The law so firmly established by repeated adjudications is in no way weakened by the case of Wormell v. Nason, 83 N. C. 82, where printing presses and stands,—property of a ponderous nature, and then in actual use and operation,—conveyed by mortgage with a general power of sale, unrestricted as to its place, were sold within 50 yards of the place where they were located and in use, the same being accessible to all who might wish to inspect them, and the sale was held to pass title, which, if impeachable at all, could only be questioned by the mortgagor, and those claiming under him, in analogy to the rule in execution sales. Affirmed.

COZART et al. v. WEST OXFORD LAND CO. et al.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 12, 1893.)

APPEAL — OBJECTIONS WAIVED — STATUTE OF FRAUDS—TRIAL—ISSUES FOR JURY.

1. Where, during the pendency of an action by a vendor for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land, the land is sold by consent of parties under a mortgage thereon, and plaintiff then demands damages for breach of contract, and the action is tried on that theory, defendant cannot object for the first time on appeal that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because the land had been sold, and specific performance is no longer possible.

2. A defendant in an action for breach of a land contract, who desires to avail himself of the defense that the contract is not in writing, as required by the statute of frauds, (Code, § 653,) must plead the statute; and he cannot object for the first time on appeal that the evidence fails to show that the contract is in writing.

3. In an action by a vendor for the breach of a contract to purchase land, where the pleadings on both sides admit that the vendor agreed to discharge all incumbrances on the land in excess of $23,000, and that the vendee agreed to take title subject thereto, and the issue is as to whether the vendor performed his agreement, it is proper for the court to refuse to submit to the jury the question whether or not the vendor fraudulently represented to the vendee that the liens did not exceed $23,000.

4. In such an action, where the vendee alleges that it incurred expenses on the faith of the vendor's promise to execute a deed on the date fixed in the contract, and that its scheme to resell the land at public auction miscarried owing to such default by the vendor, it is error not to submit to the jury the question whether the time fixed for the delivery of the deed was of the essence of the contract.

Appeal from superior court, Granville county; Henry R. Bryan, Judge.

Action by B. H. Cozart and others against the West Oxford Land Company, R. N. Lassiter, D. C. Hunt, and H. C. Herndon, for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

John W. Graham and A. W. Graham, for appellants. T. T. Hicks, for appellees.

MACRAE, J. The primary object of this action was to compel specific performance of an alleged contract between plaintiff B. H. Cozart and the defendant company for the purchase by defendant of plaintiff's land, the discharge by defendant of certain liens or incumbrances upon said land, and the issue by defendant to said plaintiff of 20 shares of stock in defendant company, and, as ancillary relief, to enjoin the other defendants from selling said land under their mortgages or trust deeds pending this litigation. A restraining order was made. It appears by the complaint that upon an intimation of the judge that he would dissolve the restraining order it was agreed between the parties that the defendants Herndon and Cooper, mortgagees, might sell the land under their deeds; that they did sell the land, and the same was bought by defendant Herndon, and the sale was confirmed by an order of court reciting the consent of parties thereto. Upon these changed conditions, the plaintiff B. H. Cozart demands damages of defendant company for failure to comply with its contract. The pleadings are extremely voluminous, the complaint having been used as an affidavit to obtain the restraining order, and much of it is directed to that question. The complaint has been twice amended, and there are several exhibits attached. The defendant company admits that there were negotiations between plaintiff and defendant in relation to the purchase of the land described, but denies that plaintiff complied with the agreement to relieve the land of all incumbrances over $23,000, or that plaintiff ever conveyed said land to defendant clear of all liens above said sum. It admits the tender of a deed, but denies that it was according to contract. Defendant further alleges that, relying upon plaintiff's promises to reduce the liens upon the land to $23,000 by a certain day, it paid off incumbrances to the amount of $3,000, that it had said land laid off and surveyed, that it advertised sales to be made upon the day last above referred to, and that, by reason of the failure of plaintiff to reduce the liens upon said land to $23,000 on compliance with his agreement, the defendant has been damaged to the amount of $5,000. Defendant further claims the right to be subrogated to the rights of the holders of the incumbrances paid off by it, which were prior liens to the Herndon and Cooper mortgages, and demands further judgment against plaintiff for $3,000, the amount so alleged to have been paid by the defendant; and the defendant charges that it was induced to enter into the contract or agreement with plaintiff by the false representations of plaintiff that the incumbrances upon the land did not amount to more than $19,000. To the answer there was a reply, reiterating the allegations of the complaint, and denying all false representations. The pleadings on both sides abound in the statement of evidential facts and matters only pertinent upon the question as to the right of plaintiff to the restraining order. In this court the defendants move to dismiss the action upon the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, as it appears that the land in controversy has been sold by consent of the plaintiffs under the Herndon mortgage, and the sale has been confirmed, and that the plaintiffs cannot execute title to the defendant land company, as they are no longer the owners of said land, and as it is admitted in the complaint that the liens are in excess of $23,000, and have not been reduced to that sum; and also that there is no contract in writing shown between defendant corporation and plaintiff. The motion is denied because—First, the action is now for damages for an alleged breach of contract, and not to compel specific performance; second, if defendant had desired to avail himself of the defense of the statute, (section 683 of the Code,) he should have specially pleaded it. Curtis v. Mining Co., 109 N. C. 401, 13 S. E. 944.

The defendant tendered the following issues: (1) Was the agreement of the defendant the West Oxford Land Company to purchase the land of the plaintiff B. H. Cozart founded upon the representation made by the said B. H. Cozart that the judgments, liens, and incumbrances on said land did not exceed $23,000? (2) Was said representation false? After a careful perusal of the answer we do not find it alleged that the plaintiff B. H. Cozart represented that the judgments, liens, and incumbrances on said land did not exceed $23,000. The answer charges that said Cozart repeatedly assured the defendant that the incumbrances on the said land would not exceed the sum of $18,000 or $19,000, and that, if the defendant would assume the payment of said incumbrances, he (the said Cozart) would sell said land at the price of $25,000, $2,000 of which he would take in the capital stock of said company at par, and the difference between the amount of said incumbrances and $23,000 in cash; that, relying upon the representations of plaintiff, defendant agreed to take said land at the price stated, upon condition that plaintiff would execute and deliver a deed in fee simple to said land on or before the 26th day of March, 1891. The defendant goes on at great length to detail the assertion of plaintiff that the incumbrances did not amount to more than $19,000; the reliance of defendant upon said statement, and the consequent payment by defendant of debts of plaintiff to the amount of more than $3,000; the discovery that said incumbrances amounted to over $26,000; the new promise of plaintiff that, if defendant would take the land at the price stated, he (plaintiff) would relieve it of all incumbrances in excess of $23,000 on or before the 26th of March, 1891; the acceptance of this offer by defendant, if plaintiff would comply with his agreement on or before the time stated; the failure of plaintiff to so comply, and his tender of a deed to defendant, and refusal to accept the same by defendant, because the land had not been relieved of all incumbrances over $23,000; the execution of a deed for said land to Gregory, trustee, and the failure of defendant and Gregory, or either of them, to tender to defendant a deed in accordance with the agreement, and the great damage sustained by defendant in consequence of such failure. The reply denies all false representations, and avers the readiness and willingness of plaintiffs, and their offer, to deliver to defendant a good deed for said land free from all incumbrances over and above the sum of $23,000, and the refusal of defendant to comply with its contract. The reply further alleges that the deed above referred to was made to Gregory for the use of defendant and as its agent, and sets forth an agreement made by Gregory with plaintiff, for himself and his associates, to pay off all incumbrances on said land to the amount of $23,000, and to pay to said Cozart the sum of $2,000 in stock of defendant company at par, and alleges in substance that this agreement made with Gregory was with him as agent of defendant company. If we have thus far extracted from the pleadings the true matter at issue between the parties, there seems to be no great difference between them as to the terms of the contract except in one particular, and, as no issue was tendered on either side as to its terms, it seems to be conceded that the plaintiff and defendant company entered into an agreement or contract that the plaintiff B. H. Cozart would make to said defendant a deed in fee simple for the land named, relieved of all incumbrances over and above the sum of $23,000, the other plaintiffs undertaking to discharge all liens or incumbrances in excess of said sum, and the defendant company undertook, in consideration for such deed and conveyance, to discharge the liens upon said land, which were debts of said B. H. Cozart, to the amount of $23,000, and to issue to him 20 shares of stock in said company at its par value, $2,000, and, if the said liens should not amount to $23,000, to pay to said plaintiff the difference in cash. The contention of the plaintiffs is that they have always since the making of the contract been ready and willing, and have repeatedly offered, to convey said land to defendant company free from all incumbrances in excess of $23,000, and that defendant company has failed and refused to comply with its contract; but, the land having been sold under some of the liens which were upon it, the original demand for specific performance has been abandoned, and the plaintiffs now demand damages for breach of contract by defendant company. The defendant, on the other hand, contends that the plaintiffs have never tendered to it a deed for said land freed from all incumbrances in excess of $23,000. It contends, further, that by the terms of the contract said deed was to have been delivered to it on or before a day certain,—the 10th day of March, 1891,—and that the time of the delivery of said deed was of the essence of the contract; that upon the faith of plaintiff's agreement defendant sold stock, and advertised a sale and distribution of the land to be made upon the 19th day of August, 1891, and incurred expenses of preparing the land for said sale, and paid off a part of the liens upon said land; and that by the failure and refusal of plaintiffs to comply with their contract the defendant has been damaged to the amount of $5,000 for the failure of its enterprise, and in the sum of $3,000, money paid by it in discharge of liens upon said property. Defendant also asks that for the last-named sum it be subrogated to the rights of the parties whose liens have been so paid off. Defendant also alleges that it was induced to enter into the contract by reason of the false and fraudulent representations of plaintiff B. H. Cozart that the sum of the incumbrances upon said land did not amount to more than $18,000 or $19,000. The last charge seems to lose its force by reason of the defendant's further allegations of the agreement as to the satisfaction of all liens over $23,000, and that upon plaintiffs' carrying out their agreement the defendant would take the land upon the terms above set forth. We can see, therefore, no necessity for the two issues first tendered by defendant. The terms of the contract not being seriously controverted by either side, except in one particular, which we will reach directly, there was no necessity for the first and second additional issues presented by defendant, especially as the said issues involved the finding of a special verdict by the jury.

There was, however, a sharp contention between the parties as to the question whether the performance of the contract was limited as to time, and we think that the third of the additional issues arose upon the pleadings, was material, and has not been presented in any other form to the jury: "Was the sale of lots and distribution of same on 19th of August, 1891, prevented by the failure of plaintiffs to discharge the liens in excess of $23,000, or from failure of plaintiffs to comply with the agreement to take stock in the West Oxford Land Company?" And this issue we think ought to have been submitted to the jury, as upon a response to it might have depended the findings upon others which were submitted.

As the case must go down for a new trial, it will be unnecessary to examine the numerous and interesting questions further presented, but we suggest that the matters in dispute between the parties are greatly and unnecessarily complicated by the prolixity of the pleadings, much of which matter bearing upon the question of the restraining order, as well as much statement of evidentiary facts, might be profitably eliminated upon a repleader before another trial. New trial.

DONNELLY et al. v. WILCOX.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

RES JUDICATA—CONSENT JUDGMENT.

A decree by consent in proceedings before a competent tribunal, if not impeached, is a bar to an action between the same parties involving the same question.

Appeal from superior court, Ashe county; Jos. D. McIver, Judge.

Action by G. M. Donnelly and others against Joseph O. Wilcox for an accounting as guardian. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. A. Doughton and E. O. Smith, for appellee.

OLARK, J. The clerk of the superior court had jurisdiction of the proceeding against the guardian for a settlement. Code, § 1619; Rowland v. Thompson, 64 N. C. 715, 65 N. C. 110; Sudderth v. McCombs, Id. 186, (which also holds that the superior court, at term, would not have original jurisdiction of such action;) McNeill v. Hodges, 105 N. C. 52, 11 S. E. 265. The judgment rendered by the clerk in the former proceeding was between the same parties, and upon the same question now litigated, and is an estoppel to the present action, (Williams v. Clouse, 91 N. C. 322; Collins v. Smith, 109 N. C. 468, 14 S. E. 88,) unless impeached for fraud by a direct proceeding. It can make no difference that the decree was rendered by consent. It seems to have been regular and formal. That action was instituted to procure a settlement from defendant of the balance due by him as guardian, and the notice therein was issued at the instance of the plaintiffs. The pleadings in this action do not impeach and attack said judgment as fraudulent, but assail and impeach a receipt given by plaintiffs to defendant for the balance found by the decree to be due, and directed to be paid. The amount admitted by the complaint to have been paid was the exact amount of the judgment. His honor properly held the judgment could not be attacked collaterally, and that it had not been impeached by the pleadings. We are not advised why the plaintiffs did not thereupon ask an amendment, which lay in the discretion of the court, (Code, § 273,) so as to assail the judgment itself for fraud. The judgment of nonsuit must be affirmed.

WALKER v. MOSES.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Dec. 5, 1893.)

DEED—DESCRIPTION—ADVERSE POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE.

1. The description in a deed of land as the tract "left me by P.," and as "adjoining the lands of H. S. and others, containing 180 acres, more or less," is not void for uncertainty.

2. Where title to land has been divested out of the state by adverse possession, one who thereafter holds under sheriff's deed for the statutory period for possession under color of title has good title against one thereafter obtaining a grant from the state.

Appeal from superior court, Burke county; Boykin, Judge.

Action by A. E. Walker against Moulton Moses for recovery of land. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

S. J. Ervin and J. T. Perkins, for appellant. Isaac Avery, for appellee.

EVERY, J. The description of the land conveyed in a deed as the tract "left me by my late grandfather, Michael Pearson," and as "adjoining the lands of Andrew Hemphill, H. B. Satterwhite, and others, containing 180 acres, more or less," suggests upon its face the possibility of identifying it by extrinsic proof of the fact that the ancestor named had left it, and that it adjoined lands of the persons mentioned, and possibly the additional circumstance that it corresponded in size. Massey v. Belisle, 2 Ired. 170; Blow v. Vaughan, 105 N. C. 204, 10 S. E. 891. The description is not, therefore, void for uncertainty; and the exception to the ruling that the boundaries could be located by parol proof is not well taken.

The only remaining exception was to the instruction that the deed executed by Michael Pearson to Satterwhite in 1841 was color of title, and that a continuous adverse possession under it, if shown, divested the title out of the state. There being no exception to the sufficiency or competency of testimony offered to fit the description to the locus in quo, we must assume that the necessary extrinsic proof was offered to locate the boundaries of that tract so as to include the land in controversy. The undisputed testimony tended to show that the land covered by that deed (there being no question raised as to its actual identification by the evidence offered, if parol proof was competent for that purpose) had been in the possession of the grantee, Satterwhite, and his heirs, for more than 21 years from its execution, in 1841, till John H. Pearson took possession, in 1854. There was no error in instructing the jury that such a possession would divest the title of the state, and vest it in the heirs of Satterwhite. Mobley v. Griffin, 104 N. C. 115, 10 S. E. 142; Malloy v. Bruden, 86 N. C. 251. The state is deemed to have surrendered its right, where it permits such an occupation without interruption for 21 years, and a title vests in the occupant, which can only be divested by a subsequent adverse possession by another, till his right, in turn, ripens in the same way. Christenbury v. King, 85 N. C. 229; Avent v. Arrington, 105 N. C. 377, 10 S. E. 991. The first duty incumbent on one who essays to show title good against the world is to prove that the state, under whom all claimants hold, has conveyed the land in controversy to some person, or that by reason of continuous occupation by such claimant, or those through whom he derails title for the statutory period, "the state will not sue" for trespass, or prefer any claim to the profits. Code, § 139. If the defendant failed to connect himself with the possession of Satterwhite or his heirs, it was nevertheless admitted that he had shown a connected chain of title and continuous possession in himself, and those through whom he claimed, from January 26, 1870, the date of the sheriff's deed to John Pearson, to the 3d day of August, 1891. Having shown that the interest of the state had passed to the heirs of Satterwhite, it was then sufficient, as against them, to prove a subsequent adverse possession for seven years, under color of title, in those under whom the defendant claims, in order, in turn, to divest the right of said heirs, and transfer it to the defendant. Therefore, by the occupation of Pearson and his devisees under the sheriff's deed and his will, an indefeasible title passed to them at the end of seven years from the 26th of January, 1870, which it was admitted was transmitted to the landlord of the defendant. The issuance of a grant by the state in 1884 for any portion of the land covered by the sheriff's deed could not impair the title of those under whom the defendant claims, which had ripened so as to include all of the land within the limits of the deed to Pearson. McLean v. Smith, 106 N. C. 177, 11 S. E. 184. There was no evidence of an occupation by the plaintiff under his grant, except that by his tenant, Satterwhite, which continued only for a short time after the date of the deed (June, 1884) till the spring of 1885, when it was abandoned, and that was insufficient to impair the title acquired under the sheriff's deed.

The plaintiff had no cause to complain of the instruction that the issuing of the grant was such an interruption as arrested the running of the statute (Code, § 139, subd. 2) in favor of the defendant by virtue of the possession under the sheriff's deed and subsequent conveyances.

It is needless to discuss the question whether the sheriff's deed related back from its date, in 1870, to the sale, in 1854, so as to make the possession of Pearson, the purchaser, which began immediately after the sale, adverse to the claim of the heirs of Satterwhite, the grantee in the former deed, who surrendered the possession to Pearson, and would have been estopped from denying his title, had he caused the sheriff's deed to be executed immediately after the sale. If Pearson entered under the Satterwhite heirs, his possession from 1854 to 1870 was but a prolongation of theirs, by which they had already acquired title. If he held adversely, he thereby extended the benefit of his own occupation backward, without benefit to himself, since, by holding for seven years under color after January 26, 1870, he acquired the title theretofore vested in the Satterwhite heirs, even though he had held under, not adversely to, them, till the execution of the sheriff's deed. For the reasons given, the judgment must be affirmed.

CRINKLEY et al. v. EGERTON et al.
(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 14, 1893.)

JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT—MORTGAGE OF CROPS—DESCRIPTION—VALIDITY—INSERTION OF POWER OF SALE.

1. The superior court has jurisdiction of an action not founded on contract, though the value of the property sued for is less than $50; Code, § 887, providing that justices shall have concurrent jurisdiction of civil actions not founded on contract, wherein the value of the property in controversy does not exceed $50.

2. Where an action is brought, not only for the recovery of crops, but for the value of a portion alleged to have been wrongfully converted by defendant, the court properly denied a motion to dismiss on the ground that, the landlord being entitled to possession, no action would lie against him; it being a controverted point whether or not defendant was landlord.

3. The motion was properly denied for the further reason that defendant, though he were landlord, would be liable to account to plaintiffs for the value of the crops in excess of his lien.

4. A mortgage on crops to be raised on lands described in the mortgage, and on "any other lands" that the mortgagor may cultivate "during the present year 1891," is good as to crops on the land described, though void, for uncertainty, as to those raised on "any other lands." Gwathney v. Etheridge, 6 S. E. Rep. 411, 99 N. C. 571, followed.

5. The insertion in such mortgage of a power of sale upon default does not invalidate it as an agricultural lien.

Appeal from superior court, Warren county; W. A. Hoke, Judge.

Action by A. Crinkley and another against B. I. Egerton and others to recover for crops alleged to have been wrongfully converted by defendants. There was judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Modified.

Batchelor & Devereux, for appellants. T. T. Hicks, for respondents.

CLARK, J. Exception 1: The action is not based on contract, and is for the recovery of property which, it is averred in the complaint, exceeds $50 in value. The court rightly held that the superior court had jurisdiction. Even had the value of the property been less than $50, the superior court had concurrent jurisdiction. Code, § 887.¹

Exception 2: The action being not only for the recovery of the crops, but for the value of part of the same, alleged to have been wrongfully converted by the defendants, the court properly refused the motion to dismiss the action, made on the ground that, the landlord being entitled to possession of the crops, no action would lie against him. Whether he was landlord or not, was a controverted point; and, if landlord, he was liable to account to plaintiffs for value of crops in excess of his lien.

Exception 3: The court properly held that the paper writings put in evidence by plaintiffs "sufficiently described the land upon which the crops were to be raised, and were a sufficient compliance with the statute creating an agricultural lien, though prescribing a different remedy from that allowed by statute, (Code, § 1800.)" On the first point, the mortgage upon the crops to be raised on the farm described, and "on any other lands he may cultivate during the present year 1891," was held effective in Woodlief v. Harris, 93 N. C. 211, as to the crops on the land described, (which is the case here,) though void as to those raised on the "any other lands." Gwathney v. Etheridge, 99 N. C. 571, 6 S. E. Rep. 411. As to the second point, the insertion of a power of sale upon default made did not invalidate the instrument as an agricultural lien. As to the Pleasants & Sons' lien, assigned to Egerton, the jury, in response to the issue, find that nothing was advanced thereunder. No error.

LOCKHART et al. v. BALLARD et al.
NATIONAL EXCH. BANK OF DALLAS et al. v. SAME.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 21, 1893.)

ASSIGNMENT FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS—RIGHTS OF CREDITORS—PREFERENCES—PROCEDURE.

Creditors of an assignor for benefit of creditors sued the trustees, and alleged facts entitling them to preference as creditors of the tenth class under the terms of the assignment. The answer first specifically denied the allegations of the complaint, but in a subsequent clause admitted them, (probably inadvertently.) Creditors belonging to class 14 also sued such trustees to restrain them from paying plaintiffs in the first action under class 10, and expressly denied that the latter were within such class. These two actions were consolidated. Held, that the contest was really between the plaintiffs in the two actions, and the facts entitling plaintiffs in the first suit to payment under class 10 were not established by admissions in the pleadings.

Appeal from superior court, Durham county; H. R. Bryan, Judge.

Two actions consolidated and tried together: One by John S. Lockhart and others against V. Ballard and W. S. Halliburton, trustees under a deed of assignment for benefit of creditors of W. T. Blackwell, to compel defendants to prefer and pay plaintiffs as creditors of the tenth class under the terms of the deed of assignment; the other by the National Exchange Bank of Dallas, Tex., and others, against the same defendants, to restrain the latter from paying plaintiffs in the first action as creditors of the tenth class, and claiming that they and such plaintiffs are creditors of the fourteenth class. From a judgment entered on the pleadings admitting plaintiffs in the first action into the tenth class, the National Exchange Bank of Dallas, Tex., and other creditors of the fourteenth class, appeal. Reversed.

J. S. Manning and Busbee & Busbee, for appellants. W. A. Guthrie and Boone & Parker, for appellees.

CLARK, J. The tenth class into which the judgment admits the appellee creditors is thus described in the deed of assignment: "To J. S. Lockhart, or the holders thereof, the amount of all notes and drafts on which J. S. Lockhart is bound as surety or acceptor or indorser for W. T. Blackwell, all the same amounting to about thirty-five thousand dollars, and having been done for the benefit and accommodation of W. T. Blackwell." On none of the paper set out in the judgment does J. S. Lockhart appear as "surety or acceptor or indorser for W. T. Blackwell," nor does it appear that they were executed "for the benefit and accommodation of W. T. Blackwell." Parol evidence was competent to have shown that, notwithstanding the apparent relation of the parties upon the face of the notes and drafts, the relation of J. S. Lockhart in regard to them was in fact either that of "surety, indorser, or acceptor for W. T. Blackwell, or that they were executed for his benefit." But no evidence was introduced, and it was error to hold that this was established by admissions in the pleadings. There were two suits,—one by creditors claiming to come under class 10, and the other by creditors belonging to class 14, seeking to restrain the defendants, assignees of Blackwell, from paying out to the plaintiffs in the first suit under class 10. These two suits were consolidated without objection, and the plaintiffs in the two separate actions are in effect the real litigants, the nominal defendants being mere stakeholders. The answer to the complaint filed in the suit first brought denies specifically the allegation of the appellee creditors, plaintiffs in that suit. The following section of the answer, however, admits (by inadvertence probably) the ninth allegation of the complaint. Whatever question might have arisen upon this conflicting pleading was obviated by the consolidation of the two actions and the express denial in the pleadings in the latter case that the appellee creditors are in any wise entitled to come within class 10. As always in creditors' bills, one creditor can plead a defense to the claim of another creditor, since its exclusion enlarges the fund in which he himself is to share. Oates v. Lilly, 84 N. C. 643. The notes and drafts sued on by those claiming under class 10 aggregate within a few thousands of the $35,000 specified in that clause. This fact, however, cannot supply by itself evidence to show that Lockhart was "surety, indorser, or acceptor" on the notes and drafts set out in the pleadings. While the judgment is erroneous in holding that, upon admissions in the answer, the appellees were entitled to share in class 10, it may be that, when the case goes back, evidence can be found to prove that, notwithstanding in form J. S. Lockhart was not "surety, indorser, or acceptor for W. T. Blackwell," yet in fact that was the true relation he occupied as to the notes and drafts in controversy. Southerland v. Fremont, 107 N. C. 565, 12 S. E. Rep. 237. If so, it would be decreed that the holders thereof should participate in said estate under class 10. If this is not shown, those claimants would come in under section 14, and share pro rata with the other creditors named in that class. Error.

BURWELL, J., did not sit.

STATE v. MOORE.

(Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 21, 1893.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — UNIFORM TAXATION — POLICE REGULATION — REASONABLENESS OF LICENSE FEE.

1. Acts 1891, c. 75, defining an "emigrant agent" "to mean any person engaged in hiring laborers in the state to be employed beyond the limits of the same," and providing that emigrant agents shall pay the state treasurer a license fee of $1,000 before they can hire laborers in certain counties of the state to be employed beyond the limits of the state, is, if considered as an exercise of the taxing power of the legislature, in contravention of Const. art. 5, § 3, authorizing the legislature to tax "trades, professions, franchises," etc., and is void for want of uniformity.

2. Since the act does not prescribe any regulation as to how the business shall be carried on, nor any police supervision, and since it exacts a very large license fee, it is restrictive and prohibitory of the business mentioned therein, and, if considered as an exercise of police power, is void for that reason.

3. There being no regulation of such occupation, and therefore no expense in supervising it, or any expense whatever beyond the amount necessary to defray the cost of issuing the license, the act, if considered an exercise of police power, is also void, for the unreasonableness of the license fee.

Appeal from criminal court, New Hanover county; Meares, Judge.

T. L. Moore was tried for a violation of Acts 1891, c. 75, (Emigrant Agent Act,) and, from a verdict of acquittal, the state appeals. Affirmed.

The Attorney General, for the State. Junius Davis, for appellee.

SHEPHERD, C. J. This is an indictment for the violation of chapter 75, Acts 1891;
